ENGLISH PAPERS.

II.—Home Administration.

1. The West Coast Spectator, of the 24th December, writes :—"A scandalous story about a pugilistic encounter between a swollen head Sub-Inspector of Police and the Sub-Magistrate of Chowghat is going the round. It is said that attempts are being made to hush up the very unpleasant affair, for the reason that the aggressor is alleged to possess the ears and heart of the powers that be. . . Nothing can be more dangerous to the administration of criminal justice and nothing is more calculated to shake the people's confidence in the subordinate magistracy than the impression that the latter could be insulted or ill-treated with impunity by policemen. . . We hope that there will be no attempt to burke an inquiry and that the matter will go up to the Legislative Council as did the Trichinopoly incident."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 24th Dec. 1918.

Alleged assault by a Sub-Inspector of Police.

(h) Railways.

2. The Commonweal, for the week ending 27th December, remarks :—"The appointment of Sir Arthur Anderson as the President of the Railway Board in succession to Sir Robert Gillan invites public attention to a scandal of no mean order. Sir Arthur Anderson, though the semi-official announcement does not reveal it, is the ex-Agent of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway, and his appointment as the Chief Adviser of the Government on Railway matters, at a time when the question of ending company management is under discussion, is to say the least an insult to public decency. . . A company official goes to the Railway Board and on giving it up is rewarded with a higher office in the same company. Need we say what will be his attitude towards that company during his term at the Railway Board ? The arrangement is of course convenient to both the company and the individual concerned, but does it not look hideous from the standpoint of public decency ? The public were under the impression that the Government of India had recognised the indecency and the injustice of such an appointment ; but we now find that the old game is to go on. . . Whatever the genesis of this scandal, the public must be acquainted with it, and we appeal to the Government of India to look into the whole question, and cancel the appointment even at the risk of rousing some resentment in the Anglo-Indian quarters."

Commonweal, Madras, 27th Dec. 1918.

The Railway Board Presidentship.

3. The Hindu, of the 23rd December, has the following :—"It is astonishing that in flagrant defiance of public opinion, which has expressed itself with such singular unanimity on the matter, the authorities responsible for holding the Park Fair should have decided to run their pet hobby, if need be, to death. . . The contemptuous disregard, moreover, of the unanimous wish of the Corporation of Madras shown by the committee, in callous indifference to the welfare of the public, is amazing and constitues a gross insult. . . With a hardihood which is appalling, the committee is, we are told, still sticking to its guns, conveying an impression in the public mind about its indifference to the health of the city which, if true, would deserve the strongest condemnation that may be passed on such an intolerable proceeding. . . What we ask, is a sacrifice of health when compared to the sacrifice of a paltry amount of money ? Such a consideration if it really had influenced the decision, cannot but arouse public indignation and such scandalous playing with a grave issue cannot be permitted in the interests of public decency and of good government. We should like to know what the Government are doing. The committee is not governing this city ; it cannot obviously be the final arbiter in this matter, and the Government cannot have abdicated their responsibility which is real and serious. . . There is an impression that His Excellency Lord Pentland desires that the Fair should be held, and it may receive some confirmation from the fact that our morning contemporary announces to-day that the Governor will be present on the opening day and will preside at the sports on the 28th and distribute the prizes. If this is correct, all that we can say is that His Excellency should be grossly misled and badly advised, and it is incredible that he should not have been made aware of all the facts of this business and of the mad career of the committee. We must protest against the insolent, unrighteous and highhanded decision of the committee and call on the Government to summarily prohibit the Fair."

The Madras Park Fair.

HINDU, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

The Indian Civil Service and the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms.

4. In a leader under the heading 'The Civilian Revolt,' the Hindu, of the 23rd December, remarks:—"When our Bihar contemporary the Searchlight stated the other day that there was a 'strong and persistent rumour about some concerted action being shortly taken by the Civil Service of our Province—with or without the co-operation of those of the other provinces—in opposition to the proposed Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms,' we thought it better to defer reference to the topic till some more tangible proof of such action than rumours was available. Our contemporary now thoroughly justifies its reference by publishing the full text of the circular which one Mr. Milne, I.C.S., the Acting Honorary Secretary of what is styled the Bihar and Orissa Civil Service Association, has issued to the members of the Indian Civil Service in the Province. . . We doubt very much if the fears that are entertained by the service have any foundation on reason; but granting that the Civil Servants feel that they are done a grievous wrong, the way to get it remedied is not to hatch a concerted conspiracy with a view to present an organised, threatening ultimatum to Government to allow them to have their way or court the consequences of their resignation in a body, but to resort to more becoming, more manly and less peevish means. . . The way in which some of the Civilians in Bihar are reported to have behaved seems to us to be a gross breach of discipline which Government ought not to tolerate. No Civil Service in the world enjoys the power that ours does; nor is any ever likely to do. So to grumble to maintain it, unimpaired for ever, not minding the limitations of decorum and discipline, is, to say the least, sheer impudence of which we can hardly think of any other Civil Service in the world capable."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

Anglo-Indians and the army.

5. In a leader under the heading 'Unjust and Dangerous," New India, of the 24th December, observes:—"The Anglo-Indian press has lent its support to the unreasonable, unjust and dangerous proposal that the Eurasian section of the Indian army shall be continued even in peace times. . . During the war, when recruits were badly required, they got a chance, and the Government of India, at an unfortunate moment, consented to place them on the same footing as British soldiers, thus perpetrating a great injustice to the fighting races of India and to the poor tax-payer. . . It is monstrous that the Eurasians should be treated on the same level as English soldiers. Even by law, they are included among statutory Indians; and even the most perverse of human beings will not venture to maintain that, as a fighting unit, they are to be compared with the Gurkha or the Pathan. Moreover, in the interests of good government and public decency, the authorities must use every means in their hand to convince the Eurasians that all their airs of superiority will no longer be tolerated."

JUSTICE, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

The Indian National Congress.

6. Justice, of the 31st December, says:—"It is impossible now to treat what is called the Indian National Congress with anything like seriousness. The extraordinary session of it held at Bombay sufficiently exposed itself to ridicule. But it was not quite so irresponsible as the one which the ancient city of Delhi has been witnessing for the past few days. . . With the election of Mrs. Besant as President, the Congress ceased to reflect sober and responsible Indian opinion; and since then its decline has been rapid."

JUSTICE, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The new year honours.

7. Justice, of the 2nd January, writes:—"In the distribution of titles the Government, it will be noted, has preserved the traditional practice, at any rate, so far as this Province is concerned, of reserving, as a rule, the higher honours for European ladies and gentlemen, official and non-official. . . Is there another in the Presidency who holds a higher position or whose merits and public services deserve better recognition than those of Mr. P. Tyagaraya Chetti, and yet he has been honored only with a Diwan Bahadurship, a title which was his due about a generation ago. . . A further instance of the lack of this sense is furnished in the honour bestowed on Professor Ramunni Menon of the Presidency College. A man of the highest attainments, one whom the Cambridge University delighted to honour, a distinguished educationist and a source of strength not merely to the profession to which he belongs but also to the Madras University of which he is a Fellow and a Syndic, Professor Ramunni Menon might in fairness have been spared the humiliation of being brought to the level of a reporter to an Anglo-Indian newspaper by being given the title of Rao Bahadur. . . Madras has not fared well in the distribution of even minor titles, and it would be hoping against hope that it would fare better on the next occasion."

The Indian Defence Force.

8. The following appears in the Hindu of the 2nd January :—"In presenting colours to the Indian Defence Force at Calcutta, His Excellency Lord Chelmsford is reported to have observed, according to a Calcutta message, that it had to be considered how best to modify the service in the Indian Defence Force to suit the needs of peace, 'subject to the paramount obligation that it is the bounden duty of everyone of British birth in this country to bear arms in its defence.' It is a most objectionable doctrine that His Excellency, if he has been rightly reported, has laid down in these words, a flagrant violation of the solemn pledges of equality of treatment made to India. . . The proposal is capable of being interpreted as an insult to those who are not of British birth, the sons of the soil, and as an unwarranted suspicion cast on their loyalty or on their capacity of undertaking the defence of the country which is primarily the task of those whose permanent and beloved home it is. It raises issues far more serious and far-reaching than volunteering and we have no doubt it will be examined carefully by the Indian public."

HINDU, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The Park Fair fire.

9. In a leader under the heading "Wanted a public inquiry," New India, of the 2nd January, observes:—"The Madras public have been shocked by the details of the horrible scene that occurred last night at the Park Fair. A few thatched sheds caught fire, and in the indescribable confusion and panic that followed, there was even loss of life. . . So stupefying are some of the stories that one demurs to publish them without complete verification, but we have no hesitation in saying that, bereft of all possible exaggeration, the bare facts themselves would unfold revelations of a most discreditable nature. . . We have here an instance of the most astounding autocratic way, and the public must take the necessary action to root out such forces from our national life. For this purpose, they must know the very individuals who encouraged the holding of the Fair in spite of the Corporation's protest, so that even if the British Rulers should fail to punish them, the relatives of the dead girl and of the seriously injured, or of the women and hildren who were robbed and roughly handled, may at least know whom to bless for their unique and benevolent protection. . . These are only some of the serious allegations which a public inquiry must thresh out. Of course, the autocrats responsible for the Fair will strive their level best to avoid such an investigation. At least now, we hope, they are conscious of their guilt. . . The Fair, we admit, is not an entirely official undertaking, but since high officials were connected with it, the Government cannot escape the blame, specially if the inquiry should be refused."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

Writing further on this subject in 'On the line' columns, New India, of the 2nd January, says :—"Several rumours reach us from people present at the disastrous Park Fair fire that His Excellency the Governor, after being informed of the fire, made some sort of a speech and then went off in his motor-car without waiting to see what would happen. . . We remember the wonderful heroism of the Duchesse d'Alencon in the Charity Bazaar fire at Paris many years ago, and we feel sure His Excellency would be equally true to the rule of his order—noblesse oblige. Still the people have to be convinced. We therefore think it would be expedient and gracious of Lord Pentland, if, by an official denial, he put an end once for all to the scandalous rumours that have attached themselves to him over yesterday's unfortunate affair."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

The Empire and the war.

10. Quoting an extract from a recent speech of His Majesty the King Emperor to the effect that the theory that the whole world can be governed by might has been exploded as a false one and that administrations should, in future, be based on justice and mutual fair-play between the different countries, the Desabhaktan, of the 23rd December, observes that these words are certain to be recorded in the pages of history, and adds that it is needless to point out that the British and other Governments should pay heed to this warning.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

The conditian of Indians in the colonies.

11. In a leader under this heading the Swadesamitran, of the 24th December, refers to the hardships suffered by the Sikhs in Canada by the rule which is said to have obtained there prohibiting their getting their wives and children from India and which is said to have been cancelled now, and to the fact that these Sikhs have been an ornament to the Indian army and that they came forward to sacrifice their body and soul to safeguard the interests of the Empire in the European war in spite of the pain the old restrictions in Canada should have naturally caused to them and, remarking that a large number of Indians have settled in South Africa, dwells upon their condition in the following strain :— As these Indians first went over there as labourers but subsequently took to trade and other pursuits. this created the envy of the Colonists and led to many restrictions being imposed on them. The first is that Indians desirous of carrying on trade there should obtain a licence for it, and the second is that it is often refused. The third restriction is that an appeal will lie in this matter only with regard to the legality or otherwise of the procedure and not about the facts. If, overthrowing all these obstacles, one tries to begin business, one is not able to do so in important places but has to choose a remote corner. No one can deny that the object of all these restrictions is only to prevent the trade of the Indians. Then again the title of the Indians to property is not recognised there and they have to register the properties purchased by them in the name of Europeans. What an anomaly is this? Even in railway travel there is a difference of treatment based on caste and colour. What is the harm done by the Indians to merit all these hardships? They have increased the fertility of the places in which they had settled and have thereby secured large profits to the Europeans there. As a reward for this they are afflicted in several ways. What will be the feelings of the Indians here when they think of this seriously? Will the other classes realise at least hereafter, that the Indians also belong to the human species? When will the day dawn when the Indians, as British subjects, will acquire equal rights and privileges throughout the Empire? As remarked by India, this is not possible as long as India continues a dependent country. So what is the remedy? We should obtain Swaraj like the colonies.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 18th Dec. 1918.

Freedom of the seas.

12. Referring to Mr. Roosevelt's interpretation of the phrase "freedom of the seas," the Andhrapatrika (weekly) of the 18th December, remarks:— . . . It is understood from a New York cable that Mr. Roosevelt has stated that England should have the strongest navy while the navy of the United States should occupy a second place and that there should be no freedom of the seas. But it must be said that the opinion expressed by Mr. Roosevelt does not show the way for the mitigation of the world scare. . .

Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, Madras, 18th Dec. 1918.

Britain and Turkey.

13. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 18th December, writes:—The participation of the Turkish Empire in the war against the greatest Mussalman power in the world was a source of grief and sorrow to the Muhammadans of India especially; therefore, the joy and delight of the community knew no bounds when they learnt that the old friendship between the British and the Turkish Governments had been re-established. To celebrate this happy issue His Exalted Highness the Nizam, the ruler of the premier Muslim State in India, granted a public holiday, gave two and a half lakhs to be distributed among the poor and needy, and commanded that thanks-giving services should be held throughout his dominions. The Turkish Empire itself is conscious of its error. The editor has a translation of the telegraphic report of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan's sentiment expressed to an interviewer.

14. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 27th December, writes :—Now that the dreadful European war has come to an end and the Allies have humbled Germany, and the greatest Islamic power in the world, Ottoman Empire, has re-established its relations with the Allies. There are, however, still some short-sighted people who doubt the veracity of these reports.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 27th Dec. 1918.

The final triumph.

Some do not hesitate to openly express their doubts in plain terms while others refrain from doing so, and consider they are acting with freedom not wishing people to think them sceptical. It is not, however, the practice of the wise to camonflage their thoughts, but rather to free them from all nebulosity.

Those people are aware that the war lasted for a very long period and this is the fifth year of the struggle and the chief reason they assign for doubting is this: If the allied forces had been more powerful, more skilled in war and stronger than the Germans the war would not have gone on for such a long time. On the contrary, they would have speedily subdued the Germans and this perplexing war would have ended much sooner. As the Allies were not able to defeat the Germans even after four and a half years' fighting, they think that the war is not yet over and the Allies have not conquered the Germans.

As regards the interference with the navigation between England and India, they believe that as the German destroyers are afloat and are destroying merchant vessels navigation has stopped.

People are also considering the question of the daily rise in the prices of rice and other grains and attribute the high rates for cloth to restriction on imports from England, and they assign the chief cause of such dearness solely to the reverses which the British forces are suffering.

After accepting such false deductions when people (generally simple-minded folk) read newspapers and hear that the British have defeated the Germans and their confederates, they are inclined to discredit the information and say we will never rely on the news, for the papers publish false reports under the orders of the Government.

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

(d) Education.

15. In commenting upon the proceedings of this conference the Lokopakari, of the 23rd December, observes :—Improvement of the vernaculars is possible only, if they are made compulsory subjects in the University examinations. They should have the support of the Government in a large measure. Our youths are learning the English language only for obtaining a living, and the vernaculars are neglected. On account of this, our youths deteriorate both in secular and religious habits and ruin themselves. The education imparted in colleges is devoid of all spirit or morals. Industrial, commercial and other scientific education, calculated to improve the economic resources is not given, nor instruction on patriotism and politics. The system of instruction obtaining in colleges is only such as befits one to slavish work.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

A conference of Tamil Pandits at Trichinopoly.

16. In its leading article on the medical inspection of schools, the Malayali, of the 21st December, referring to a recent order of the Madras Government on the subject, suggests that teachers should also be subjected to an annual medical examination for health certificates, that special medical officers should be appointed for conducting medical inspection of schools and if that be not possible, the medical officers who are now in charge of hospitals should be required to conduct such inspection regularly in the schools within their districts. It also suggests that the Travancore Government should also do the needful in this important matter.

MALAYALI, Quilon, 21st Dec. 1918.

Medical inspection of schools.

(e) Local and Municipal.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 20th Dec. 1918.

The control of local boards.

17. Commenting on the discussion at a meeting of the Malabar District Board regarding the establishment of an industrial school in the district, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 20th December, writes:—The tact displayed by the President of the District Board was quite in keeping with the methods of the bureaucracy. The President dropped the discussion on the subject before the meeting by raising the subject of agriculture. The Industries Commission is making suggestions on the one hand, and Presidents of District Boards like Mr. Evans begin to speak of local disabilities on the other. These are strange times, indeed. Incidents of this type cannot but produce a feeling of impatience among the people regarding the complete withdrawal of the powers of officials concerning the local boards. It is true that the Reform Scheme is likely to entrust this branch of the administration entirely to the people. Nevertheless we must observe that the sooner the Government do this, the better.

(h) Railways.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

Railway grievances.

18. Referring to the notification by the Railway Board that no improvement in transport facilities can be expected for some time more, as the Railway Companies in India have still some work to attend to, the Desabhaktan, of the 23rd December, remarks that, even before the war, the Indians had not received even half the facilities available from the railways and that those afforded, especially by the South Indian Railway Company, were very few and adds:—A little consideration of the condition of the railways will show that it is on account of our helplessness that the companies have been making immense profits. The Indians have not the least voice in the administration of railways and they have to put up with any changes introduced by the Railway Companies. These Companies act as they like. Their selection of candidates for employment is not based on the qualifications of these candidates. The salary paid to Indian clerks hardly suffices for their living. In some cases, many find it difficult to get above Rs. 25 even after a service of ten years. The companies have an eye only on their profits and do not care even for efficiency in work. The public should represent to the authorities that these companies should increase the transport facilities.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Dec. 1918.

The South Indian Railway.

19. Remarking that the authorities pay no attention to the hardships suffered by the people during their travel on this railway, the Desabhaktan, of the 27th December, observes:—The arrangements made by this Railway Company were very irksome to passengers even before the war and now it can be said that no convenience at all is afforded to passengers. When even passengers by the Ceylon boat mail are put to much hardship, there is no question about others. Sometimes 100 tickets are issued for this mail, while, at other times, even 20 tickets are not available. As most of the passengers to Madura and other places have to travel only by this train, their misery needs no description. The profits of this company are only increasing year by year. It is regrettable that, in spite of this, they should be so indifferent to the conveniences of the passengers. We hope the Government will interfere and do the needful.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

The Delhi Congress trip and the Home Rule train.

20. Under this heading a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th December, writes:—. . . Like a herd of sheep, the third-class passengers will be shoved into the third-class compartments. Nobody would care to see whether they sit or stand. It is condemnable that the authorities should not take steps to provide for their convenience, though they contribute a third of the income on railways. . .

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

21. The Desabhaktan, of the 24th December, expresses its approval of the opinion of the Abkari that this department should be a 'transferred' subject, under the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of administration, and that it can be reformed in such a manner as to suit the nature of the Indians, only if it is under the supervision of the popular representatives, and asks whether the Government will pay heed to this view.

The Abkāri Department.

(k) General.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 31st Oct. 1918.

22. Remarking that the responsibility for providing for the fiscal development of India has been left by the framers of the Montagu-Chelmsford report to an Imperial Conference to be convened after the conclusion of peace, the Vartakamitran, of the 31st October, observes:—The progress of a country depends more on its economic condition than its political privileges and it is not satisfactory on the part of those, who came forward to introduce reforms in view of the progress of India, to have evinced a lack of responsibility in not paying attention to the economic development of the country. No sincere man can deny that the demand of the Indians that they should retain in their own hands the control of the Indian finances is quite compatible with the responsibilities they have undertaken in this war. This demand is made only for the purpose of reviving many industries that have been ruined and safeguarding many industries, which are now in their infant stage, from being ruined by the foreign industries, which have become well rooted and which are protected by means of duties and rewards. This will foster the industries of India and improve her economic condition. If India is to become wealthy and, standing on her own legs, should prove to be the central pillar of the Empire, her fiscal control should be in the hands of the Indians. If, otherwise, India is judged from any other standpoint, she will have always to look to others for everything, and this will lead to foreigners availing themselves of all the facilities here. Eventually, the economic condition of India, instead of depending on England, will depend upon the whole world. Will England like it? While the framers of the reforms have been indifferent in this matter, some selfish Lords in England have started an Empire Resources Development Committee for the purpose of utilising the resources and men of the hotter parts of the Empire to improve the income of the Empire and the profits of private companies. Though they have announced that India is not within their purview, they do not seem to have excluded the raw products and labourers of India from their scope. There seems to be no difference between India and other parts of the Empire, except in the method, as far as the intention of the English capitalists to exploit the Empire is concerned. This is why the English capitalists and merchants try to prevent the control of the Indian finances passing into the hands of the Indians. If, therefore, the Governments in India and England yield to the devices of this committee, the responsibility they profess to have in connexion with the people of this country and their economic improvement should be deemed to be a false one. We may guage which way the wind blows, from the views expressed by Lord Islington in the Pall Mall Gazette. Though this Lord is taking an interest in the economic progress of India, he might have unwittingly been caught in the trammels of the Indo-British Association. Lord Islington says that it would be advantageous to India if matters connected with her trade and industries are in the hands of the Secretary of State for India, who is in a position to understand the trend of the commerce of the world. But we know from our own experience how much the industries and trade of India have been improved by men in England, having an experience of the trade and industries of the world, and how much we have been benefited by our association with Europeans. That is why it is urged that the Indians and the Government of India should have the right of handling the raw products of this country and supervising its industries. Though it is admitted by all that India should be represented in the Imperial Preference Committee, the Indians want that they should be allowed to represent their country, as the Secretary of State for India, though having an eye upon the progress of India, may have to act at times in view of the economic improvement of the British.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 14th Nov. 1918.

The report of the Indian Industries Commission.

23. Remarking that the dissenting minute of the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malavya to this report, though welcomed by every one having the interests of India at heart, has not satisfied the majority of the European merchants and Editors, the Vartakamitran, of the 14th November, observes:— The fact that this commission was asked to inquire about everything else but the question of export and import duties resembles a marriage being arranged without the bride. No one can deny that the support of the Government is necessary for the advancement of industries. But no one has bestowed any thought over what kind of support is required. We do not know what benefit the inquiry of this commission can result in, if it merely ascertains the places where industries can be started in India, the way in which particular industries have been carried on till now and the localities where particular articles are available, without inquiring about what obstacles are thrown in the way of the Indian industries by foreign imports and what measures can remove such obstacles. Thus the inquiry of this commission will be of no practical value.

The same paper continues its comments on this subject in its issue of the 21st November 1918 and refuting the observations made by the Madras Mail in criticising the remarks of the Honourable Pandit in his dissenting minute, says:— The Mail compares the statement of Mr. Brooks Adams, quoted by the Pandit, that an enormous amount of money was taken from India to England after the battle of Plassey to the plunder of Delhi by Nadar Shah. But Nadar Shaw plundered Delhi with the object of plundering and not for the purpose of conquering the country or introducing here the trade of his country, which was not the case with the East India Company. The aim of the English rule has been to improve English trade in India and take the raw products of India to England. We would compare the analogy drawn by the Mail to the action of one in taking a cup of water from a big pot and being content with that and of another boring a small hole below the pot and draining it gradually. The condition of India within the last 150 years has been similar to that of the water in the pot.

Probationary Deputy Tahsildars.

24. Referring to the nomination of nine persons for the posts of probationary Deputy Tahsildars this year, the Dravidan, of the 20th December, wonders at the remark of the selection committee that they did not attach any consideration to caste, class or language in making this selection and observes:— We have been repeatedly pointing out that, for the progress of the non-Brahmans, they should be granted communal representation in all offices and associations and that it is not fair for the Government to grant all privileges to other communities. We very much regret that, while it is the duty of the Government, who are interested in the progress of the country, to improve the condition of the backward classes, they are neglecting this duty. Let the Government understand that this is not the time for conferring Government appointments on persons, irrespective of class, caste or language, and that, if no attention is paid to this, India will have to occupy a very low position in these days, when all the countries of the world are acquiring liberty. We wish the Government publish promptly the particular class, caste and language of the different nominees for the posts of Deputy Tahsildars this year. It is wrong on the part of the Government to hold that only people with higher educational qualifications should be chosen. The knowledge that is generally required for the post should be deemed to be sufficient qualification. Whatever higher examinations the progressive classes may have passed above this, they should not be given appointments on this account, as it will make it impossible for the other classes to make any speedy progress. We hope the Madras Government will consider over this matter and take proper steps.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 20th Dec. 1918.

Petrol.

25. Reporting that petrol is still selling at the same rate, at which it was sold during the period of the war, on account of its supply to the public having been restricted by the Imperial Government so as to meet the demands of the war, the Dravidan, of the 20th December, says that there is no justification for it, seeing that the war has stopped and the Government have recently cancelled the restrictions they had imposed and hopes that the Government will also cancel the new duties that were levied on this commodity and thereby bring about a great reduction in its price.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 21st Dec. 1918.

The moderates and the reforms.

26. Referring to a letter addressed by Doctor Clarke, the President of the British Congress Committee in London, to Sir D. E. Wacha, finding fault with the moderates for having seceded from the Special Congress, the Swadesamitran, of the 21st December, says:—After crying for certain privileges for the people for the last 35 years, how can the country be benefited by keeping quiet, when the bureaucracy contemplate the withdrawal of even the existing privileges? The authorities have already begun to embody the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee in a Bill. Will the moderates come forward to help the Congress in safeguarding our privileges now? Judging of the situation in England as described by Doctor Clarke, we can be sure that the Parliament will not agree to this legislation, if we stand united. Doctor Clarke says that the new Parliament will represent two crores of voters and will such a Parliament agree to the essential privileges of the people of India being wrested from them? It is quite natural for the British, who acquired their independence by struggling for it with kings, who exercised absolute sway, should sympathise with us in our struggle with a class of officials wielding absolute powers. So, if we act with the necessary precautions, we can see that the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee are not adopted and also that the resolutions of the Special Congress are approved. It is only the opinion expressed by Doctor Clarke, that it is vain to talk of accepting or rejecting the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals until they are scrutinised by a Committee, constituted for the purpose, that the nationalists have also been voicing forth. We have no power either to accept or to reject these proposals. That power rests with the British voters. We shall represent our case in full and leave it to these voters to act as they think just.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 21st Dec. 1918.

House accommodation.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Dec. 1918.

The condition of Home Rulers.

28. In a leader under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 21st December, remarks that Indian patriots are considered to be rioters by the bureaucrats, the Anglo-Indians and the traitors to the country that help them, and observes:—Whatever work is started by the Home Rulers, the Anglo-Indian papers misrepresent matters and create mischief, and this is done by them purposely with the object of creating a bad impression on the bureaucrats and the British public about the Home Rulers. These papers are repeatedly stating that the labour movement has been organised by the Home Rulers and we learn that attempts are being secretly made by some capitalists to block this movement. If labourers get their grievances redressed in a particular locality, the labourers in other places also will endeavour to get their grievances redressed, which may lead to the Government appointing a committee of inquiry. This committee may issue a report like that of the Rowlatt Committee, basing their opinions on the false statements of the Anglo-Indian papers, and it will stand as an authority for the Government. By adopting this system, the Government fail to understand the truth about many things in India and eventually suspect the Home Rulers to be rioters. What is to be done for this?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Dec. 1918.

The Viceroy and the Congress.

29. Observing that, according to the tour programme of His Excellency the Viceroy, he will not return to Delhi before the beginning of January next, the Desabhaktan, of the 21st December, asks whether he wants to be away because the Congress meets there and says:—Last year both the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India were at Bombay when the Congress met at Calcutta. Why should the Viceroy avoid the place where the Congress meets?

SWADESAMITRAN Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

The Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms.

30. Adverting to a circular addressed by one Mr. Millne of Bihar to the Civil Servants stating that the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform proposals are highly prejudicial to the interests of the Civil Servants and that it is necessary for all of them to make a joint protest, the Swadesamitran, of the 23rd December, says:—While carrying out reforms for the welfare of India, even granting that the interests of the Civil Service actually suffer, which is of greater importance,—the welfare of India or that of the Civil Service? No other evidence is needed to show that they are selfish. It is quite natural for these, that have been till now wielding unlimited powers, to be disinclined to surrender them.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 27th Dec. 1918.

Montagu-Chelmsford report.

Adverting to the fact that an interpellation by an Honourable Member at a recent meeting of the Madras Legislative Council disclosed that the Madras Ati Dravida Jana Sabha was one of the associations invited to offer an opinion on this report, and to a copy of the original letter of invitation alleged to have been sent to this Sabha which has now been forwarded to its Secretary, the Dravidan, of the 27th December, observes:—It passes our comprehension how the first letter sent by the Government did not reach the Sabha. Do not the Government satisfy themselves whether communications sent by them reach the addresees or not? It is not known whether, in this case, it was due to the wantonness or carelessness of the officials. We trust that the Government will publish without delay the details of the inquiry instituted by them in this matter.

Referring then to the opinion furnished by this Sabha on the reform proposals, the paper observes:—The Sabha's objection to entrust education to the 'ministers' as suggested in these proposals is noteworthy. Even now the Government are not attentive to the interests of the depressed classes and seek the welfare of only a few that agitate. The establishment of the Brahman widows' home is an instance of this. It is not at all fair that public funds should be spent on the education of the Brahman widows without being utilized for that of the helpless depressed classes. The observations of the Sabha as regards sanitation are quite true. We trust that the Government will pay special attention to the fact that while all the other communities are agitating for political privileges, this community is complaining of want of a good water-supply, absence of lights in streets occupied by them and insanitary surroundings. If the Government are really interested in uplifting the non-Brahman community, who form the bulk of the population and who are in a very backward condition, the only way is to give them communal representation. We will assert that, without communal representation, any reform will prove quite useless and hamper the progress of the country.

Release of political prisoners.

31. Referring to the reply given by the Government, to a question asked in the House of Commons about the steps proposed to be taken to release political prisoners on account of the close of the war, that the matter is under consideration, the Swadesamitran, of the 23rd December, observes:—While the question of releasing political prisoners is under contemplation even in England, it is regrettable that the Government here have not made any arrangements for the release of such prisoners, excepting a few who were let off in Rangoon and Colombo by the respective Provincial Governments, in spite of the entreaties of the public. It is admitted on all hands that anarchical deeds are committed in India only by a few eccentric people and that they are not at all countenanced by the public. So there is little doubt that the Government will be increasing the love of the people for, and confidence in, them by evincing a liberal spirit and releasing the political prisoners.

32. Remarking that the decision of the Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastriyar, who is hostile to the Congress-League scheme of reforms, to attend the Congress at Delhi, is not above suspicion, as Mr. Sastri is always interested in furthering the bureaucratic system of Government, the Desabhaktan, of the 23rd December, asks the Delhi Congress to abandon the resolution of the Special Congress, as it is neither the Congress-League proposals, made before the war, nor the resolution of the Special Congress, made during the progress of the war, but complete Home Rule that the Indians want and remarks:—The future of India depends on the results of the Peace Conference. As President Wilson has stated that America entered into the war, not on account of its hatred against Germany, but for securing the liberty of the world, India may perhaps be granted complete liberty. So it will be stupid on our part to decide ourselves to curtail our liberty. Let us demand complete Home Rule and leave it to the Conference to decide it in any way it likes. By our demanding only a few reforms, we will be disgracing those who wish to advocate the grant of complete liberty to us in the Conference. There may be some philanthropists who may like to expouse our cause and why should we gag them? The Delhi Congress should not prove faithless to Mother Bharata, because the unexpected moderates attend this session. The world will undergo a mighty change on account of the war. The European war has brought to the world a civilisation, which, in the usual course, should have dawned only 200 years later. So it is incumbent on us to attempt to acquire now that liberty which will be our due 100 years hence. This will be true manliness.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

The Desabhaktan, of the 23rd December, reproduces in Tamil a telegram sent by Mrs. Annie Besant from Delhi communicating the public indignation aroused by the order prohibiting the route of the procession of the President of the Congress. This telegram appears in New India of the same date.

The ensuing Congress at Delhi.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

The Swadesamitran, of the 24th December, characterises the action of the authorities at Delhi as a reminder to the people of the existence of the police and the fact that they frequently lose their head and act highhandedly, and remarks: Would the skies have come down if Mr. Malaviya had been taken by the route arranged by the Reception Committee? Those conducting the Congress have as much responsibility in this matter as the police. While so we do not know why the police should act in a crooked way.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

The Desabhaktan, of the 26th December, is surprised at the action of the authorities in Delhi and remarks:—We fail to understand how it will belittle the prestige of the bureaucracy in any way, if the procession of the Congress President should pass through the main streets of the city.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

33. The Lokopakari, of the 23rd December, observes:—Though the war has stopped, the hardships consequent on the rise of prices continue and there seems to be no chance of their removal in the near future. The people are saying that it is only the expenses connected with the officials appointed to control the foodstuffs that have gone high, without any corresponding benefit. We are of opinion that, if patriotic people, with practical experience of life, had been appointed for this work, much benefit would have resulted therefrom.

The food situation.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

Referring to the precautionary measures taken by the Government of Bombay realizing that famine has broken out in that Presidency and also to the starting of Government depots for the sale of food-grains and cloths to the poor in Bengal, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th December, observes:—We have often pointed out the arrangements made in connexion with foodstuffs in Native States such as Mysore and Travancore which are not under the administration of the Indian Civil Service officers. The public are too well aware of the arrangements made by the Government of Madras for relieving the hardships of the poor, caused by the scarcity of foodstuffs and the high prices of cloth. Though it is the opinion of many, that this Government had not the required ability or facility to relieve the sufferings of the poor and understand the real attitude of the public, we affirm that they are endowed with the capacity of attributing all unrest and dissensions caused by the economic situation to political agitators. We trust that the Government of Madras will note what arrangements have been made by the Native States and other provinces in connexion with foodstuffs.

The food situation.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

The next meeting of the Viceroy's Legislative Council.

34. Referring to the announcement of the Government of India, that no resolution brought forward by the Honourable Members, except those relating to the budget, will be considered at the next meeting of this Council, as much time would be required in connexion with the reform proposals and for the consideration of many important matters that have cropped up as a result of the close of the war, the Desabhaktan, of the 23rd December, observes:—While we concede the importance of the matters referred to by the Government, it does not appear to us to be fair to plead want of time to consider the resolutions relating to the welfare of the public, brought forward by the non-official members. If necessary, the interpellations of members may be disallowed; but it is not just to deprive the members of their privileges. Every year, meetings of this Council are very few, while many are the public questions that are to be considered. It is not too much to ask whether the Government have realised the importance of these matters. Further, we hold that the Honourable Members are entitled to consider the very questions which the Government of India propose to consider. The Report of the Reforms Committees may be published before the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council. The Government of India cannot deny the right of the Honourable Members to discuss this report in the Council. Then again there are many important subjects on which the Honourable Members have to move resolutions, as for example the recommendations of the Industries Commission. Have not these to be discussed in Council, before they are adopted and do not the Government consider them to be important? Then there are numerous repressive laws like the Defence of India Act, and it is stated that it is under consideration to introduce new repressive measures. Is it not necessary to afford opportunities for the popular representatives to ascertain the views of the Government on these points? It is wrong on the part of the Government of India to say that these are not matters concerning public welfare. The Government should note that it is not sound statesmanship to refuse permission to discuss matters relating to the welfare of the Indians at a time, when such matters have necessarily to be discussed. The Government have been conducting the administration all along, without understanding the attitude of the Indians. What more can we say than that it will not do for the Government of India to carry on the administration on the old lines? We trust that they will recognise the erroneous nature of their decision and reconsider it.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

Registration of births and deaths.

35. The Dravidan, of the 24th December, publishes in Tamil the substance of the comments of Justice of the 21st idem under this heading.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

The Muhammadans and the principle of self-determination.

36. Expressing its approval of the resolutions passed at the annual meeting of the Madras Presidency Moslem League that the British should again be friendly with the Sultan of Turkey and that a separate Muhammadan representative should be sent to the Peace Conference, the Desabhaktan, of the 24th December, observes:—Their main request is that Turkey, the greatest of all the Muhammadan kingdoms in the world, should be saved from ruin. England and Turkey should be on friendly terms in the interests of both, for the European powers are waiting for an opportunity to devour Turkey and, if any Power should capture Turkey, it will prove harmful to England itself. Then again as there are thousands of Moslem subjects in the British administration, the Britishers have to be friendly with Turkey in order to please these. The reason why the Madras Moslem League wants that, though Armenia and other countries wish to have Home Rule, no other country should be empowered to supervise their administration, is that an alien administration of a country gradually leads to many difficulties. The request of the League that a Moslem representative should be present at the Peace Conference may be taken to have been already granted by the Government by the nomination of the Right Hon'ble Mr. Amir Ali to be one of the representatives of the British in the Conference. Mr. Amir Ali was a faithful representative of the Moslems till he was appointed to the Privy Council; but his enthusiasm waned after this appointment, though he has on many occasions come forward to help the Moslems. If persons with better experience had been selected it would have been more beneficial to the Moslems in India. If the British had not nominated Mr. Amir Ali as a Moslem representative, we request that another representative may be selected without delay.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 26th December, also comments in the same strain on the resolutions of the Madras Moslem League, with this difference that it takes it that the nomination of the Right Hon'ble Mr. Amir Ali has been made by the Government only to secure Muhammadan representation in the Peace Conference. This paper adds one more ground to the necessity of friendly relations between England and Turkey, viz., that it ensures a safe passage from Europe to Asia, in that the easiest route adjoins Turkey.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

Influenza.

37. The Swadesamitran, of the 24th December, refers to the estimate of one that this fell disease has claimed roughly about 70 lakhs of people in India till now and remarking that the loss sustained by this country on account of this appalling death-rate can be clearly gauged by intelligent people, asks what precautionary measures the Government intend adopting in this matter hereafer.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

Popular responsibility in India.

38. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 24th December, observes:—During the last 160 years of British administration in India, popular responsibility has only been going down day by day. It is no doubt the opinion of the British that the administration should be conducted in accordance with the wishes of the people; but the bureaucrats in India have always been acting against this opinion. During these 160 years a number of laws have been passed which are calculated to hamper the liberty of man. Though the bureaucrats refrained from resorting to repressive measures in the beginning, they have gradually gone in for such measures without any limit. The cruelty of the bureaucrats in India has increased since the time of Lord Curzon. It has become an ordinary matter to keep one in custody without any inquiry. The bureaucrats will never consent to rule the country in accordance with the popular wishes and numerous instances can be quoted to prove this. One is the opening of the Park Fair by His Excellency quite against the unanimous protest of the Corporation with a European President and at a time when the people are suffering from poverty, famine and pestilence. We very much regret that the bureaucrats should act without realising the importance of popular responsibility even when a huge war has been waged for the very purpose. The action of the bureaucrats at Delhi in having prohibited the route of the procession of the Congress President is another instance. We very much feel for the action of the Reception Committee in having stopped the procession, without resorting to passive resistance and sticking to the route originally proposed by them.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

The Ali brothers.

39. Appreciating the action of the authorities in having allowed the brothers Muhammad Ali and Shukat Ali, at least after there have been many deaths in their family, to proceed to Rampur, the Desabhaktan, of the 24th December, prays that the Government will cease to afflict them hereafter and allow them to reside in Rampur alone.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 25th December, also echoes the same view.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

The Desabhaktan, of the 26th December, reverts to this subject and observes:—We hope the Government will not send these brothers again to Chindwara. They have been sufficiently long in custody. The war has closed and every one is immersed in pleasure. So it is not fair to keep these brothers in solitude any longer. We hope that they will be set at liberty soon.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

Muhammad Ali and Shaukat Ali.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd December, publishes in Telugu a letter from Mr. O. B. Gati, describing the reverses that have befallen the interned brothers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

40. The following are extracts from a contribution under this heading by a correspondent to the Desabhaktan of the 24th December :—O son of Bharata ! Many tumble at the very mention of the word Swaraj. Swaraj is the abode of happiness, a foundation to social progress, an aid to attain one's object and a means of reaching the heavenly goal. Are they not eunuchs who get perturbed at the mere mention of this word ? Dear child ! The virtuous people, who raise the noble cry of Swaraj, will be surrounded on all sides by a wretched class of people who may cause endless trouble. It is essential to work with a definite end in view without caring for the series of troubles thus caused. Though the whole world may get confused, walk about with a resolute mind. By the superiority of your soul force, you are sure to attain your object. . . Is there in existence now an excellent administration conducted on the lines laid down in the Vedas ? No. This is the cause of your emasculation, the waning of your intelligence and a fall in your character. . . This is the reason for the poverty of your community, for its suffering from famine and pestilence, and for its having lost all strength and relying upon others for everything.

The preachings of mother Bharata.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

The correspondent continues this article in the Desabhaktan of the 25th December, in which the following sentiments find place :—O child ! The administration now obtaining is one carried on by an unsympathetic and irresponsible foreign bureaucracy. The sons of India suffer in a crippled condition. If the administration of India had not been brought under these bureaucrats, the children of your mother Bharata would not have been reduced to such a sorry plight. As a result of their selfish rule, the very traces of the excellent industrialists, able artists, heroic warriors, pandits and experts of your country have all disappeared. This is why the people of India have lost all living, and indigenous trade, industry and agriculture have perished. The liberty of the Indian born, bred up and residing in India has become the property of another. Having lost his liberty, he had to forego his fraternity and equality. . . The bureaucrats have come into existence only for the benefit of the people but not the latter for the benefit of the former. The authority of the bureaucrat can never result in good to the people. To endeavour to do away with this is neither disloyalty nor treason to the country. It is loyalty of the noblest type.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

41. The Desabhaktan, of the 25th December, takes exception to the Government of India having granted, in view of the large demand for soldiers in the war, an equal status to the Eurasians in the army with the British soldiers and remarks :—By this act the Government have insulted the Indian soldiers and tax-payers and yet the Indians did not demur to this, considering this to be a war measure. Now the Anglo-Indian papers want that the Eurasians should be continued in service even in times of peace. Will the Indians consent to this ? Can the Eurasians equal the Pathan or the Ghurka soldiers ? How can they equal the British soldiers ? On the day the Moore Market was set on fire, it was the Eurasian soldiers that were on guard at the place. Who could have been the cause of the fire without their knowledge ? Who can tolerate the proposal to grant to such irresponsible soldiers the rank of a British soldier ?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

42. Adverting to the fact that the Civil Servants in Behar and Orissa have formed an association for safeguarding the interests of this class, the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th December, presumes that similar associations of Civil Servants may have been secretly formed in other Provinces also and referring to the decision of the association in Behar to protest against the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms observes :—The Civil Servants apprehend that the proposal to increase the powers of the people according to the Reforms Scheme should necessarily curtail theirs, and will be a humiliation to them who were till now the uncrowned kings in their respective jurisdictions. If the people should participate in administrative matters, it necessarily follows that there should be a corresponding curtailment of the powers of the Civil Servants. Every one may be willing to wield unlimited powers for ever ; but will the subjects relish the idea to be under this kind of subjection for all time to come ? According to the covenant entered into by these Civil Servants at the time of their appointment, they are not permitted to make such a joint representation as is said to be contemplated now. So we hope the Government will lose no time to advise them not to do so. Can the very officers appointed to carry out the wishes of the Government think of condemning those wishes? The Government should point out that their duty is only to obey but not to criticise. Further, it is rather curious that they should intimidate the Government by saying that they will resign their posts if their wishes are not granted. We are compelled to remark that they are acting against rules here.

The Indian Civil Service.

The Censors.

43. Expressing its wonder at the delay in the message of His Majesty the King Emperor to his subjects reaching India, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th December, observes:—It is well known that Censors have been appointed for examining telegraphic and postal communications from foreign countries. When the war has ended, the work of these officers has also come to an end. Perhaps they wish to show before getting out of office that even His Majesty is subject to their authority. How long will they continue to hold office like this?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

The Hindu-Moslem entente.

44. Approving of the suggestion made by the Secretary of the All-India Hindu Association that the Congress and the Moslem League should appoint a joint commission to devise means for preventing the rupture that frequently occurs between the Hindus and the Muhammadans during the Bakr-id and other festivities, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th December, observes:—The Anglo-Indian Press and the bureaucrats make much of the slight disturbances on trivial matters that occur between some ignorant Hindus and Muhammadans and give out to the world that there is a lack of unity between these two communities. Many say that some of the riots between the Hindus and the Muhammadans had the support of the bureaucrats, and to quote an instance it is stated that the riot in Arra in Behar was caused by a bureaucrat. Every one knows that of late the affinity between the Hindus and the Muhammadans is getting stronger. In spite of this the Anglo-Indians are proclaiming, quite against their conscience, that the differences between these two communities will never disappear. It is our ardent desire that the Hindus and the Muhammadans should so conduct themselves as not to give room for such silly remarks.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

Sir Sankaran Nayar.

45. Anent the statement made by a correspondent in the Searchlight that there is a rumour that Sir Sankaran Nayar proposes to resign his post shortly, the Swadesamitran, of the 25th December, observes:—When in the ordinary course he has to continue in office for two years more, who is responsible for his resigning it within that period? Unless the situation has become unbearable and detestable, there is no reason for his doing so. Who has brought about such a situation? We need not say that, though he is not supported in the Executive Council, he has the support of the 35 crores of the Indian population. The Searchlight has rightly asked the authorities concerned to bestow a thought over how the people will take such a resignation. Were not the bureaucrats aware of Sir Sankaran Nayar's nature at the time he was appointed Member of the Executive Council? Lord Chelmsford is well fitted to gauge beforehand the effects of his resignation. So we hope that he will try to see that no untoward events occur.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

Cheap supply of clothing.

46. Appreciating the action of the Government of Behar in having purchased plenty of clothing and arranged to sell it to the poor at rates reduced by 20 to 50 per cent of the market price, the Swadesamitran, of the 25th December, observes:—In our Province also people are suffering from want of clothing. Why should not our Government act similarly? What is feasible in the other Government cannot but be so here also. Where there is a will there is a way.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 25th Dec. 1918.

A sane advice.

47. Referring to a recent speech of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, an Irish member of the House of Commons, in which he is reported to have stated that a country, whether big or small, should be given complete liberty to form her own government, that, even in internal administration, a community should not be subjected to an irresponsible form of

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

Government against its wishes, that for removing the prevailing discontent and unrest in Ireland, she should he granted Home Rule without delay, and that the best medicine for discontent and unrest is self-determination, the Desabhaktan, of the 26th December, asks whether the British will pay heed to these words and adds:—It is our opinion that the medicine suggested by Mr. O'Connor will apply equally to India. Day by day discontent and unrest are gradually taking root here on account of the mean acts of the bureaucrats. Without knowing the remedy for this, the British Government are doing all manner of things. India is suffering from the very same ailment which is troubling Ireland. We wish the Government to note that the remedy suggested by O'Connor for Ireland is applicable to India also.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

The Publicity Boards.

48. Referring to the opinion for and against the retention of these Boards after the close of the war, the Dravidan, of the 26th December, observes:—It is needless for us to say that such Boards will do a lot of good to the general public. They can, by means of the issue of bulletins now and again, acquaint the people with sanitary rules, and matters relating to the improvement of agriculture and industry. No final orders appear to have been passed in regard to these Boards. We urge that these should continue to work though not in the present form.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

The Park Fair.

49. The Hindu Nesan, of the 26th December, is not satisfied with the explanation given by His Excellency for running the Fair this year against the opinion of the public and the Corporation and observes:—There is no room to say that plague has not spread in the city. Two new cases have occurred in the neighbourhood of Kuppam. The death-rate in the city is increasing owing to other causes as well and the strain caused by high prices. His Excellency said that one with great experience told him that the Fair could be held. No one knows who this experienced person is. What was such a person doing all these days when the people were undergoing sufferings?

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

The Dravidan, of the 26th December, however, thinks that the speech of His Excellency on the occasion of the opening of the Park Fair is a proper reply to all those who were not in favour of this Fair and remarks that, if the Fair had been stopped this year, it would have created much disappointment as many persons were expecting special festivities this time.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

The Park Fair and the public health.

Referring to the holding of the Park Fair this year by the Committee in spite of the resolution of the Corporation to the contrary, the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd December, remarks:— . . . This is a matter connected with the life and death of the people. Even under such circumstances, popular opinion counts for nothing. This one fact will suffice to show the value attached to popular opinion in India. This matter reminds one of the incidents that Nero was dancing while Rome was on fire. . . The Committee cannot give up the Park Fair, however, seriously the health of the public may be affected thereby.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 19th Dec. 1918.

The Park Fair.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 19th December, refers approvingly to the resolution of the Madras Corporation against the celebration of the Park Fair this year, and recommends to the authorities the closing of the Cinema and the Dramatic theatres also for some time.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 21st Dec. 1918.

The Park Fair.

Referring to the decision to celebrate the Park Fair this year in spite of the Madras Corporation's resolution, the Andhraprakasika, of the 21st December, observes:—. . . If it be true that His Excellency the Governor has issued an order to celebrate the Park Fair, it can be said without doubt that he has not carefully considered the popular opinion and the interests of public health. We say beyond all fear of contradiction that in view of the prevalence of plague, cholera and smallpox in the city, the celebration of the Park Fair is very undesirable. If His Excellency has erred in the matter as reported above, he will do well to rescind his order. . .

The Park Fair.

Referring to the celebration of the Park Fair, the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th December, says:— . . . In opening the Fair, the Governor said that there was no room for any more plague scare. But Doctor Raghavendra Rao, the Health Officer, reports that it has not yet subsided. It need hardly be said that it is quite improper on the part of the committee to hold the Fair under these circumstances setting at nought the resolution of the Corporation in disregard of public health.

The Reforms Committees.

51. Adverting to the appointment of four additional members to advise these committees on matters connected with the Government of India, two of whom are Indian Civil Service men, while the other two are Indians, the Desabhaktan, of the 27th December, refers specially to the latter and observes:—It is not apparent what knowledge these two gentlemen have about the Government of India. We ask whether Mr. Shaffi was the only one available, if the Government wanted to have a Moslem representative to advise the committees. Many say that the views of Mr. Pattani will not agree with those seeking the progress of India. We need not say what will be the attitude of the other two Indian Civil Service officers. We are at a loss to know how the nominees of the Government of India are better than those of the Government of Madras.

The India Council and Indian money.

52. Remarking that the India Council in London is controlling the expenditure of a large portion of the revenues of India, in that they purchase in England all the articles needed by the Government of India and lend the balance of money in their hands to the companies there for interest, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th December, cites figure for 1917-18 under this head to be £146,703,318 and observes:—Need we point out that, though they handle such a large amount of Indian money, the Indians have not a shred of power or influence in that connexion? The amount of interest, that accrued last year from the sums lent by them for interest there, comes up to £225,000, and the amount of the capital lent out can be guessed from this. They have lent this amount only at easy rates of interest, while in India both the Government and the Companies have to pay heavy rates of interest for raising loans. So, unless the Indians gain sufficient influence and voice in the matter of spending the amounts now handled by the India Council, the former can never be satisfied with the situation.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Dec. 1918.

The ravings of the Englishman.

53. Referring to the argument of the Englishman that the Indians are not fit for Home Rule, judged from the fiasco in which the meeting held at Bombay in connexion with a memorial to Lord Willingdon terminated, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th December, observes:—As remarked in the Bengalee is it not usual in England, when party feeling runs high in meetings, for eggs and soda bottles to be thrown at each other? What reply has the Englishman to say to this?

It used to be stated that in 1899, when Mr. Lloyd George, the present prime minister of England, was making a speech in a meeting at Manchester ,expressing certain views opposed to popular opinion, the audience became impatient and attempted to sack him and that he had to save himself by getting out in the guise of a policeman. Did anybody pronounce then that the Englishman who caused such a terror to Mr. Lloyd George were unfit for Home Rule? Has the Englishman forgotton that even prior to that time the English were not only enjoying Home Rule but were also holding sway over many other countries?

Landowners and the reforms.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 20th Dec. 1918.

Imperial progress and Indian industries.

55. The Vartakamitran, of the 21st November, says that one of the results of this war is to disclose to the world the extent to which raw products and manufactured articles were supplied by the different countries before the war and to make each country strive to manufacture within itself the articles required by it and adds:—The cry of the Indians about the poverty of their country and about thousands of them dying of starvation was, before the war, deemed by the European countries and especially by England, to be a lie, for the latter was not acquainted with the way in which India was being governed. As England advanced in her industries, there was a reduction in the quantity of foodstuffs produced there and this necessitated her bringing in foodstuffs from elsewhere. This again explains the reason for the formation of the Empire Resources Development Committee. Of all the countries in the empire, India is the most extensive and as her raw products are required by all the countries, they want that India should continue always to be an agricultural country. England was depending for long on her Colonies for the foodstuffs required by her. But ever since the United States of America attained liberty, all the Colonies had to be allowed to take care of their own advancement by means of protective provisions. Therefore, both England and the Colonies have had to rely upon India and Egypt for raw products. We do not object to our country being a purely agricultural one. But steps should be taken to increase the foodstuffs produced by her. The Indians consider every non-Indian to be a foreigner, whether he be within or outside the British Empire. So it is quite natural for them to ask why they should help foreigners, when they are suffering from starvation. Therefore, if England wishes to keep India always as an agricultural country, both general and agricultural education should be made compulsory for the Indians. The Government should also regulate assessment, etc., in such a manner as to provide a sufficient supply of provisions for the Indians and render adequate pecuniary assistance for improving agriculture. There is no use of making much of their having started co-operative credit societies and granting loans to agriculturists, nor is it proper to remark that the agriculturists are not taking advantage of these things. When the Indians demand political privileges, it is stated that they are still children in politics and that they cannot be granted any until they become fit for them. How can these children be expected to understand the value of these concessions of their own accord? In addition to starting societies to help the people, associations should be formed in every village to instruct the agriculturists on progressive methods. Waste lands should be reclaimed and agriculture improved thereby. Unless the Government take an active interest in this matter, other methods will not be of any use. In brief, unless education and agricultural improvement are fostered side by side, not only will there be a dearth of foodstuffs in India, but it will also injure the industrial advancement of England. We do not mean by this that India should not progress in industries. Of course, our object is that, while some classes in India are engaged in improving agriculture, others should devote their attention to industries, so that India can soon become self-contained and cease to rely upon others for anything. But the question is whether England and the British Empire will allow India at this juncture to manufacture everything she wants and that with love and sincerity.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 21st Nov. 1918.

The session of the Congress at Delhi.

56. The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan publish in Tamil in their issues of the 26th and the 27th December the addresses of the Chairman of the Reception Committee and the President of this Congress, while the Hindu Nesan and the Dravidan, of the 27th, 28th and 30th idem, publish the presidential address serially in bits to be continued. The Hindu Nesan, of the 27th idem, also contains an abstract of the address of the Chairman of the Reception Committee.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

The Delhi Congress.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 26th December, publishes in Telugu the speech of the Chairman of the Reception Committee and in the course of its comment thereon observes:—

. . . This address is pregnant with thought. . . When the power of self-determination is being granted even to the very small nations of Europe, the Chairman asks why it should not be accorded to India which has sacrificed its all in the great war for the sake of liberty. . . As even the changes proposed in the Scheme of Reforms are likely to be rendered ineffectual by the creation of the Council of State, he said that it would be highly desirable to introduce self-government in the Government of India also just now and transfer the Government Departments to the Indians. . . There will be immense joy among the people, if the Government release the political internees, and annul the Press Act and the Defence of India Act as has been suggested by him.

The National Congress.

With reference to the Delhi Congress, the Kistnapatrika, of the 28th December, says:—. . . Mr. Muhammad Ajmal Khan, the Chairman of the Reception Committee, has put the following question from the platform: "When this principle of self-determination is going to be applied even to the smallest nations of Europe, why will it not apply to India which has rendered every help in the war and sacrificed her blood and money for the cause of freedom and justice?" Really it is neither Mr. Ajmal Khan nor India that puts this question. It is the very deities who are watching the course of the world's evolution with their ever-vigilant eyes that are asking this question. The voice of history is inviolable. We may be deaf and may not heed that voice. But how long? The more we resist it, the more will it roar like the deep thunder of the clouds. Should we not heed it even then? The cloud that has thundered is not going to end in nothing. . .

No. 99 published in the Fort St. George Gazette, dated 7th November 1918, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 17th December, writes that ryots will have to face endless difficulties, if the Government do not allay the strong discontent among them by cancelling orders Nos. 345 and 99.

60. Under this heading a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 17th December, prays that the Government may be pleased to protect the rights of archakas (temple priests) who look to them as their guardians, and save them from suits for enforcing schemes for the management of temple endowments.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 17th Dec. 1918.

The second Ayurvedic Conference at Cocanada.

61. The Andhrapatrika, of the 16th December, publishes in Telugu the speech of the President of the Second Ayurvedic Conference held at Cocanada, which contains observations such as—. . . Such a great authority on western medicine as Sir P. D. Lukis has said that Ayurveda is in keeping with scientific principles, that the western medical science is still ignorant of some truths found by Aryans in the past and that the western physicians do not know even the fact that common salt is bad for dropsy patients. It is very regrettable in these circumstances the Government should speak lightly of Ayurveda being only a catalogue of medicines and not a science. . . While the majority of the people enjoy the benefits of the Ayurvedic system of medicine and are crying loudly for that treatment only, it is highly regrettable that the Government should prohibit the utilisation of the money paid by them for the improvement of that system. . . The Government have said that the appointment of Doctor Koman for the study of the Ayurvedic system is only to add to the English Pharmacopœia such drugs as may be found effective in that system and not to improve it. . . From the appointment of a person versed only in the western system, it may be inferred that the Government have no mind to afford any facility for the improvement of the indigenous system. . . The choice of the Government seems to be unsatisfactory in view of the fact that only the appointment of men acquainted with both the systems can be of any practical use. It is, therefore, necessary that the Government should have the advice of proper men in the matter. . . I repeat that the indifference of the Government towards such a popular and cheap system as the Ayurvedic system is a matter to be greatly regretted. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Dec. 1918.

Scientific books by Mr. K. Sitaramayya Sastri.

62. Referring to the replies given on behalf of the Government to the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achariyar requesting State patronage to publishers of scientific books in Vernaculars, the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th December, observes:—. . . When the honourable mover referred to the books published by Mr. K. Sitaramayya as an example of the publications which deserve the encouragement of the Government, the Hon'ble Mr. Stone and the Hon'ble Mr. Pittendrig had both praised the attempt of Mr. Sitaramayya. But the Hon'ble Mr. Stone expressed inability on behalf of the Government in the matter of rendering any help to the publisher in question. Expressing sympathy in words while showing disinclination to do anything when it comes to be a matter of rendering practical help is the nature of the Government. There is nothing new in it. Though the argument of Mr. Stone that the burden of publication rests on the publishers concerned and not on the Government is plausible, it is not calculated to facilitate the publication of the books in question. The Government will do well to understand that there is no chance of publishing scientific books in vernaculars, if they do not give suitable encouragement to the publishers concerned. . .

Madras, 19th Dec. 1918.

The scheme of Sir Reginald Craddock.

63. Referring to the scheme of Reforms prepared by Sir Reginald Craddock for Burma, the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th December, remarks:—. . . In the scheme of Mr. Montagu, we see at least an attempt to train the Indian people in the art of self-government. But in this scheme (Sir Reginald Craddock's), there is not even that. We hope that the Burmans will show their disapproval of Sir Craddock's scheme and defeat his aims at creating disunion between the Burmans and the Indians.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Dec. 1918.

The Madras Corporation meeting and the health of the city.

64. Referring to the resolution moved by Mr. G. A. Natesan at a Corporation meeting, requesting the establishment of three more dispensaries, one for Mylapore, one for Triplicane and another for Georgetown, and the amendment to it proposed by Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chetti, that only one of them should be allopathic, while the other two should be Ayurvedic and Unani, respectively, the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th December, observes:—. . . The amendment of Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti is quite appropriate. The Ayurvedic and Unani systems will be not only as beneficial as but also cheaper than the western system. What seems to have prevented the Corporation from passing the resolution is the fear that the Government will cancel it. But as it is the people who pay taxes, they must have the power of deciding the number of dispensaries required for the upkeep of their health and the system of treatment best suited to them. By rejecting the suggestion of Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti, the Corporation failed to do its duty.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Dec. 1918.

A strange matter.

65. Referring to the question why the King's message to the Empire has not been communicated to the Indian people the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st December, publishes in Telugu an extract from the Leader on the subject, which contains:—. . . It appears that the message was read at Lahore by the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab. . . If so, why should it be published at Lahore alone and not in the rest of India? Having given the above extract, the paper remarks that the Government of India will do well to clear this doubt.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 20th Dec. 1918.

The Sanitary Commissioner's report.

66. Reviewing in its leader under this heading, the Sanitary Commissioner's report for 1917, the Andhrapatrika, of the 20th December, observes:—. . . The health of the people was very bad last year. The figures given in the report are alarming. Diseases like cholera, fever and plague have been more widespread than in 1916. . . When the death rate in western countries is becoming smaller and smaller with a corresponding improvement in public health, it will be worthwhile to ascertain the reason why diseases should spread, health should suffer and deaths should increase in India. . . It will be seen from the review made by the Government on the report that the rise in the prices of foodstuffs has a close connexion with the increase of ill-health. It is clear that the people will suffer in health when they cannot get nutritious food at a fair price. As pointed out by such eminent men as the late Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji, poverty is the main cause of the country's misery—a fact which is now practically realised more than ever before. It cannot be imagined how poor people will manage to live, when rice is selling at two measures a rupee. When men do not get nutritious food, their bodies will be liable to be easily attacked by all sorts of epidemics; and it is no wonder, if the death-rate among them is increasing. . . Unless the people appeal to the Government and find, with their help, a solution for the poverty problem, there is no chance of this unbearable condition coming to an end. . . Since correct figures of deaths have not been given as stated in the report, there is room to fear that the actual number of deaths is more than what it has been represented to be. It is of great importance that the Government should endeavour to give correct figures. . . One of the reasons advanced for the increase in the death-rate is lack of the requisite medical aid. When the number of allopathic physicians is not enough, it is not understood why the services of Ayurvedic and Unani practitioners found in such numbers cannot be availed of. The solution of the health problem will be practicable only when the Government are prepared to utilise the services of Ayurvedic and Unani Doctors along with western physicians, make nutritious food easily available for the masses, and enable them to know the principles of health by giving them elementary education. They must adopt these three measures simultaneously. Otherwise, there is no reason to hope that the problem can be easily solved by meagre attempts.

67. Referring to the manifesto of questions circulated by Mr. Milney among the Indian Civil Servants in the Bihar Province, the Andhrapatrika, of the 20th December, remarks :—. . . It will be far from the truth to say that the Indian Civil Servants will greatly suffer by the reforms. If in the interests of the people they have to give up some of their powers, it behoves them to do so gladly. The powers of a minorty should not be a menace to the well-being of the majority. The fact that the Indian Civil Servants are not willing to give up even this little only shows their unfavourable attitude towards the advancement of the people. And it is exactly at the hands of these very people that Mr. Montagu wants Indians to receive their political training. . . Milney's manifesto gives ground for the doubts of the Indians about the desirability of this course. The British Government will do well to understand this and grant India the reforms demanded by the Congress.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 20th Dec. 1918.

68. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd December, observes :—. . . At a time when peace is being restored to the whole world, it would be but just to release those who are suffering internment without trial under the Defence of India Act, as the necessity for that Act is clearly over when once the war has come to an end. . . The long expected release of Mr. D. Chenchayya, and Messrs. Muhammed Ali and Shaukat Ali has not yet come off. . . Should the Government, however, feel unable to release them for any reason it would be just on their part to frame charges against them and have them tried in open courts. . . As the people have already expressed their firm opinion in the matter, the Government are requested to act up to it at once.

Internments.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Dec. 1918.

69. Adverting to the request of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce to allow a representative at the Peace Conference on behalf of Indian commercial community, the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd December, says :— . . . The Fourth Kistna District Ryots' Conference.

70. The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd December, publishes in Telugu the speech of Rao Bahadur K. V. Reddi Nayudu, the President of the Fourth Kistna District Ryots' Conference, which contains among others :—. . . Though the Government are in need of additional money, to throw that burden on ryots, in these circumstances, is unjust, and illegal and will create discontent. . . If English engineers unconnected with those in our Presidency are constituted as a committee of inquiry, I am quite sure that they will declare the four-inch pipes as too narrow to let out water and that the 90 duty which has superseded the 60 duty as quite unjust. Even some of the engineering officers in our district have admitted this fact in private conversation. . . As ill-luck would have it, from the very beginning, our rulers seem to have been particular about higher education without paying any attention to the elementary education which conduces to the amelioration of the condition of the ryots and the masses. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

The Kistna District Ryots' Conference.

Referring to the Fourth Kistna District Ryots' Conference held at Pulla, the Andhrapatrika, of the 24th December, remarks: —. . . In his able speech, Rao Bahadur K. V. Reddi Nayudu, the President of the Conference, explained clearly how the difficulties of ryots would be multiplied beyond limit by enhancing the water-rate. The ryots of the Gōdāvari, Kistna and Guntūr districts have unanimously declared that the proposed enhancement is fraught with evil consequences. The authorities who profess sympathy for the masses are, therefore, requested to give up the proposed enhancement and thus avert any occasion for strong agitation.

The Fourth Kistna District Conference.

The Andhraprakasika publishes in Telugu the speech of Rao Bahadur K. V. Reddi Nayudu Garu, the President of the Fourth Kistna District Ryots' Conference, in its issues of the 19th and 20th December, and, with reference to it in the issue for the 19th December, requests the Government to peruse the speech carefully, give up their proposal to enhance the water-rate, and thus earn the gratitude of the ryot-population.

The procession of the President-elect of the Congress.

71. Referring to the order of the authorities in Delhi, regarding the procession of the President-elect of the Congress, the Andhrapatrika, of the 24th December, remarks :— . . . From the manner in which the Delhi authorities are trying to create troubles in small matters, it will be clear that their angle of vision has undergone no change. It would be well if His Excellency the Viceroy will at once put an end to the arbitrary acts of these officers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

Officers and memorials.

72. Referring with disapproval to the attempt of the people to set up memorials for Lord Willingdon and Sir Michael O'Dwyer, the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th December, observes:— . . . There seems to be no necessity for memorials to provincial rulers, as there is nothing great in their discharging the duties attached to their respective offices, which they are bound to do. . . While no memorials are set up in honour of even our great patriots, that they should be erected for those holding temporary offices and cherishing no sympathy for this country cannot but be insulting to the self-respect of the people. . . The good which Provincial Governors are capable of doing independently is very little. They are parts of an administrative machine the limits of which it will be too difficult for them to transgress. . . They can thus have little chance of doing much good to the national progress, setting at defiance the advice of the Members of their Executive Councils.

The cause for the arbitrariness of the present bureaucratic party is to be found in the very system of administration which should, therefore, be changed first before there can be any improvement in the situation. To ignore this fact and set up memorials to officers on the ground that they have done some beneficial acts or others is ridiculous. . . There cannot be anything objectionable in the friends of officers presenting addresses and giving dinners privately. But to hold such demonstration on behalf of the people is very improper.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya.

73. Referring to the order of the Delhi authorities regarding the procession of the Hon'ble Mr. Pandit Madan Mohan Malavya, the President of the Delhi Congress, the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th December, remarks:— . . . If the authorities resort to arbitrary measures even in such small matters, it will serve no other useful purpose than rousing the feelings of the people. It is regrettable that the Magistrate of Delhi does not possess this much foresight. . .

The National Congress and the presidential address.

74. The issues of the Andhrapatriku, of the 27th and 28th, publish in English and Telugu the address of the President of the Delhi Congress. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th December, writes:— . . . As Pandit M. Malavya has observed, England carried on wars for the acquisition of territory in Asia and Africa, though she had never interfered with the freedom of European States. . . The primary object of President Wilson is to avert any occasion for war in the future by affording equal facilities to all nations for free development and by creating an international league so that brute-force may have no place hereafter. . . India also wants to help in the process of the world re-construction to the best of her ability but she has not been given a proper opportunity to express her opinion in this matter.

Though Sir S. P. Sinha goes to the Peace Conference as a representative on behalf of India, he will be in a position to express the Government view rather than the people's view. . . While Canada is sending six popular representatives, it is not proper that India which may be called the Crown of the British Empire should be allowed only one or two. If the British Government had invited the Congress and the Moslem League representatives, it would have been very gratifying to the Indians. It behoves the Government to heed the appeal of the Congress President and invite them now at least. . . Though, in the beginning, it was proclaimed that the British Government was established for the good of the people, by and by, the well-being of the people has not been so cared for. . . The Indians had substantially shown their fitness for self-government before the advent of the war. It is undoubtedly a lie that taking advantage of the war they have inaugurated the Home Rule agitation to annoy England. . . The narrow spirit imbedded in the announcement of the 20th August has been reflected in the Scheme of Reforms, dissatisfaction about which has become general among all the Indians. . . The Congress at its previous session urged the grant of Provincial autonomy excluding the departments of law, justice and police. Mr. Malavya proposes that the Delhi Congress should ask for complete provincial autonomy. . . He asks whether the speeches of British leaders will all end in mere praise or whether they will result in any practical good to India. From the speeches of Mr. Lloyd George, it is to be hoped that India will have a fitting reward. . . Since the British Government are prepared to concede the right of self-determination to Syria and Mesopotamia, Mr. Malavya wants that India also may be shown the same concession. . . The capacity of Indians for self-government was well demonstrated by Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji. One-third of India is under the rule of the Native chiefs. In these circumstances there cannot be anything more absurd and ridiculous than to say that the people of British India, who have been trained under the British Government for the last 150 years and who can boast of such eminent men as Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji and Mr. J. C. Bose, are unfit for self-government. It is the Indians that should determine the stages by which they have to attain their self-government. This is the right of self-determination which they want. Mr. Malavya appeals to the British Government to grant that right to them and earn their gratitude. . . It is hoped that the Congress will soon get for the Indian people the right of self-determination and self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th & 28th Dec. 1918.

A new danger.

75. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th December, writes:— . . . At a time when the whole world is glad on account of the restoration of peace, a new danger in the shape of Russian 'Bolshevism' has raised its head in place of the German 'Militarism' and is fast spreading. . . Aiming at universal equality, the Bolsheviks are only creating another despotic system. . . Bolshevism has not only spread to Germany, but, from the cables received to-day, it also appears that Bolsheviks are trying to overthrow the Ebert Government and establish the Lebnecht Government in its stead. . . It has also spread to Roumania. . . It is similarly understood that its principles have been taught to some Chinese who are expected to propagate the revolutionary movement in China.

The Bolsheviks are threatening to spread their principles among the British soldiers and create a revolution among them as has been done among the German soldiers, should they occupy the Baltic provinces. The trend of events shows that the danger of Bolsheviks is great and is increasing day by day. There is not the least doubt that their principles are detrimental to peace and order. . . The Allies are realizing the necessity for putting an end to this Bolshevism before it spreads. In any country, the masses will always be inclined in favour of peace and order and not of Bolshevism. . . Equal opportunities should be given to all nations; for the progress of liberty and reconstruction should be undertaken on the basis of self-determination. If the Allies work without swerving in the least from this position, Bolshevism will dare not step into the Allied countries. If on the other hand the Allied countries do not give up their desire for conquest, do not grant equal rights to dependent nations, and violate the objects of the war, the Bolsheviks may receive encouragement . . The Justice in its characteristic strain advocates the perpetuation in India of the war measures which have effectively prevented the German intrigues. . . It is such writings that afford room for unnecessary unrest. . . If the Government at the present grant self-determination and self-government to Indians without heeding the advice of the opponents of self-government, there is not the slightest chance for the appearance of Bolshevism in India. . . We hope that the British Government will display a statesmanship that will be equal to the times.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

The Fourteenth Indian Industrial Conference.

76. Reviewing in its leader the speech of the President of the Fourteenth Indian Industrial Conference held at Delhi, the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th December, observes:— . . . Though the Industrial Commission have made certain general recommendations showing the several ways in which the Government can help our industrial progress, it is regrettable that instead of settling just now such matters as the establishment of industrial banks and research institutes, they should leave them for the consideration of special committees. There is one subject which should have received their special attention. They have not decided the question of commercial independence for India, which is the most important of all our problems, as it was excluded from the scope of their inquiry by the Government. It is impossible for such a poor country as India to compete with western countries and develop her industries by her own exertions. It is not true to say that money is hidden in the country. The Government should encourage the formation of industrial banks and give them loans without interest or at low interest. The President said that if at least a part of the Indian gold reserve in England, which is now used entirely to the benefit of foreign merchants, is utilized for the industrial progress of India, the country would make rapid advancement. Without commercial independence, no country can improve her industries. When protection is necessary for such countries as Japan, Germany and the British colonies, there is not the least doubt that India, yet in an infant stage, is in urgent need of it. It is understood that Imperial preference will be introduced in the British Empire. . . But India will lose immensely by this policy, and the President emphasizes that it is quite unsuited to this country. What India wants is commercial independence which confers on her the power to impose duties on foreign articles for the development of her indigenous industries. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

The All-India Moslem League Conference.

77. Referring to the speech of the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the All-India Moslem League at Delhi, the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th December, says:— . . . The Chairman of the Reception Committee spoke at length on the problems which are now agitating the Moslem world. The Muhammadans are particularly anxious about the dismemberment of Turkey. It is but just that the British Government should respect their opinions and make such arrangements as will not wound their religious sentiments. . . Though the Muhammadans of India have maintained a commendable attitude throughout the war, such acts of the Governnfent, as the internment of some prominent Moslem leaders, have caused unrest among them. . . The Congress and the Moslem League are unanimous in their demands. It behoves the British Government to note this union of the two communities and grant the wishes of the Indians. . .

78. Referring to the removal of the prohibition against the Congress deputation proceeding to England, the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th December, remarks:— . . . It is stated that the Government are not prepared to create special facilities in the matter of voyages, since a deputation to England at the present juncture is not, in their opinion, a national necessity. For this reason, it is to be feared that the difficulties in the matter of voyage would be the same as before. We fail to see a more urgent national necessity than that of an Indian deputation proceeding to England to represent their views at a time when elections are taking place and the question of imperial reconstruction is being considered. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

79. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika (weekly), of the 18th December, writes:— . . . The seeds of the great European war are to be found in Africa and Asia and not in Europe. There cannot be an end of jealousy among the European States and they will be making wars, blinded by ambition, so long as there are countries in a condition of dependence in Asia and Africa. A lasting peace can only be possible, when the European powers recognize at the Peace Conference the independence of the Asiatic and the African peoples. The British statesmen will have to realize the fact that the establishment of self-government in India which is a continent with a population of 300 millions is necessary for the permanent peace and well-being of the world. The Indian members appointed as representatives at the Peace Conference have reached England and it will be but proper that the Cabinet should proceed to appoint a popular representative in accordance with the wishes of the people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 18th Dec. 1918.

80. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika (weekly), of the 18th December, writes:— . . . When England with a population of 45 millions has an electorate of 21 millions, it will be ridiculous that the Madras Presidency with a population of 41 millions should have an electorate of only 250 thousands. If this is to be the broad electorate proposed in the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme, God only knows what shape the reforms will take. Having slept till now, the Madras Government issued an order on the 14th instant to the several bodies for the submission of their respective views before the 25th instant. This belated order speaks volumes of the weakness of the bureaucracy. . .

ARYA VYSYA, Guntur, 12th Dec. 1918.

82. Referring to the transfer of Mr. A. Y. G. Campbell, Collector of the Kistna district, the Kistnapatrika, of the 21st December, observes:—. . . His administration has passed off very smoothly without troubles. There is a talk that he has been somewhat hard in the matter of penal taxes. Though he has not displayed much ability and independent judgment in administrative matters like his predecessors, Mr. Scott and Mr. Turing, there is no doubt that he has set an example to the I.C.S. men in point of politeness and courtesy. As regards the district board administration, it does not appear that he has helped on measures calculated to benefit the people. On the whole, we can say that his administration has not given any occasion either for much praise or criticism. . .

The International League.

83. The Kistnapatrika, of the 28th December, writes under this heading :—From the echoes which are breaking out now and then amidst the peace negotiations, there is room to fear that the International League conceived by President Wilson may not come to be. If that be the case, this terrible war has only occurred for the destruction of men. . .

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Kistna District Board.

84. Under this heading the Kistnapatrika, of the 28th December, writes :—We hear that this Board wants to contract all at once a loan of 13 lahks of rupees in order to improve the trunk roads in the district and to construct big bridges required in that connexion. . . The Board is realizing much profit out of the Bezwada-Masula Branch Railway line. It will be proper to utilize a part at least of this profit for village roads which are in a much neglected condition. The Board will do well to give up its project of building bridges on trunk roads and undertake works ministering to the convenience of people living in villages.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Masulipatam municipality.

85. Under this heading the Kistnapatrika, of the 28th December, writes :—. . . We hear that the acts of this municipality have, of late, become very arbitrary. There is nothing strange in such perverse acts taking place, so long as Mr. Maiden continues to be the Chairman. The suit filed by Kaja Krishna Rao Garu, the successful candidate in the first election, in the Munsif's Court upon the order of the Collector cancelling the first election, praying for injunction to put in abeyance the second election until his suit is disposed of is an instance in point. Mr. Venkatrayudu opposed the grant of injunction on behalf of the municipality. Who gave him the vakalat ? When Mr Kattamudi Chidambara Rao has been appointed as the standing counsel of the municipality, has Mr. Maiden the power to set aside that arrangement of his own accord and give the vakalat to anybody he likes ? We trust that the Municipal Council will inquire into this matter. . . Has the Municipal Council passed a resolution to oppose the grant of injunction ? We should like to know why the Chairman is so particular in the absence of such a resolution.

An English soldier's rowdyism.

87. Under this heading a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th December, writes :—Last evening, at the Karlekar Circus, an English soldier unjustly struck an Indian spectator on the mouth with his fist, causing a wound one inch deep. It may be said that blood flowed freely in a stream. . . In this city, the rowdyism of English soldiers is passing all bounds day by day. Whether on account of racial pride or on account of the arrogance that they belong to the ruling class, they are behaving recklessly and annoying people. Unless the Government mete out to these offenders severe punishment which will be an example to the rest, the people cannot pass along convenient routes nor witness amusements and their (the soldiers') rowdyism will increase all the more.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 21st Dec. 1918.

Freedom.

89. A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 21st December, writes under this heading :—Mr. Lloyd George and Doctor Wilson have vowed themselves to the establishment of peace and freedom, not only in their own countries but also in every country in the world. . . Is it possible, under these circumstances, that our rulers can forget India, the crestjewel of their Empire ? Are the English so ungrateful as to forget India which has sacrificed life and money in the defence of the Empire ? Will Doctor Wilson who, when constitutional government, such as has long been promised to India, was offered to Hungary by Austria, urged that complete independence without any interference whatever should be conceded to her (Hungary), fail to counsel his allies, and render this measure of help to India? . . . It is stupid to declare that our country, which is the mother renowned statesmen, philosophers, poets, artists, scientists and persons of genius, is unfit for freedom. We cannot have salvation or happiness, so long as we are dependent. O, leaders! Is not the sacred blood of Maharishis coursing through your veins? . . . Proceed to the Peace Conference. . . When our rulers and allies demand that the enemy countries and the neutral countries should liberate their dependencies, they will not fail to ask "why do you not grant freedom to India?" May our rulers not afford room for such a question from the enemies!

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 24th Dec. 1918.

The Congress deputation.

90. In a lengthy article contributed to the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 24th December, the writer in opposing the proposal to send a Congress deputation to England, observes:—Our codes of law have laid down that the dispensers of justice should hold the balance even, and that those who are unjust will bring ruin on their own heads and on their whole race as will nevertheless, a large section of the authorities abandon truth and justice, give room for autocracy and are full of duplicity. Their number is daily increasing. It is scarcely possible that such people as these can get political liberties such as Home Rule. Our people merely boast of their patriotism but seldom carry it into practice. We cannot affirm that even one for every crore of our population is a true patriot. Where, then, is the good of sending a deputation of such a people to England? When, some years ago, Babu Surendranath went to England to represent the grievances arising from autocratic methods in India, a British workman, on hearing his interesting lecture, told him that these representations were a mere cry in the wilderness, that unless the people displayed unity among themselves and made the autocratic officials fear that their autocratic methods might endanger the safety of the empire, it was useless to expect any change in the state of things. He further added that if the people of India became all truthful, just and so patriotic as to even lay down their lives in the cause of their country if necessary, their efforts will be sure to bear fruit. It is to be regretted that our statesmen have not the discernment of even that workman. Why do we want Home Rule and such privileges when men who have passed high examinations, who are placed in high office and have the good fortune to wield enormous power, are guilty of caste and religious hatred, and oppress the good and protect the wicked? Those who quarrel like dogs had better been born as dogs.

SATHYANADAM, Ernakulam, 20th Dec. 1918.

The famine and our Governments.

91. In a long editorial note the Sathyanadam, of the 20th December, states that "none of our Governments"—i.e., British Malabar, Travancore or Cochin—bestowed any timely thought on the subject of the prevention or cure of famine. They did not pay sufficient heed at first to the warnings and lamentations of the press and the people about the approach of impending famine. It was only when the crisis was reached that the Governments opened their eyes. And then? How long did those eyes keep staring on!—probably by the stupifaction of bewilderment at the intensity of the famine they witnessed. Travancore stands first among those that began to do at least something in the matter, though late, and Malabar comes last having done nothing at all noteworthy. Cochin occupies the middle position being saved from the last place by British Malabar which appropriated that rank to itself. The authorities of Malabar did not fail to discover and warn the people that if food grains are not stocked, famine will follow. What a discovery! But when the Municipal Council asked, not for a free grant but for a loan on interest of a lakh of rupees for stocking food grains, the Government ungraciously rejected the application. Nobody seems to be even aware that it is the requisitioning of ships and railway for Government purposes and the consequent reduction of transport facilities that intensified the famine so much. Travancore, though late, has started to do many good things. That Government has sanctioned a grant of ten lakhs of rupees for the import of rice and paddy from Burma. It has also begun to give advances to municipal towns for combating famine. It has undertaken to defray a portion of the loss that will be suffered by Town Improvement Committees by the sale of food grains at specially cheap rates to the poor. The Travancore Government has also sanctioned three lakhs of rupees for the purchase of kerosene oil required by the 'kol' cultivators. This is the difference in the picture of the administration of Malabar and of Travancore. Cochin has the praise that it has said nothing so ungracious as the authorities did in the case of Malabar. The Darbar began to think too late and have not yet carried out successfully any famine measure of importance. When Travancore forbade export of paddy and rice from the State it had the sisterly feeling to allow export to the Cochin State. But when Cochin promulgated a similar order, by want of foresight she did not remember Travancore at all. Travancore, therefore, in a later order had to withdraw the concession which was previously allowed in favour of Cochin. The net result is that Cochin has to suffer most.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 20th Dec. 1918.

India and war indemnity.

92. Referring in detail to an article published in the London Times about India's contribution in money and material for the war, a note in the Yogakshemam, of the 20th December, inquires :—Now that accounts are being made out for claiming war indemnity from Germany, will arrangements be made for the return to India of the amount spent by her in various ways for the war?

MALAYALI, Quilon, 11th Dec. 1918.

The industrial outlook.

93. The Malayali, of the 11th December, in its leading article on the industrial outlook, remarks that the reforms that will result throughout the world from the re-establishment of peace are likely to be mostly of a political nature but social reform and economic progress are likely to follow in the wake of administrative reforms. All Indians know by experience that as long as the management of the affairs of any country is entirely in the hands of a foreign bureaucracy, they attend first and foremost to their own interests and then to the interests of their compatriots. The people who are governed by them may enjoy just that measure of opportunity which is incidental to securing the progress and efficiency of plans worked out by the rulers for the advancement of their own interests. But this is undoubtedly insufficient for sustaining the prosperity of the people of the land. Though the raw products and the labour belong to the people of the land, all the profits are snatched away by the administrators and their comrades and the wealth of the latter's country is gradually increased. It is on this account that patriots of several foreign countries clamour for increased freedom to administer their own countries. . . The fact that noble-hearted Englishmen and Americans desire to see all countries and nations throughout the world increase in a sense of equality, self-help, and self-respect augurs a bright future after the gloomy war. India, too, will derive some benefits along with other countries. In India and Africa the labour required in industries and agriculture is controlled entirely by foreigners who benefit by the labour of the natives. All the coolie labour in the factories of India and Africa is contributed by natives as Europeans have not the convenience to work in the tropics. It is a matter of experience that native coolies suffer great hardship at the hands of foreign capitalists who control their labour. It cannot be forgotten that sometimes the poor coloured labourers in the plantations and factories of India, without regard to age or sex, are subjected by the Europeans (white people) to severe sufferings. In addition to this it is also seen that since the commencement of the war Indians who were dependent on foreign manufactures for all their needs have begun to suffer and famine has begun to scourge the people with extraordinary severity. All this is due to the absence of self-reliance on the part of Indians. The article concludes by exhorting the people of India to equip themselves by practical education and co-operation for securing the industrial and economic advancement of the country.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN Madras, 18th Dec. 1918.

Plague in Madras.

94. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 18th December, in a leading article refers to the Health Officer's opinion in which he strongly urges the public to get themselves inoculated in addition to taking other precautionary measures, and observes :—The public is well aware as to how the observance of the sanitary laws and conservancy rules affect the spread of the epidemic. Hence the people of Madras should not be indifferent but rather do all they can by taking preventive measures. In addition to physical cleanliness there is the urgent necessity for purity of heart, for the advent of this disease is a result of our own acts.

95. The Qaumi Report, of the 19th December, referring to the rejection of the resolution moved at the meeting of the Corporation held yesterday regarding the opening of Unani and Ayurvedic dispensaries in Georgtown, Triplicane and Mylapore, observes :—Mr. Tyagaraya has very rightly said that 95 per cent of the Hindus and Muhammadans prefer Unani and Ayurvedic treatment, but what remedy is to be found for dread of the Government ?

The rejection of the Unani and Ayurvedic medicines.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 19th Dec. 1918.

96. The Qaumi Report, of the 22nd December, in a leader on the marginally-noted subject, writes :—Rumour has it that the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nayar, an ordinary member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, desires to resign. Certain papers suggest the name of Sir Visweswarayya, ex-Diwan of Mysore, for the appointment which will fall vacant, should the rumour prove to be true. The local papers—New India, Indian Patriot, the Hindu, the Times—both explicitly and implicitly support the suggestion, and thus turn the Mussalmans down.

Mussalman's rights.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 22nd Dec. 1918.

We are sure that His Excellency Lord Chelmsford's Government will not deprive and disappoint Muslims of their rights, but nominate a capable Mussalman to succeed Sir Sankaran Nayar. We are bound to inform the Government that if Muhammadan interests be ignored in this fashion, the community will fall far behind in political training and experience and will be unable to undertake the responsibility connected with authority. Mussalmans need more political training than Hindus, and it is essential that they should be appointed to every branch of the public service in order that they may acquire practical knowledge, otherwise it is feared that their mental powers become useless, and they will lose heart in their efforts to acquire knowledge.

All we ask for is the recognition of national right and the need for equal treatment. We do not seek any special favour. In the length and breadth of India there will be found Muhammadans who are capable of holding the highest office under the Government.

III.—Legislation.

97. The Vartakamitran, of the 28th November, thinks that this tax will affect only the poor, in spite of the assurance that it will not and, remarking that those, who are well versed in economics, will echo this view, observes :—All the taxes levied on trade should be taken to be levied on the poor. Though the merchant paying the tax may be a big capitalist, carrying on trade on a large scale, a close analysis of his business will disclose that his commodities eventually come into the hands of the poor. The profit that is placed on a commodity at every stage in which it changes hands, during its transit from the producing centre to the consumer, eventually comes down heavily upon the head of the consumer. It is only the consumer that has to pay all the taxes imposed and other transport charges. At a time when famine is impending and it is therefore incumbent on the Government to relieve the distress of the poor by reducing the merchants' profits and transport charges, it cannot conduce to the interests of the public to impose an excess profits tax. Not stopping with the levy of this tax this year, they propose to continue it even in the next. Once this tax is imposed, it will be a herculian task to get it repealed. Prevention is better than cure.

The Excess Profits Tax Bill.

Vartakamitran, Tanjore, 28th Nov. 1918.

The Dravidabhimani, of the 20th December, says that this tax will be welcomed by the poor and that it illustrates only the working of Nemesis against the merchants, who sold their stuffs on hand at exorbitant prices.

Dravidabhimani, Salem, 20th Dec. 1918.

The Mahavikata Dutan, of the 21st December, also echoes the same view and remarks that the merchants who made huge profits on account of the war, not by the sweat of their brows but almost as a highway robbery, have no reason to grudge to pay this tax.

Mahavikata Dutan, Madras, 21st Dec. 1918.

The Dravidan, of the 24th December, reproduces in Tamil that portion of the leader of the Justice of the 16th idem, which refers to this subject.

Dravidan, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

98. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 22nd December, has a letter from Vekar Nawaz Jung of Hyderabad against the Bill in which the writer discusses the subject quoting the Koran

The Registration Bill.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, 22nd Dec. 1918.

and traditions and observes:—If the Bill be passed into law, it will interfere with religion which will be opposed to the non-interference policy of the Government and will tend to cause general dissatisfaction.

IV.—Native States.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 24th Dec. 1918.

A Department of Industries in Travancore.

99. Referring to the Travancore Darbar having formed a 'Department of Industries' for the State, with Doctor Barker as the Director, the Desabhaktan, of the 24th December, observes:—There is no doubt that this State will make great progress in industries hereafter. But we do not see why an Englishman should be appointed as the head of this department in a Native State? Is there no Indian industrial expert available in Travancore?

Sathyanadam, Ernakulam, 20th Dec. 1918.

The Cochin Diwanship.

100. A correspondent writing in the Sathyanadam, of the 20th December, points out that the naturalised foreign Brahmans residing in the Cochin State wish to have anyone but a Nayar to be Diwan, while the Nayars will have none but a Nayar. The rest of the population will certainly prefer to have an officer of merit from British service preferably a European as he will be free from all bias and prejudice.

Malayala Manorama, Kottayam, 19th Dec. 1918.

The struggle for equality of citizen rights.

101. A correspondent, writing in the Malayala Manorama, of the 19th December, points out that those who struggle to secure equality of privileges of citizenship in Travancore are not, as some people think, scrambling for a few appointments in Government service. The civilized world has acknowledged the principle that every man, irrespective of caste or creed, should be allowed in his own native land, opportunities for the full development and exercise of his natural powers. No unnatural restraint should be allowed to militate against this principle. No self-respecting man will put up with such restraints and it is not manly to continue to suffer them. . . It is well known that in Travancore unnatural restraints are allowed to obstruct the legitimate claims of several sections of the subjects of the State. A Christian or Muhammadan or Ezhuva is ipso facto kept out of the Revenue Department. Similarly an Ezhuva or Pulaya or Paraya is kept out of the temple as he is not a high caste Hindu. The present struggle is against these unnatural and degrading barriers.

An editorial note on the same subject points out that the forces that obstruct the realization by 26 lakhs out of the 34 lakhs of people in the State, of several important privileges of citizenship, are undoubtedly harmful in the extreme to the State. As long as the communities concerned were asleep, there was not much danger; but at a time when the whole world is shaken out by the war and inequalities are being done away with everywhere, the impropriety of administering the State in a manner offensive and degrading to several important communities, will, it is trusted, be a matter for serious consideration by the Darbar.

ENGLISH PAPERS.

II.—Home Administration.

(k) General.

1. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 1st January, says:—"The Congress was not representative in any sense of the term. The responsible leaders of the country refused to attend. The Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastri was, of course, there. But his presence or absence does not matter one way or the other. For one thing he is not the moderate party any more than Mrs. Besant is India and he is an undefined entity in Indian politics. He claims to be everything and it is difficult to say what he is at any given time. With the exception of Mr. Sastri, no leader of any position was present and the Delhi Congress would be regarded as but another instance of the extremist attempt to hoodwink the outside world into the belief that the extremists are the accredited leaders of India. . . Pandit Malavya's metamorphosis from a responsible leader into an irresponsible politician has been as startling as it has been rapid. Without going over the history of the last four years, one may reasonably conclude that but for the presence of certain agitators whom we need not name here, whose violent propagandist work has been suffered to go on unchecked, India would not be to-day in the unhappy position which the Pandit accurately described in his address. In this sorry work politicians like the Pandit have had their share, and it does not lie in their mouths to charge anyone else with driving India into a state of unhappiness. If the Pandit and his friends are earnest in helping the country out of her present unhappiness and if they would profit by the lessons of the Delhi Congress, they should free themselves of the grip of foreign agitators and do their own thinking and work for the advancement of India not by giving the British Government notice to quit in a period of ten or fifteen years but by so strengthening the bonds between England and India that their comradeship will bring out the best in them. and conduce to their mutual advancement and prosperity. India cannot advance by a policy of hatred to Britain and that is a lesson which the Delhi Congress has failed to teach."

The Indian National Congress.

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, 1st Jan. 1919.

2. The following appears in the West Coast Spectator of the 4th January:—"Indian suffragettes under the lead of Mrs. Besant have presented a memorial to Lord Southborough demanding votes for their ilk. They are at perfect liberty to demand votes but when they put forth palpable untruths and barefaced exaggerations we have to question their 'political honesty'. The memorial mentions that Indian politicians demand women's franchise! For every man or woman Mrs. Besant produces in support of her demand, we will produce ten against it. Here is the challenge which we offer her and her followers:

"Home Rule Theosophists think, perhaps, that they are the 'people' and what they think and feel is thought and felt by the country as a whole. This is unmitigated impudence. The fact that Mrs. Half Crack Ayyar and Mrs. Verumchor set up by their husbands, who worship at the Besantine shrine, demand the vote does not show that Indian women are after it. We have no doubt that the Franchise Committee will unceremoniously put into the waste paper basket the precious memorandum made in Adyar prompted by a few blue stockings and inspired by the high priestess of the cult of Theosophy. . . We suppose that the anti-suffragette Theosophists do not protest, bound as they are by a sort of allegiance to Her Theosophical Majesty. Nobody outside her camp takes Mrs. Besant, seriously when she beats her newest drum, but if she continues, we can promise her a very heated opposition."

Mrs. Besant and Indian suffragettes.

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 4th Jan. 1919.

3. In a leader under the heading 'The Times to the Rescue', Justice, of the 6th January, observes:—"When, on the resignation of Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Montagu was appointed to succeed him as Secretary of State for India, the London Times for reasons which it did not fully disclose disapproved of it. As, however, Mr. Lloyd George was its hero without whose co-operation Mr. Asquith could not be demolished and as the appointment was made by Mr. Lloyd George, the Times held its peace. Later on, as has been usual with that paper, it has been an active supporter of Mr. Montagu. . . We have been led into these reflections by a Reuter's message which we publish elsewhere and which is a brief summary of an article in the Times, in which that paper argues in favour of the retention by Mr. Montagu of the office of Secretary of State for India. . . Does the Times really think that Mr. Montagu is as necessary in the India Office as Mr. Fisher is as the head of the Department of Education? Mr. Fisher is a distinguished expert who has given satisfaction to all parties. He has been improving the existing system of education in Great Britain, and his great work is not yet completed. Mr. Montagu, on the contrary, is no expert. Nor is his knowledge of India and its affairs at all sound and accurate. . . Has he not given a real impetus to irresponsible agitation in India? Is it not a fact that in framing his scheme of reforms he has practically ignored responsible Indian opinion and India's natural leaders, not to speak of the masses? Why, have we not heard of priggish politicians for whom nobody in India who is somebody cares, going about the country saying that they are in the confidence of Mr. Montagu? . . . No, Mr. Montagu is not indispensable to the India Office where, we fear, he will be a source of weakness to Mr. Lloyd George's Government. . . We are not in fact keen about Mr. Montagu being retained in the India Office, and we are sorry indeed that the Times has failed to grasp the real facts of the situation in this matter."

Mr. Montagu and the London Times.

New India, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

Europeans and the Indian Defence Force.

4. Writing under the heading 'an Unnatural Demand' New India, of the 6th January, says:—"Speaking recently at Calcutta, His Excellency the Viceroy announced the intention of the Government of India to reconsider the terms of service of the European section of the Indian Defence Ferce, subject, however, to one condition, viz., 'to the paramount obligation that it is the bounden duty of every one of British birth in this country to bear arms in its defence'. The principle here enunciated is indeed staggering, and we have in it, from the military standpoint, an entire negation of the Nationalist demand. Who indeed is to defend India—her people or outsiders? . . . To the British community itself, the Viceroy's statement has been very unpleasant. The continuance of the Defence Force naturally interferes with their commercial activities; and it is now a matter of common knowledge that their loss, so far, has been severe—not so much by the actual diminution of profits but by the advance of other competitors. A considerable section of the trade which in Calcutta was in British hands before the war, is reported to have passed steadily into Japanese hands; and that is an unpleasant development from the standpoint both of India and England. . . Considering all aspects of the question, one is driven to the conclusion that the continuance of the European Defence Force is not only a needless burden on the country, but a standing insult to the self-respect of the Indian Nation. While almost useless from the military standpoint against external dangers, its operations in internal matters will accentuate and embitter the racial problem; and in addition, it will act as a serious handicap to British commercial life, thus endangering the undue expansion of other foreign commercial interests, the ultimate effect of which on our National life may be disastrously painful both to England and to India."

Justice, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

Newspapers as political weapons.

5. The Justice, of the 9th January, observes:—"In the course of an article this morning on 'newspapers as political weapons' the Madras Times refers thus to the Home Rule movement:—" 'It is an urban, and principally a newspaper, movement, and while a tribute to the enormous influence that can be exerted by a vigorously conducted press, has little other influence.' This is absolutely true, so far as the people of India are concerned. In India far more than in most other countries the nation lives in the villages, and the Home Rule propagandists who are most of them Brahmans are not heard of there. . . Artificial agitations they turn against with scorn and as the demand for Home Rule is purely an artificial demand, the rural population in India have taken no interest in it. There is yet another reason. Between the agitators and the real people there is nothing common, but the British Government above them. An impassable gulf separates them, and, further, the rural population of India have nothing but contempt for a movement led by an irresponsible foreign adventuress; for they are not only a self-respecting people but a people who are intensely conservative and who, both by tradition and instinct, are loyal and faithful people to their benefactors. . . Take the Montagu-Chelmsford report and all that has followed it! Is there not sufficient evidence to prove that both Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford have been taken in by the hollow cry raised by the Home Rulers? Mrs. Besant says that cock-a-doodle do is the highest wisdom, and the entire Home Rule fraternity raise the same cry. . . If the Home Rule movement has been anything more substantial than an empty volume of sound, Mr. Montagu, Lord Chelmsford and some of the various Local Governments in India must be held responsible for it. . . A few opportunists, taking advantage of the situation created by the war and anxious to seize the reins of power for themselves from the British rulers, started the movement which had for its only two pillars, the tongue and the pen of the Home Ruler and nothing else, and but for the recognition of it by the Government it would have been a newspaper movement and nothing better."

The Madras Administration Report.

6. In reviewing this report under the heading "an amazing performance" the Hindu, for the 9th January, says:—"Taken as the despairing shriek of a bureaucracy which finds its position threatened, the introduction to the Administration Report may excite a certain amount of commiseration, but when a Government descends to the methods of mud-slinging much favoured of the baser kind of controversialist, it is time for the public to enter an emphatic protest and demand that those in authority, if they cannot avoid making a muddle of administration, should at least do their muddling through with some spark of self-respect. . . It requires hardihood of a particularly brazen kind to expect that a presentation which bears a strong family resemblance to the lurid penny dreadfuls issued by the Indo-British Association for Home consumption, could be accepted by the public as a judicially impartial summing up of the events of a stormy period. . . In a statement choked with the rank growth of misstatements and half-truths it is so surprising to come across an acknowledgment, however grudging, of possible good in a Home Ruler that we hasten to give it conspicuous mention. It is stated and for the diligent student of such publications it is there plain to read, that 'the Indian branch of the (Indian Defence) Force undoubtedly owed much, in the initial stages of its inauguration, to the advocacy of Mrs. Besant.' While on this subject of the mentality that could be responsible for this amazing production which with unconscious humour calls itself the Madras Administration Report, we may refer briefly to a reference to ourselves wherein the charitable suggestion is made that Indian newspapers, the Hindu being the example, vary their opinions and methods of comment with a sole eye to their circulation list. To so amazing a suggestion there is no possible reply except to ignore it and we draw attention to it only as it throws an illuminating light on the frame of mind of the author of the Report. . . The Report throws a lurid light on the mentality behind actions hitherto inexplicably inept. Now the public have not only the experience of the mistakes of its rulers, but also some knowledge of their psychology and will learn what to expect. But after all, 'I told you so' is scant consolation for a sufferer and it is time to inquire how much longer a state of things is to be tolerated in which the Government is openly partisan, covertly mutinous of superior control and fiercely resentful of criticism when it errs. In other words how much longer are we to be ruled by the Welbys and the Hunters, for undoubtedly theirs is the mentality which the Government has had superimposed on its own? . . . The people of this unhappy Presidency may not in reason always hanker after a member of the Peerage, and an ex-Cabinet Minister and an ex-Radical to rule over them, but surely they deserve something better than a cabal of arrogant merchants?"

Hindu, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919

Justice, of the 10th January, has the following:—"In the last Administration Report of the Madras Presidency which, by the way, has not yet reached us,—another instance of official backing we believe,—the activities of the Home Rulers and their organs are reviewed, and we are told by a local Brahman prophet that it is 'the despairing shriek of a bureaucracy which finds its position threatened. . . In another place the question is asked, 'how much longer are we to be ruled by the Welbys and the Hunters.' Of course, the answer is suggested in the qestion. May we ask in turn how long are we to be ruled by the Ayyars, the Achariyars, the Ayyangars and the Raojis? If the existence of the present bureaucracy is actually threatened, so also is the rule of this Indian species which ought to go back to its old trade. But this is not all. Here is a fling at us: 'On the genesis of the non-Brahman movement the Government is admittedly better informed than a mystified public'. This is the usual trick employed by the self-seeking Brahman to retain all the power he has seized and to exclude the non-Brahman from his share of it. But for the hundreth time we fling back this Brahmanical lie at the face of him who has uttered it. Verily, the pampered Brahman has been running amuck like an infuriated Billingsgate heroine."

Justice, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

7. Referring to the news received that the party of Lloyd George has been returned to power in the House of Commons as a result of the general election, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st January, observes:—It is his party that made the pronouncement of the 20th August 1917, and now that it has come to power, we may trust that that pronouncement will be given effect to. But that pronouncement has been worded very carefully by experienced persons and India's future reforms will greatly depend on the interpretations likely to be put on it. Among the adherents of Mr. Lloyd George there are a larger number of Conservatives than Liberals, and therefore the interpretation of that pronouncement cannot be very liberal. We are not satisfied even with its interpretation by Mr. Montagu, who belongs to Liberal party. It remains to be seen what the future interpretation of it is to be. Whatever it may be, what we demand is nothing but our rights and we trust that Mr. Lloyd George and others, who have been proclaiming that the object of the war was only to safeguard the rights of every people, will not neglect our rights.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

The general election in England.

8. Remarking that the victory of the coalitionists at the general election in England was not expected by many here and that the object of Mr. Lloyd George in hurrying the election, for fear that a delay might lead to other parties gaining power, has been accomplished, the Hindu Nesan, of the 6th January, observes:—If the Labour Party had gained a victory, it would have been beneficial to India. It is surprising indeed that they failed and that Mr. Asquith, who was for a long period the Prime Minister of England before Mr. Lloyd George, was not returned to the House of Commons. The one favourable item for us is that Mr. Montagu has been elected again. From the fact that it was the Coalition Ministers, who have now come back to power, that made the announcement of August 1917, we may think that the reforms in the Indian administration will be carried out easily. But we cannot be too sure of this as though the principle of the announcement is admitted by all parties, each party puts its own interpretation on it. So the interpretation of the announcement by the new ministry will depend on which party is influential in it.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

The new ministry.

The Desabhaktan, of the 6th January, thinks that, though Mr. Lloyd George may have good influence in the new Parliament, it may not benefit India and agreeing with the view expressed by the London correspondent of an English paper that there is a likelihood of the new Parliament postponing the consideration of the question of Home Rule for India and Ireland, adds:—Mr. Bonar Law has 384 supporters in the new Parliament, and he is a Conservative and is not in favour of Home Rule for India and Ireland. His supporters are, therefore, sure to vote only against the liberal proposals of Mr. Lloyd George. So the latter will have to act according to the wishes of Mr. Bonar Law, in order to safeguard his position. Mr. Lloyd George declared that the aspirations of India would be considered after the conclusion of the peace. It remains to be seen how far these words will prove true.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

Referring to the results of the general election, the Lokopakari, of the 6th January, says that, if Mr. Lloyd George had not decided to form a Coalition Government, the Unionists would have come to power and remarks:—It is not known how long this Coalition Government will continue in power, and it is doubtful whether it can satisfactorily solve the problems that have arisen in England and the British Empire as a result of the war. As the narrow-minded Unionists form the majority in the new Government, it will be very difficult for the ideals of India to be gained under it.

Lokopakari, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The Irish situation.

9. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd January, writes:—It is true that the future of Ireland is gloomy. . . Regarding the Irish situation the Madras Mail observes that instead of working with firmness the Government has shown a too lenient attitude in Ireland, and that if it repeats the blunder in India, the result will be disastrous. . . Anglo-Indian papers like the Mail see no other remedy than repressive measures which should be but rarely resorted to for the preservation of order. If they are constantly used, the people will lose their respect for them and unrest may grow in an astonishing manner. To solve the Irish problem even now, the Irish people should at once be granted self-government within the empire and the right of self-determination. . . The Sinn Fein party, for want of support, will then die a natural death. . .

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

The pay of the Police.

10. Anent the news that the Government of India have addressed a letter to the Secretary of State for India, suggesting an increase of the pay of the Imperial Police Service, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th January, expresses itself against an increase of the salary of the higher officials in this department and would recommend an increase in the pay of the constabulary. It says that many remark that a large amount of expenditure is incurred only on this department in India, and points out that it is the duty of the Government to remove this defect.

(b) Courts.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

Trial by jury.

11. Referring to the opinion said to have been expressed by a Judge in England that the Government are trusting too much responsibility upon a Judge to make him decide questions affecting the lifetime of a man, without the assistance of persons of judicial experience or a jury, the Swadesamitran, of the 6th January, observes:—Though the Congress has been urging from the very start that the system of trial by jury should be widened in India, it has not yet been done and some bureaucrats have also expressed themselves against it. But the above observation will prove the necessity of a jury in trials. There is also another reason for widening the jury system in India and that is that, while, in England, the Judge and the accused belong to the same race, and have the same customs and habits, the majority of the Judges in India are Anglo-Indians and have not a good idea of the customs and habits of the Indian accused brought before them. Will the Government introduce the necessary reform in this matter promptly, at least hereafter?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

Defective education.

12. The Swadesamitran, of the 28th December, writes:—Those conversant with the nature of the people of this country know full well that all classes of the Indians have a taste for education and would have freely resorted to it, if they had the required facilities and had not to spend therefor. It is owing to lack of education that the people do not observe the rules of sanitation and succumb to many preventable diseases. Then, again, one with education does any work better than one who has it not. So, it is the duty of the Government, which is interested in the welfare of its people, to educate all of them, and all the civilized countries in the world have realized this as their foremost duty. It is rare to find a single uneducated man in Japan, which started progress only recently. But, in our country, it is rare to find educated persons. Though our cries in this direction have not been heeded by the Government till now, we hope they will note at least the remark of the Industries Commission that one of the causes for the backward condition of industries in India is the want of education among the labouring classes, and take prompt steps in accordance therewith. The Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya describes in his dissenting minute how the industrial advancement of England was materially helped by the spread of education, both general and scientific. Apart from the duty of the Government to spend money on education, the amount so spent is sure to be returned tenfold. So irrespective of the cost involved, education should be made compulsory for a period necessary to obtain substantial knowledge. If India is to become prosperous, primary education should be made compulsory until a certain age, secondary education imparted mostly in the vernaculars, and prompt arrangements made for imparting industrial, scientific and mechanical education.

13. While appreciating the observations of the President of the All-India Muslim Educational Conference held recently at Surat urging the necessity of imparting spiritual instruction to the Moslems, the Desabhaktan, of the 30th December, is surprised at his statement that the Government cannot render pecuniary assistance for such instruction in public schools and remarks :—Perhaps he voiced only the opinion of the Government here. In the face of the united demand of the leaders of all communities for the imparting of religious instruction in public schools and their opinion that State aid is indispensable for it, we do not know if the Government intend pleading the old policy of 'non-interference' still in the matter.

The education of the Moslems.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

14. Referring to the statement of a correspondent in the Times that a Jesuit College will be shortly opened in Madras, the Desabhaktan, of the 30th December, observes :—We know by experience what benefits the students attending such colleges derive. As they have a strong attachment to their professors, they take the views of the latter as gospel and discard the tenets of Hinduism. Further, as the students that associate with Jesuit missionaries hold fast to the end to the views imbibed by them in their early days, their patriotism also wanes. Considering all this, we cannot but apprehend a new danger by the establishment of this college.

A new Jesuit College in Madras.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

(e) Local and Municipal.

15. Referring to the outbreak of plague in Guntūr, the Andhraprakasika, of the 30th December, urges that the Government should help the Guntūr Municipality with funds in its efforts to stamp out the disease, and suggests the appointment in Guntūr of two or three more doctors to combat the disease.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

16. A correspondent writing in the special new year supplement of the Manorama, of the 3rd January, on the subject of village panchayats, refers to the charm of self-government to man and beast and to the need of guiding the administration along the track of public opinion. Adverting to Local Boards "which are falsely designated institutions of 'local self-government'", the correspondent says :—These are neither 'local' nor 'self-governing'. It is mere political blindness to think that a taluk board or district board with a majority consisting of those who sing the praises of a foreign Head of the district and those who dance to the tune set by a foreign Government, is in any way a symbol of self-government. . . Even village panchayats are a delusion. . . To call them panchayats is mere perversion of language.

Village panchayats.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 3rd Jan. 1919.

(f) Salt and Abkāri.

17. Adverting to a hand bill issued by the Madras Temperance League detailing the evils of drink, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th January, says that this league should not stop with issuing hand bills on this subject, but should set up an agitation to invite the attention of the Local Government to the evils of drink and observes :—Though it may not be possible to get rid of drink altogether, it is necessary for the Government to assist at least in reducing it. It is quite natural for them to be disinclined to give up a portion of the large income they derive every year from the sale of intoxicants. But it is the duty of the Government to care for the welfare of the people. The Licensing Boards were brought into existence only to reduce the consumption of liquor, etc., and this object has been gained in the city by reducing the hours for the sale of intoxicants and the number of shops and increasing the powers of the aforesaid Boards. Greater benefits will result, if the sale of liquor to youths is prohibited legally. It is youths that should be protected in this matter more than old men; for the former, in addition to spoiling themselves, also spoil those with whom they associate. If the Government had controlled the consumption of liquor on account of the war itself, they could have ascertained the public opinion on this matter. They have done this in England, and it behoves the authorities here too to devise means to reduce the consumption of liquor.

The evils of drink.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Jan. 1919.

(k) General.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Pioneer on Mr. Malaviya.

18. Referring to the remark of the Pioneer that, though Mr. Malaviya dwelt at length on the services rendered by India in the war, he made no mention at all about his opposition to the proposal that India should give a hundred million pounds to England, the Swadesamitran, of the 28th December, writes:—It is well known to all that Pandid Malaviya did oppose the proposal, and his view is that, considering the abject poverty of India, she cannot bear that burden. Leaving this alone, has that paper forgotten that many European companies, which have amassed huge profits during the war, are opposing the levy of the Excess Profits Tax? It does not see again the lame excuses offered by many Europeans here to escape compulsory military service, when it was enforced in this country. When people, who make enormous profits and enjoy benefits, are refusing to render services which are within their means, is it wrong for the Hon'ble Pandit to have said that India should not be burdened with a weight too heavy for her to bear?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

Exorbitant salaries of officials.

19. Remarking that the scale of salaries paid to officials in this country is far higher than that obtaining in other countries, the Swadesamitran, of the 28th December, says:—The Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of reforms will further increase the number of officials. Besides this, it is proposed to entrust all costly departments, such as those relating to education and sanitation, to the people, for which sufficient funds will not be available. So to meet the increased demand, a fresh tax will have to be imposed. The people are already complaining that the burden of taxation is too heavy for them, and how can they pay the new taxes? As remarked by the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, the salaries of all officials from the Governor downwards should be reduced. In addition to this, if the industries of the country are also improved, the economic condition of the people will become better.

Indigenous medicinal drugs.

20. Quoting an observation of a Commission appointed as early as 1870 to investigate and report on the indigenous medicinal drugs of India, that India need not feel handicapped on occasions when, either on account of war or high prices, medicinal drugs could not be obtained from England, as the ingredients for preparing drugs are available in plenty in India, the Swadesamitran, of the 28th December, says:—It is now fifty years since this observation was made. Apart from the rise in the price of certain drugs during the period of the great war, some of them could not be obtained at all. None can deny that not only the people, but the authorities also, were put to serious loss by this and yet what has been done? To what extent have the bureaucrats cared for the warning given to them fifty years back?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Reforms Committees.

21. The Swadesamitran, of the 28th December, says:—The attitude of the bureaucrats in the matter of the reforms is anything but satisfactory. Looking at the constitution of the Reforms Committees, it is reported that Sir William Vincent was very particular about nominating only those that were keeping aloof from the Congress, as members thereof. Even as regards the witnesses selected to give evidence before these Committees, it is associations recently started and those who are hostile to the reform proposals that have been asked to give evidence.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

The Reforms Committees.

The Lokopakari, of the 30th December, raises its voice against the enquiry of these committees being conducted confidentially, and against the members of the Home Rule party having been excluded from these committees and remarks:—The main object of political reform in India is to set right the bureaucratic method of administration. What advantage can then be gained if such bureaucrats are to appoint the members of the Reforms Committees according to their sweet will and pleasure?

The last session of the Congress at Delhi.

22. Referring to the question raised in the speech of the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Congress, as to why the principle of self-determination should not be applied to India, which freely rendered help during the war in the shape of men and money, when it is decided to apply it to Ireland, which had negotiations with the enemy and even threw obstacles in the way of recruitment for the war, the Desabhaktan, of the 27th December, observes:—Let the English people note the disloyalty of Ireland and the loyalty of India. The former is about to win Home Rule, while it is doubtful whether the latter will get it at least in name. We concur with the view of the Chairman when he clearly points out that the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform proposals contain features which are prejudicial to complete liberty, and that the liberty now enjoyed by India in local self-government is a false one, and when he refers to the absurdity about the inquiries conducted by "Commissions".

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Dec. 1918.

In commenting on the presidential speech, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th December, refers to his observation that it is not proper to make crores of people forfeit their rights on account of the mischief of a few revoulutionists, in the face of the admission by the Rowlatt Committee themselves that the Government have been putting down these revolutionists only by means of the loyalty of the Indians, and observes:—Are these few revolutionists themselves responsible for their actions? For how many years have the Indians been demanding certain reforms? If these reforms had been introduced then and there, how could have any discontent been caused to the people? Let the Anglo-Indians who, in their selfishness, are blind to the interests of the Empire and are trying to prevent any benefits being conferred upon India, consider calmly about the words of the President to the effect that, if the wishes of the people are carried out at least now, India will become contented and will prove to be a strong support to the British Empire.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Dec. 1918.

The Desabhaktan, of the 28th December, also refers to the presidential speech and says:—Our readers are aware that Pandit Malaviya is occupying a position which should have been held by Mr. Tilak. If the latter had presided, his speech would have been in a different strain. Though the address of the Honourable Pandit is bristling with ideas, it is to be noted that he has slyly introduced his moderate views in many places. The moderate principle of relying upon others is still raising its head in the Congress. The omission of the name of Mr. Tilak from the list of notable men, mentioned by the Pandit in the beginning of his speech, is noteworthy. Though Mr. Tilak is not appreciated in these days of bureaucratic preponderance in the administration, he is sure to be worshipped as God when Home Rule comes to be established.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Dravidan, of the 31st December, reproduces in Tamil the concluding portion of the presidential address of this session, while the remaining proceedings of the session are similarly reproduced by the following papers, some in extenso and some in abstract, in the issues noted against each:—

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

The last session of the Congress at Delhi.

The Desabhaktan—The 27th, 30th and 31st December 1918, and the 1st and 2nd January 1919.

The Swadesamitran—The 30th and 31st December 1918, and the 1st and 2nd January 1919.

The Hindu Nesan—The 31st December 1918, and the 2nd and 3rd January 1919.

The Indian National Congress.

Reviewing the proceedings of the Indian National Congress held at Delhi and referring to the principle of 'self-determination', the Kerala Bharati, of the 3rd January, points out that it is only fifty thousand Indians that demand Home Rule, and only twelve thousand of these were represented at the Congress. The rest among the thirty crores of the population of India do not advance any such claim. It may therefore be contended that the 'will of the people' is in favour of administration with a British tone and against one dominated by the higher classes of the people of India. No one is against the granting of such progressive self-government as will provide for the peculiar conditions of India with its conflicting castes and creeds and with 80 per cent of its population absolutely illiterate. The authorities can only adopt a via media between conflicting demands advanced by the various sections.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 1st Jan. 1919. & MANORAMA, Calicut, 24th Dec. 1918.

The Kerala Sanchari, of the 1st January, in its leading article on the Congress considers that the prohibition by Government of the presidential procession to pass through certain streets of Delhi was unprecedented, improper and unreasonable.

Referring to the same prohibition, a note in the Manorama, of the 24th December, ascribes the action of the Government in the matter to want of knowledge and tact.

The Kerala Sanchari concurs with the President in his opinion that, in view of the fact that a third of India is efficiently administered by Indian Princes, and the land has produced eminent men in all walks of life (names mentioned), it cannot be contended that India is not yet fit for self-government.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 4th Jan. 1919.

The Delhi Congress.

Referring to the last Delhi Congress, the Kistnapatrika, of the 4th January, observes:—. . . Having failed to drink the nectar of their national language which is purifying the whole of India from the Himalayas to the Vindiya mountain, our young men are running into hysterics of joy over the saline foam that has come to them over the crest western seas, as if it were the very elixir of life. . . This resolution about the declaration of our rights is the most important of all resolutions. Indians must get these rights, at least to deserve the name of men. These rights have not been created by man, nor are they the gift of Kings; they are the birth-rights of man and have been deeprooted in human nature itself from time immemorial. . . To grant any number of reforms, without conceding these, is like decorating a corpse. This declaration of rights echoing from the mouth of Khaparde has given the Delhi Congress an unprecedented prominence. . . The resolution passed at the Bombay Congress demanding complete self-government within 15 years is also harsh to Mr. Srinivasa Sastri's ear. Mr. Sastri argues that there should be no such time limit. Let him wish that the grant of self-government should be entirely left to the descretion of the British Parliament! In the face of the resolution asking for self-determination, to leave the grant of all future reforms to the mercy of the British merchants is absurd and unjust. Mr. Sastri's two wishes are attempts to swim against the current. That the Delhi Congress should reject them is but just and natural. . . Grant complete provincial autonomy immediately and full responsible government within six years. This request is causing panic among the Anglo-Indian journals and those newspapers which follow in their footsteps, as if the whole world is going to be upset . . . The courage of the bureaucracy and our Anglo-Indians to oppose the movement of freedom is unparallelled. We do not know what to say of the observation of the Mail, that to request the grant of full responsible government within six years is "Russian Bolshevism" . . . It is necessary to send some eminent men who will be able to create some stir in England at the present juncture. It remains to be seen whom the committee will select. We hope that it will be practical enough to include at least Mrs. Besant among those to be sent.

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Congress.

Referring to the attempt made by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the President-elect of the Congress to secure the co-operation of the moderates, a note in the Samadarsi, of the 28th December, forecasts that even if the moderates stand aloof, the Congress has nothing to lose and that at this time when the advocates of freedom have increased in number throughout India the Session will certainly terminate successfully by the increased number of representatives attending the Congress and by the importance of the resolutions they will pass. This year's Congress will again proclaim that patriotism and attention to administrative matters are steadily increasing among Indians.

The fulfilment of this last observation is recorded in the next issue of the paper, dated 4th January 1919.

The Yogakshemam, of the 3rd January, approves of the presidential addresS and the resolutions passed at the Congress as most opportune.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The Malayala Manorama, of the 31st December, observes that (President) Wilson's 'self-determination' is the chorus of all the speeches at the Delhi Congress. The different races of Europe are going to have separate and independent governments. If the principle be applied to India, several kingdoms will have to be formed in India. Wilson will have to establish separate governments for the Mahrattas, the Bengalis, the Punjabis; the Dravidas, the Brahmans, the adi-Dravidas, etc. How this will be possible, no one seems to have explained.

The Congress.

MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, 31st Dec. 1918.

The Malayala Manorama, of the 4th January, reviews the course of the Indian National Congress from its establishment to the conclusion of the last session at Delhi. It notices the extremist resolutions passed at the last session and observes:—"If all these things are considered, it is evident that the Congress has made up its mind to fight with all its might against the British Government. But it remains to be seen whether the result of such a fight will be what is expected by them or just the opposite."

MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, 4th Jan. 1919.

23. The Desabhaktan, of the 30th and 31st December 1918 and 3rd January 1919 and the Swadesamitran, of the 30th December 1918 and 3rd January 1919, publish in Tamil the speeches of the Chairman of the Reception Committee and the President of this session, while the Hindu Nesan, of the 4th January, publishes an abstract of the presidential address alone.

The last session of the All-India Moslem League at Delhi.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 30th & 31st Dec. 1918 & 3rd Jan. 1919.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

In commenting on the presidential address, the Hindu Nesan, of the 6th January, says:—The statement in this address that the British administration in India has been conducted for the last 150 years without taking into consideration popular consent and benefit and that the Indians deem this to be cruel, should be taken to be true in a way. It is difficult to refute the observation of the President again that the economic condition of India has been reduced under this administration, on account of the Government not having developed the economic resources of the country and all money available here being sent out of it. Many European capitalists are doing good business in India and boast of having improved Indian trade and industries. But what they do is only to use the Indians for acquiring enormous profits and send these to their country, without allowing the Indians to have any portion thereof. The Indians have only to work for wages and eke out a living therefrom. Not finding enough work here even for wages, they have had to proceed to foreign countries in search of living and suffer all kinds of hardships there, which no European can bear even for a day.

Referring to the proceedings of this session, the Swadesamitran, of the 31st December, observes:—It behoves all British statesmen and authorities to consider carefully the matters that are ranking at present in the minds of our Muhammadan brethren, because the bulk of the Muhammadan population live only in the British Empire, and their sacred shrines are in Turkey, the Sultan of Turkey being deemed to be their religious head. The Muhammadans are very anxious about the future of Turkey and of the Calipha and it is the primary duty of the British to allay this anxiety. Time there was when Muhammadan States had achieved much distinction in Europe, but latterly all these have unfortunately disappeared one by one and Turkey and Persia are the only relics of the former glory. It remains to be seen what action the authorities are going to take on Doctor Ansari's remarks about the revolt of the Sheriff of Mecca against the Sultan. None can easily forget that the Muhammadans are the most pertinacious and bigoted in their religious views. So it is needless for us to urge the importance of the authorities and others paying special consideration for their religious feelings and acting in a satisfactory manner. We strongly urge on those, who are hostile to our inspirations and who want to create a split among us, to note the words of the Hon'ble Mr. Fajlul Huq, the President of the session, that if he refrained from declaring that the bureaucratic system of administration should cease at once, he would not be acting according to his conscience and what he saw personally and would prove false to his country and the traditions of the Muslim League.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Madras tramways.

24. The Desabhaktan, of the 28th December, remarks that the passengers by the tramways in Madras are subjected to great hardships, though the profits made by the Madras Tramway Company are enormous, and instancing the inconvenience caused by the company insisting upon five persons sitting on a bench which can conveniently accommodate only four fairly big-sized persons, the irregular running of the cars, and the consequent inconveniences caused to those going to schools and offices, requests the company to pay a little attention to the conveniences of the public in the same way in which they are mindful about their gain and to see that the Tramway Inspectors feel it their duty to arrange for the proper running of cars, besides checking the tickets.

The same paper refers, in its issue of the 30th December 1918, to the increase in the fares for certain journeys from the 1st January 1919 and remarks:—It is regrettable that the company should have raised the charges, without devising means to remove the inconveniences of the public. Further, it is a fact to be noted that it is the three tickets in respect of which the fares have been raised that have the largest sale and therefore this will surely enhance the company's profits. The difficulty caused to the public by this at this period of high prices is indescribable.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

A correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 31st December, also raises his voice against the increase of fares, and remarks that before taking this step the company should have, in all fairness, consulted the convenience of the public, and that as they did not do so it is the duty of the Government to interfere at once and safeguard the welfare of the public.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

The Swadesamitran, of the 31st December, also objects to this increase of fares and, pointing out that the Tramway Company cannot even plead a war as an excuse for their action, observes:—They may say that the increase is after all only by a quarter of an anna, which is a very paltry sum. But who can deny that this will be a burden on the common people travelling by tram every day?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

The Madras tramways.

While appreciating the action of the Tramway authorities in reserving the front seat in every car for women, the Hindu Nesan, of the 4th January, thinks that this is not enough and that the back seat also should be so reserved. It adds that, as by sitting in the first and last seats, women and children with them will be exposed to sun and rain and also to danger, it will be preferable to reserve the last two seats inside the car for women.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 29th Dec. 1918.

Curious nominations of officials.

25. The Swadesamitran, in its supplement of the 29th December, publishes in Tamil an extract from Ditcher's notes in the Capital reproduced in New India of the 28th idem.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

The Congress deputation.

26. Referring to the announcement made in the Congress that the Government of India have relaxed the order prohibiting the Congress deputation from going to England, the Swadesamitran, of the 30th December, observes:—We have to say that this relaxation has been made only half-heartedly. The Government order seems to say that the time has not yet arrived to necessitate any deputation to visit England and so it is not possible to afford the deputation all the special facilities promised before, and that only a limited number of persons should form the deputation. Is any additional evidence needed to show how far the authorities respect the opinion of the Indian public?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

The right of taxation.

27. The Swadesamitran, of the 30th December, writes:—The welfare of India has been prejudicially affected for a long time, on account of the Government of India not having the power to impose taxes as they like. England was able to improve her industries only by imposing export, import and counter duties in accordance with the exigencies of the times. When the weaving industry was at its infancy in England, and when cloths of Indian manufacture were in great demand on account of their nicety of texture, the Parliament raised the import duty on cloths to 81 per cent of their value, in order to further the sale of English-made goods. So, unless the Government of India are empowered to levy the aforesaid three taxes, their attempts to improve the industries of the country will not prove completely successful. When this matter was brought up before the Imperial Legislative Council in 1916, the Hon'ble Sir William Clarke stated that it was the wish of the British Government that the question in regard to the power of taxation should be considered only after the close of the war, and also argued at length that this power alone could not affect any improvement in industries. Though the latter argument is true enough, if this power of taxation is not given to the Government of India, foreign countries can render any steps taken to improve the industries in India ineffective. To quote an example, a large quantity of sugar is now received in India from Java. Jaggery is obtainable in plenty here and the Industries Commission have recommended that the Government of India should do all that is necessary to manufacture sugar therefrom and also to improve the quality of the sugarcane produced in this country. If the Government take any steps in this direction, they will certainly affect the people of Java, and if they join together, it may not be possible to carry on the Indian trades profitably without imposing an import duty. Instances of such compact among the Americans are very common, whereby they have succeeded in making it impossible for others to compete with them. Just as England saved her industries in those days by levying import duties, if we are also empowered to strengthen Indian industries, then we will also be in a stage when we can allow free-trade. Stress is laid on this point by the President of the Industrial Conference at Delhi. We had to write at such length only to prove that, without political freedom, all efforts to improve industries will prove futile, and it is an admitted fact that the right of imposing taxes should be the first that India should obtain. We trust that this indispensible right will be granted to India by the British Government, who wanted to settle this matter after the close of the war and are going to determine the relationship between Britain and other countries. The Industries Commission has stated that the industrial condition of India is such as to cause danger both to herself and to the Empire during a war. If India is to be saved from such a danger, it is quite necessary to accord to her the right to impose taxes so that foreign countries might be incapacitated from putting obstacles in the way of the improvement of indigenous industries.

How to obtain swaraj.

28. The following is an extract from a long article contributed by a correspondent to the Desabhaktan of the 28th December :—It is well known that our leaders are toiling hard in various ways with a sincere desire that our people should attain liberty and lead a glorious life like other nations, and that the bureaucrats and the Anglo-Indians are throwing innumerable obstacles in the way of these efforts proving successful. But I seriously doubt whether our country will attain swaraj as a result of these efforts of our leaders. It is my firm belief that our country cannot at all attain liberty, so long as our leaders have no self-confidence and self-effort and adopt a begging policy of relying upon others. A careful scrutiny of the world's history shows that, so far, no country ruled by a foreign nation has been able to attain liberty through the favour and broad-mindedness of those foreign rulers. Can we believe that, for the mere asking, the bureaucrats, who are carrying on the administration in an arrogant spirit, wielding unlimited powers, will surrender all their powers to the public? It is but an empty dream. But in view of the welfare of crores of people and to establish the glory of the land of Bharata which has been, from the very beginning, imparting knowledge, providing sustenance and preaching civilisation to the whole world, the obstinacy of the bureaucrats should be crushed. It is only then that they will entrust their powers to the people. Some of our leaders have begun to appeal to President Wilson of America to plead with England for granting liberty to India. But there is no room to believe that he will intercede on our behalf. At the outset, it will not at all be edifying for the ruler of a State, however much he may be intimate and influential with the ruler of another State, to interfere in matters relating to the internal administration of the latter. A third of the population of the United States happens to be Irish and yet President Wilson's suggestion on behalf of Ireland has not been taken by England. How, then, can his interference be useful for India? So we should give up the idea that President Wilson has incarnated to espouse our cause and get us salvation. Then again certain leaders believe that India may be benefited if the labour party in England gets into power. This view is quite erroneous, because the representatives and leaders of the Labour Party in England are bound to protect the industries of England and not those of India. If India is granted liberty, the first thing we will do is to impose heavy import duties on all the foreign articles that are brought in here and that are unnecessary for us, so as to prevent their competing with our industries and crushing them. By our doing this, the English articles, which form the bulk of the imports now, will not find a sale in India. We should remember that the articles of England are purchased only in India, and that, as all the other countries of the world depend on their own indigenous industries, the trade of England with them is very meagre. So if English articles are not sold in India, the industrialists in England will have no work to do and will lose their living. Will the Labour Party in England do anything which will lead to this result? So we should also give up the hope of getting any assistance from the Labour Party in England. Therefore if we are to progress and obtain liberty, we should toil for it ourselves, without dependiug on others. The one common lesson taught to us by the histories of the various countries of the world is 'self-reliance'. It is not in this country alone that the bureaucrats are a stumbling block to popular opinion. In every country they have acted similarly, and thrown obstacles in the way of the people acquiring liberty. They have the extraordinary influence obtained from their powers and also the support of the military. They will use all these in such a manner as to curb as much as possible the thirst for liberty among the people. They have already started this work in our country. We do not know what all things will happen before we obtain our rights. Young brethren: The mother calls you for help. Do you hear her plaintive tone? Will you come forward to help her to get out of the deep pit into which she has fallen? Come, come in large numbers, and secure salvation for your mother land. Awake from slumber. The mother who gave you life and food is wailing. You will be the worst of sinners, if you remain indifferent at this time of danger. Are you not the descendants of holy Rishis, and have you not inherited their passive force? Exhibit that force. Do not agitate wildly. Do not flinch. This is not the time for hesitation. Come, come to work to enable India to obtain Swaraj and live happily.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

The next meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

29. Referring to the order of the Government refusing permission for the members to move a resolution or make a speech on any subject at the next meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, unconnected with those introduced by the official members, the Lokopakari, of the 30th December, observes:—Legislative Councils exist only for the purpose of enabling the people to acquaint the Government with their grievances, through their representatives. What is the purpose served by these councils if, at their meetings held from time to time, opportunities are not afforded for the consideration of their grievances? If want of time is pleaded as an excuse for the inability of the Government to consider the resolutions of the people's representatives, when is the time to dawn for the authorities to realize that nothing is more important than the question of considering the people's grievances?

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 27th Dec. 1918.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 27th December, writes:—While the Hon'ble Pandit Malavya has been urging that the meetings of the Council should be held more frequently, the Government of India have now announced that during the budget session no resolutions will be allowed on other subjects! The reason is that the Government are very busy with the questions connected with the Reform Scheme and the post-war problems! What weighty reason indeed!

Perhaps the Government thinks that the popular representatives in the Council need have no share in the consideration of post-war problems. It would, perhaps, be found troublesome if the popular representatives should confront the Government with some interpellation or resolution on matters, such as the trade policy, which will come up for discussion at the Peace Conference! To tighten the grip on the throat is a sure method of curing cough. So, too, the preclusion of discussion on other subjects is a means of keeping out unpleasant topics.

30. Referring to the presidential speech of Mr. Jehangir Petit at this conference, in which he is said to have complained of the inequal treatment given to the Indians and the British by the Government and cited as an illustration the fact that, out of about 250 officers on the Munitions Board, only three are Indians and that even these hold only posts below the rank of Assistant Controller, the Desabhaktan, of the 31st December, says:—Are the Government aware that it is this difference in treatment that is at the botton of all the unrest and discontent among the Indians? Where is it laid down that the Indians should patiently put up with such a treatment in the land of their birth? If the offices in England are made to be held by the people of Japan instead of by the English themselves, will the English people keep quiet?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

The Industrial Conference at Delhi.

The Desabhaktan, of the 30th and 31st December 1918, the Swadesamitran, of the 30th idem, and the Dravidan, of the 2nd and 3rd January, reproduce in Tamil the speech of the President of this Conference.

DESABHAKTAN Madras, 30th & 31st Dec. 1918.
SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.
DRAVIDAN, Madras. 2nd & 3rd Jan. 1919.

The Industrial Conference at Delhi.

31. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 31st December, says that three parties have now sprung up in the Congress, viz., the moderates, the nationalists and those that try to bring the two together, and makes the following observations among others:—The majority of the moderates being in favour of the bureaucrats are disliked by the people. We do not think the efforts of the compromising party will succeed and so they will do well to join the nationalists. . . The two amendments moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastriar are detrimental to the country's progress. It is really surprising that even in these days, when the atmosphere of the whole world is ringing with the cry of liberty, Mr. Sastriar should cling to his old moderate views.

A split in the Congress.

32. Referring to the hue and cry raised by the London merchants against the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of reforms, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st January, observes:—It is but natural for those, who were till now solely enjoying all profits, to raise this cry, but are these aware of the mental pain caused to the Indians by their interests and rights not having received due consideration till now? How can people who are intent only on self-interest have any idea of the welfare of others or be inclined to know it? However much these merchants may cry out, they cannot monopolize the profits any longer. That time is long past. If they want to make a profit in the ordinary course, they cannot do so, unless they co-operate heartily with the Indians.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

India and foreign merchants.

The same paper invites attention to a speech of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce in the United States of America, in which he is reported to have warned the Americans against yielding to the natural inclination to strengthen their export trade, until the countries whose industries have been crippled in the war have had time to rebuild the same, and observes:—The Indian Industries Commission has made it quite clear that the once famous Indian trade and industries have perished on account of heaps of foreign articles flooding the Indian market, and they have also indicated the lines on which Indian industries can be improved. The Viceroy has also signified in a recent speech his readiness to give effect to their recommendations soon. We hope that, if Indian industries are to improve, the Government will make the necessary arangements to prevent foreign articles from being brought into India in large quantities and competing with the Indian articles.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

The new year.

33. In a leader under this heading, welcoming the new year, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st January, observes:—The new year witnesses the downfall of tyranny and the supremacy of a benevolent government. It hears the sound of responsible government, smells the sweet fragrance of liberty, tastes the pleasure of fraternity and touches equality. It wears the crown of righteousness, holds justice in its hands and, clothed with patience, stands on the two legs of impartiality and truth. We therefore welcome the new year.

Dame Germany, who was till now bound by the chain called Kaiser, welcomes the new year with pleasure. It is not the British that broke her chains? The land of Bharata ruled over by the same British is being burned by the heat of the bureaucratic cruelty. Who else should put down this heat but the British? We trust that this new year will witness the decline of this cruelty and the establishment of British justice in India.

O Mother Bharata! You have taken the new year of your rulers to be a new year for you. Did you not think that your true sons who toiled for you, entered the prison for you and are suffering for you, will be liberated to-day? Did it happen?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

The new year honours.

34. Remarking that titles are now generally conferred only on those that seek the favour of the Government, and that they have therefore lost their value now, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st January, refers to the new year honours list this time and observes:—We are glad that the title of 'Diwan Bahadur' has been conferred on Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar, a venerable old gentleman, who was the originator of the split between the Brahmans and non-Brahmans in this Presidency, and who is the right hand of the Justice party. The Hon'ble Mr. M. Ramachandra Rao and the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achariyar have toiled hard for the benefit of the country and are deserving of the titles conferred on them. We are, however, surprised at the title of 'Rao Bahadur' conferred on Mr. O. Kandaswami Chettiyar.

HINDU NESAN. Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The new year honours.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 2nd January, remarks that the acceptance of titles conferred by Government is deemed by many to be equivalent to the acceptance of a bribe, and that the new year honours list this time contains the names of many persons, who were working against the interests of the Indians. It says that nothing else is known of the zamindar of Chunampet, who gets the title of Diwan Bahadur than that he is a zamindar and observes that the efforts of Mr. O. Kandaswami Chettiyar, as an anti-Brahman teacher, have not gone in vain, for they have secured him the title of Rao Bahadur.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The Dravidan, of the 2nd January, however, thinks that titles have as usual been conferred this year on those who have been seeking the good of the public and, appreciating specially the title of Diwan Bahadur conferred upon Mr. P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar, remarks that this is not quite an adequate recognition of the services rendered by him to the country.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

Referring to the news that Mr. Justice Rowlatt has been granted the title of K.C.S.I., in recognition of his meritorious work in India, the Desabhakatan, of the 3rd January, says:—We do not know what meritorious work he did in India. Perhaps he has been conferred this title merely because he was the president of a committee which inquired about seditious movements! A grand title for a meritorious work!

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The New Year Honours.

While congratulating the Malayali recipients of the New Year Honours, the Yogakshemam, of the 3rd January, notes that there are only a few in the Madras Presidency who have received important honours. It points out that four or five men of the non-Brahman movement have been simultaneously honoured but Doctor Nayar, their leader, gets nothing.

The Manorama, of the 3rd January, states that some who thrust themselves forward in season and out of season with the sole object of winning honours have been again disappointed this time. MANORAMA, Calicut, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The Malayala Manorama, of the 4th January, expresses surprise that not even a single person belonging to Travancore has been found worthy of inclusion in the Honours list. MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, 4th Jan. 1919.

The Samadarsi, of the 4th January, thinks that it may be on account of the gratitude of the bureaucracy towards the leaders of the non-Brahman movement for exerting themselves to strengthen foreign rule by proclaiming that India is surcharged with class hatred that Messrs. Tyagaraya Chetti and Kandaswami Chetti have been honoured with titles. SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 4th Jan. 1919.

The new year honour's list.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 1st January, in giving an extract from the list of recipients of honours which includes the names of the Hon'ble Khan Bahadur Muhammad Azizuddin Husain Sahib, C.I.E., I.S.O., Second Member of the Board of Revenue, and Muhammad Sibgatulla Sahib Bahadur, Chida, who have received the titles of the Order of the British Empire, and Khan Bahadur, respectively, congratulates the recipients, tenders its thanks to the Government and hopes that other deserving persons will be similarly decorated in future. JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

India's aid to the war.

35. Referring to the fact that the strength of the Indian army, which was only 3 lakhs at the commencement of the war, was 12 lakhs at the end, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st January, remarks :—Considering the total population of India, the authorities might have raised an army, not 12 lakhs, but 12 crores strong. But, in the beginning, they had neither the inclination to do so nor faith in the Indians. It was only after there arose a necessity for increasing the manpower available from India, that they began to seek the aid of the Indians. Even then if they had reposed full confidence in the Indians, they could have raised a far larger number of men. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

Eurasians in the army.

36. The Desabhaktan, of the 1st January, refers to the claim of the Eurasians to be permanently raised to the rank of British soldiers in the army, and says :—We say that as, under the law, the Eurasians are also Indians, to give them a higher status than the Indians in the army, is not only unjust but also against the Queen's Proclamation. Further, if the Eurasians are allowed to think that they are superior to the Indians, the internal peace of India will be at stake. Our wish is that they should also be considered as equal to the Indians without any class distinction. DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

All-India Medical Commission.

37. Referring to the proposal of the Government of India to appoint a Special Commission shortly to inquire about the existing medical posts in India, the Desabhaktan, of the 2nd January, observes :—It has become usual in India to appoint a Commission for everything, but no material benefit is derived from such commissions, as will be testified to by political experts. The object of appointing such commissions and spending the money of the Indians, therefore, is not easily discernible. It is Europeans that are mostly appointed as members of such commissions on large salaries, and every one knows how much of money is being spent in this direction. The frequent condemnation of this by the Indians has had no effect. The Public Services Commission has already made some inquiry in regard to the Indian Medical services, and so we do not see the necessity for a fresh commission now. DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The tour programme of the Governor.

38. The Desabhaktan, of the 2nd January, takes exception to the tour of His Excellency the Governor of Madras to Parlakimedi, Chatrapur and other places, on the ground that it entails a huge expenditure and that His Excellency can well pass through these places when he will have to go to Delhi to be present at the Conference of Provincial heads to be held there this month. DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

Mr. Montagu in Parliament.

39. Appreciating the statements in a recent speech of Mr. Montagu, that those that rendered service at the front should be adequately rewarded, that the democratic principle DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

should be spread in every country, and that each country should be granted internal freedom, the Desabhaktan, of the 2nd January, says :—It is the wish of everyone that these words should be given effect to in practice. It is easy to preach ; but it is difficult to practice what one preaches. Mr. Montagu should realise that a democratic spirit is spreading even in India. The Indian leaders have been demanding the grant of internal freedom for India also. We trust that Mr. Montagu will realise this and act.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The Park Fair.

40. Remarking that the fire at this Fair is attributed by some to the fact that it was held against the wishes of the public, the Desabhaktan, of the 2nd January, lays stress on the necessity of arrangements being made to prevent the recurrence of this danger in future and adds :—Hereafter, if there are to be fireworks in the Park grounds, it should be insisted that the booths should not have thatched roofing but should be covered by zinc sheets, or the fireworks should be arranged in a large open space elsewhere. We trust the authorities will pay heed to this suggestion at least, without being inattentive as is their wont. The Government should appoint a committee to inquire about this fire accident.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The Park Fair.

Adverting to the fire that occurred on the last day of the Fair, the Desabhaktan, of the 3rd January, observes :—Though the Government of Madras do not take the full responsibility for this Fair, certain responsible officials have a hand in it and the good or evil resulting herefrom affects them. So the Government should soon appoint a committee to inquire about the accident. They should not deal with this matter superficially as they did in the case of the fire in the Moore Market. Those who are guilty should be taught a lesson.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The Dravidan, of the 3rd January, wants the Government to note the serious losses that are said to have occurred on account of the fire and hopes that at least the Police will make an inquiry into the matter.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 4th January, suggests a prompt inquiriy by the Government about the responsibility for the Corporation Fire Engine not having been kept in a proper place ready to be used on the night in question and lays stress upon the necessity of strict rules being framed in the matter of maintaining the fire engines in a sound condition on occasions like this.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

The Dravidan, of the 6th January, also comments in the same strain.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

Cases for the one rupee and two and a half rupee currency notes.

41. Referring to the notification of the Central Publicity Board that cases for preserving these notes are available at a cost of two annas each at all Post offices from January 1919 the Desabhaktan, of the 2nd January, observes :—It is said that these currency notes, being made of thin paper, get easily crushed and have the need for a small protective case. Why cannot these notes be printed on thick paper like the five rupee notes? By the persent arrangement of the Government, the public are put to loss unnecessarily. It is no doubt true that the manufacturers of these cases will make a good profit, as the people would like to go in for them, though they are not compelled to do so. It is regrettable that the Government also should be a party to the money of the people being spent on unnecessary items like this.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 2nd January, characterises the introduction of these cases as a curious move and doubts whether the complaint of the people that they experience great difficulty in handling these currency notes will be removed by this measure alone.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

Cases for the one rupee and two and a half rupee currency notes.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd January, also says that it is regrettable that poor people, who feel sorry for the reduction of coins in circulation and the introduction of currency notes in their stead, should be asked to pay two annas for preserving these notes.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The Economic Conference at Bombay.

42. Referring to the necessity for and the benefits that may be derived from this conference the Swadesamitran, of the 2nd January, observes :—At present there are no data, excepting the statistics published by the authorities upon which one can determine whether the people are prosperous and whether their present condition is an improvement over their past or not. But there is an impression that the version of the authorities does not indicate the real state of affairs. When the late Mr. Gokhale brought forward a proposition in the Imperial Legislative Council that a committee should be appointed to examine the condition of a few select villages, it was observed by the Government member that as no two villages agree in their condition, the proposed examination would serve no useful purpose. But, during resettlements, the settlement officers generally judge the condition of the whole district only from the results of an examination of a few villages thereof. Though the public are convinced that this conclusion is wrong, they have to keep quiet for want of sufficient statistics to refute the same. Doctor Gilbert Slater recently wrote an article to the Mail in which he proved by quoting figures that most families in India do not have the income required for their sustenance and none of the authorities have so far gainsaid this. The true condition of the people will be revealed only if such investigations are made. The authorities will be obliged to accept the opinions of people, who take an interest in the matter and collect statistics. At present there is no other alternative than to accept as gospel what the civilian officers say. Though what they say may be right, still there is room to doubt that they might have collected statistics in a partial manner. But, if economic research gains strength, the opinions of those conducting it will be considered to be those of experts. To do this work in all the villages of the country will be productive of benefit in the end. If details are known about each place, then its real condition can be ascertained. From this, it can be found out clearly whether the present method of land assessment is conducive to the improvement of the agriculturists or otherwise. There was no facility for doing this work till now. But, as an economic conference has now been started, we believe that branches of it will be opened in different places, and work for the welfare of the people of the country.

Indian news and London newspapers.

43. The Swadesamitran, of the 2nd January, refers to the fact that certain correspondents from India to the newspapers in London do not communicate the true state of affairs, and reports the India of London to have written as follows on this subject:—For some time past permission has not been given to the London papers to publish matters relating to India. While the telegrams of the 16th November 1918 from Ceylon appeared in the London papers on the 18th idem, no Indian news has been published in the London papers subsequent to the 5th idem. The cause for this is not apparent. Though many important events are occurring in India, how is it possible for the British public to become aware of Indian affairs if details concerning them are not permitted to be published in the London newspapers?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The basis of industrial advancement.

44. Referring to the statement of the Trade Commissioner in Australia that the situation caused by the war was the primary cause of the advancement of even the unimportant industries there and that these industries will surely get strengthened because of the special duty that Government imposes on foreign goods and of an adequate supply of raw products being available within the country, the Swadesamitran, of the 2nd January, remarks that this principle applies fully in the case of India and adds:—It is well known that even at the time when the industries in England and other countries were in a very backward condition, the trade and industry of India were very flourishing. Though the Industries Commission was appointed for reporting on the best ways of improving Indian industries the Government asked them not to concern themselves with the question of the imposition of duties and therefore they could not consider the vital point, which forms the basis of industrial advancement. Though there is plenty of raw material available in India, unless foreign goods are prevented by means of protective duties from flooding the Indian market, no real improvement in industries is possible. Now that the war has come to an end, we hope the Government will pay immediate attention to this important matter.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

Our disgraceful condition.

45. The Desabhaktan, of the 31st December, reproduces an article from the Mahratta under this heading, in which the following observations occur among others:—The Hon'ble

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

Madan Mohan Malavya has stated in his presidential address at the last Congress at Delhi: "The Hindus have ruled over this country for thousands of years and the Moslems for huudreds of years. All the same, we are pleading with the British that we are fit to have a measure of reform, to form the basis of a government responsible to the people. This is causing disgrace and pain to our brethren and sisters." We believe these words will infuse some spirit into the minds of the Indians. The time of the Hindus has gone, as well as that of the Moslems. It is now the time of the Englishmen; and the Hindus and Muhammadans have to bow to the decision of these Englishmen. Every subject has the right of representing his grievances. We represented our grievances to the Englishmen. We prayed and entreated. But what has been the result of our wail for the last 33 years? This is disgraceful to us. There is no use in blaming the Englishmen for this. The fault is ours. We should note the preaching of Sri Ramdas, the founder of the Mahratta Empire, that we should work hard for our advancement, without keeping quiet relying upon others. Think a little over what has reduced us to this pass. Foreigners living six thousand miles away have gained possession of our country bit by bit and have placed us in a disgraceful condition. So if the Indians will realise this, they will give up the methods adopted by them till now. It will be difficult for us to acquire our privileges, if the Congress merely stops with representing our condition and wrings its hands. The events in Russia clearly show that, however much we may wish for the preponderance of justice and righteousness, might well eventually be the arbiter of the world. We should feel for the disgrace which our position entails. We should try to increase our strength. If our rulers act on wrong principles and refuse to grant us our rights, we should show them by action that such a refusal will lead to evil consequences. But our strength should not be used in unconstitutional ways. Every one, who is ashamed of his position in this country, should resort to his individual passive strength. The Peace Conference will meet and disperse and the condition of India will be the same then as it is now. Unless we become conscious of our power and acquire the principle of self-determination by our strength, this country, which was once in the height of splendour, can never regain its glory.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The fitness of Indians for self-government.

46. Referring to the remark of the Madras Mail that the municipalities both in Madras and elsewhere in India have not been able to preserve sanitation properly, though the majority of the Members thereof are Home Rulers, and its question how the Indians, who are incapable of managing the affairs of one town, can conduct the administration of provinces and a kingdom, the Desabhaktan, of the 3rd January, expresses its surprise at this argument and compares it to the conclusion from the failure of some Indians in an examination that the Indians as a class are unfit to have education and should not therefore be classed in the human species.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

A public meeting.

47. A correspondent to the Dravidan, of the 3rd January, reports a statement to have been made, at one of the weekly lectures delivered under the auspices of the Labour Union, that all the hospitals, in which the English system of medicine is followed, lead the people into bad ways and tend to spread diseases and that therefore the people should avoid such hospitals.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

Provincial autonomy.

48. Remarking that, of all the resolutions passed by the Delhi Congress, that about the grant of Provincial autonomy to India is the most important, the Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd January, writes:—Now that the war has ended in a victory for us, it is but natural for the Indians to demand that the principles for which the Englishmen entered into this war should be applied to India. If, as stated by President Wilson, it is true that the principles applicable to one country should be applicable also to another, that justice has nothing to do with caste distinctions or local differences and that it applies in the same manner to all countries at all times, why should there be any obstruction or delay in devising means to grant autonomy to India? President Wilson has again said that, though it is easy to run with the current of justice now flowing all over the world, it requires a good deal of courage to run counter to it. We have reason to think that the bureaucrats in India have much of this courage. We see from their actions till now that they care only for self-interest and their position. If the British Government should render justice to us, acting on the opinion of these bureaucrats, we think the excellent principles laid down by Mr. Wilson will never reach India. It is because the British Government did not act on these principles till now, Ireland has come to be what it is. Will they allow this story to be repeated in India? Should not the principle of self-determination be applied to India, at least in recognition of the sacrifices made by her in the war? And again we do not want the application of this principle in toto. We pray only for the grant of the Montagu-Chelmesford reforms as amended by the Congress and grant of provincial autonomy is one of the most important of these reforms.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

49. The Dravidan, of the 4th January, has a long leader under this heading amplifying the ideas contained in a leaderette of the Justice of the 26th ultimo on the same subject.

Co-operation and agriculture.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Dec. 1918.

50. The Swadesamitran, of the 30th December, publishes a communication from Rao Bahadur K. S. Venkatarama Ayyar of Negapatam in which, while thanking the Government for having arranged to bring 40,000 bags of rice to Negapatam from Rangoon, remarks that this rice can be distributed freely in the Tanjore and Trichinopoly districts only if the Government issue prompt instructions to the Railway authorities to supply wagons without any difficulty for its transport from the port of Negapatam into the interior and also to see that the merchants are not made to compete with one another for wagons.

The food situation.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

51. With reference to the Delhi Congress, the Andhrapatrika, of the 31st December, writes:—Mr. Lloyd George once observed that an experience of one thousand years was gained during the last four years. . . As has been remarked by President Wilson, there is no use of the mere intellectual understanding of justice and righteousness. The courage to put those principles into practice is what is required. . . The idea that no distinctions of caste and country can be impediments to the establishment of Dharma is slowly gaining ground. . . Doctor Wilson said that he had entered the war inspired by such a high ideal. India also has shown a similar noble attitude towards the war and fought for the cause of liberty. . . The announcement of the 20th August is not in keeping with the principle of self-determination. There is no room for self-determination when the stages of our development are to be determined by the bureaucracy. . . The British Government is willing to grant the right of self-determination to the Arabs and the Africans. In these circumstances, there is nothing strange in India asking for the same right. The Special Congress at Bombay somewhat hesitated to express wholeheartedly the ideals of the people. With the close of the war, all room for anxiety has disappeared. So, the necessity has now arisen for a clear expression of the wishes of the Indian people in accordance with the right of self-determination. . . Not only were Mr. Srinivasa Sastri's amendments to go behind the resolutions of the Bombay Congress defeated, but the resolution demanding complete provincial autonomy has been accepted by the Congress with great enthusiasm. We understand that there was a lively debate on this resolution and that some delegates would secede from the Congress. . . But we cannot think that any of the leaders would take such an unwise step. If individuals, instead of obeying public opinion, try to secede from the Congress, they will not be fit for self-government. The Congress this year has clearly expressed the people's view. The practice of concealing one's opinions on account of considerateness for the wishes of others has fully disappeared. The resolutions of the Congress bear the strongest testimony to the desire for self-government which is spreading among the people day by day. It is but just that the Government should see the strength of the popular opinion and satisfy it. . . Whatever party in England may become strong, there is no doubt that the triumph of national ideals depends on the strength of the people's will. If Indians firmly express their desire for self-government, the freedom-loving English people will surely grant it.

The National Congress and the strength of public opinion.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

Local self-government.

52. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 31st December, writes:— In their communiqué on local self-government, the Government of India have expressed the opinion that when non-officials happen to be the presidents of taluk and district boards, it will be necessary to appoint with the permission of the Government a Special Secretary to attend to the routine business, and that he cannot be removed generally without the permission of the Government. The proposal of the Government would make the power of non-official presidents only nominal, as the Secretary would then be all in all without any check from them. It cannot but be admitted that this will be a great hindrance to the progress of local self-government. It is a healthy sign that almost all presidents of local boards in the Madras Presidency have not approved of the suggestion, and the Government will do well to withdraw it.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

The All-India Hindu Conference.

53. The Andhrapatrika, of the 31st December last, publishes in Telugu and English the resolutions passed by the All-India Hindu Conference asking for the immediate grant of self-government and other concessions.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The present situation.

54. In the course of its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd January, writes:—If Indians are to be guided by the trend of election campaigns in England in the matter of expressing their wishes, they will have to change their opinions so as to keep them in conformity with the policy of the party in power. Such fickle-minded men can never attain their object. . . Whatever party in England becomes powerful, the future of India entirely depends on the determination of Indians themselves. When the wind of freedom is blowing all over, the grant of self-government to India cannot be delayed. There is no necessity for considering about the fulfilment of the ideal, if the people work with unflagging persistance. May the firm attitude of the Congress leaders secure self-government for India before long.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

Titles.

55. Referring to the New year honours, the Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd January, remarks:—. . . Titles have not been so liberally conferred on the Andhras. But there is no need to feel sorry for this. The number of those coming forward to serve the country's cause in the hope of getting titles is becoming smaller and smaller. . . Mr. P. C. Mitter has got the title of C.I.E. He has become famous in abusing Indians. The title of Diwan Bahadur is nothing great for the Hon'ble Mr. M. Ramachandra Rao. . . Those who have not received titles need not be sorry. Those who have served the country are to be found more among those holding no titles.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

Who is responsible?

56. Referring to the fire accident in the Park Fair, the Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd January, says:—We hear that some received injuries while the lives of some others were in danger. . . It will be well, if the Government hold an inquiry, publish the correct facts and trace those who are responsible for the spread of the panic. It is their duty to see that such accidents will not recur.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

India and Reforms.

57. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd January, writes:— . . . Lord Durham and Lord Elgin introduced responsible government in Canada, when it was full of racial and linguistic differences. . . Mr. Houghton asks why the same policy should not be pursued as regards India also. May the British Government assume the same liberal attitude towards India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

Small restrictions.

58. Referring to the request of the London Times for the removal of restriction on newspapers, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd January, remarks:—. . . When the London Times is crying so loud for the removal of even such little restraints, we do not know what to say of the heavy restrictions laid on the Indian newspapers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

Political prisoners.

59. Referring to the unconditional release of Count Plunkett of the Irish Sinn Fein party, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd January, remarks:—. . . While such revolutionaries as the Sinn Feiners are being released in Great Britain, it is not proper that the political prisoners in India are not released. The Government will do well to grant the request of the National Congress in the matter.

60. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd January, observes that two annas, the price fixed by the Government for the canvass protectors for currency notes is prohibitive for the ordinary people and that they will do well to reduce it.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

Currency notes.

61. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th January, writes:— Anglo-Indian papers like the Madras Times have begun to say that Mr. Montagu should have no place in the new ministry. . . The new ministry will have to face the Irish problem on the one hand and the Indian problem on the other. . . Be it as it may, the number of unionists is sure to predominate in the new ministry, and it is difficult to expect from them the wisdom to satifactorily solve such broad questions. It is very regrettable that the party of opponents to the progress of the Empire should be in power at the present critical juncture in England. . . Indians want complete provincial autonomy immediately. . . The Congress has done its duty in expressing this desire, since it will be suicidal to India to conceal her real opinions and act with a hesitating mind at this juncture, when the atmosphere of the whole world is surcharged with liberty.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

India and the New Ministry.

62. Referring to the termination of the suit for damages brought by Mr. Hasan Imam against Mr. Clayton, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th January, remaks:— . . . We hope that Anglo-Indians will learn a lesson and behave with due regard towards Indians, hereaftar at least.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

An Anglo-Indian's zubbardust.

63. With reference to the interned Muhammadans, Mr. Muhammad Ali and Mr. Shaukat Ali, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th January, observes:— . . When there is no more fear from Turkey and peace has been established, it is not known why these unfortunate men should not be released in accordance with the wishes of the people. Contentment cannot grow among the people, unless the Government pardon political prisoners and safeguard their birth-rights.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

The Muhammadan internees.

64. In the course of an article, supporting the rights of temple priests, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 4th January, complains that the trustees under temple schemes misappropriate temple funds, and says that an inspection, by the Government officials, of the accounts maintained by them will make this plain to the Government.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

Temple schemes.

65. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th January, writes:—. . . The food-problem is turning out to be more important than any other, on account of the war, the abnormal rise in prices of food-stuffs and the failure of rains. There does not seem to be anybody to remove this trouble. . . The whole Andhra country is protesting against the enhancement of water-rate in one voice without any differences whatsoever. . . The ryots took a vow to adopt passive resistance, if necessary. . . The authorities who show special favour to ryots on other occasions will do well now to listen to their cry and do them justice. The publication of the Village Officers' Act Amendment Bill in addition to the water-rate question has increased the unrest. . . If the hereditary right is taken away, it will be proper to provide for appointment by election. Then, appointments will be made according to qualifications. It is very improper to try to replace one evil by another. . . The arbitrary power till now enjoyed only by Divisional officers is sought to be extended to Tahsildars and Deputy Tahsildars. It is difficult to foresee to what evils such an arrangement may give rise. . . The principle that the officer can appoint any one he likes, if he finds no qualified candidate in the family of the householder, cuts at the root of the hereditary right. . . Of the newly-added disqualifications that relating to persons dangerous to the peace of the country is the most regrettable. On this pretext, the authorities may exclude all those working for the progress of the country. . . The Government should help with money those Municipal Councils in the mufasal which are called upon to deal with epidemics. . . It is the duty of the Government to remove all these troubles and make the country happy. Will not the Allies who are demanding the establishment of self-government in the enemy countries, grant it to India which has shed its blood for the Empire and is being praised day after day for the noble part it has taken in the war? . . . The arguments of the Sydenham party were strongly criticised by Lord Crewe then and by Lord Donough Moore now. . . The latter exposed the arbitrary power of the bureaucracy. He has boldly stated that voting by officials in the Legislative Councils against conscience is a disregard shown to official duty. . . The real state of India is gradually reaching the Imperial throne through the ideas of liberal western gentlemen. This is undoubtedly a happy sign for India.

is very much to be regretted that in spite of the fact that the ryots have in many a meeting passed resolutions protesting against the proposal to raise the water rate, the Government have not yet understood the ryots. Is it right to ruin the innocent ryots by means of hard orders? We sincerely request that the Government will cancel their order proposing to raise the water-rate and also that by which the prices of food grains have been regulated.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 27th Dec. 1918.

70. Referring to the news of the death of Mrs. Arabindo Ghose after several years' separation from her husband, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 27th December, writes:—

Victory and political prisoners.

The father of Arabindo's wife asked for the permission of Government to send her to her husband's residence; but whether because it was feared that the grant of such permission was fraught with danger to the empire or for some other reason, the permission was not granted. And the wife was called away when she was still sundered from her husband. It is usual to release political prisoners as a mark of victory rejoicing. But the Government of this country would not allow political prisoners to share the joy. Indeed, how ill-fated is our country in this! Mr. Ghose is not even a convict. He may be a mere suspect. How far these suspicions are well founded must surely be within the experience of the authorities. It is scarcely right therefore that the bureaucracy should allow itself to be the victim of the demon of suspicion and cause learned patriots like Lajput Rai and Arabindo to be sundered from their country, hearth and home.

to form a joint committee of the Commons and Lords to consider the scheme of Indian reforms was lost. The scheme is only a first step in responsible government, and it is now clear that the House of Lords is not prepared to grant even this. The trend of the discussion, in which Sir Valentine Chirol and others took part was to the effect that the grant of the reforms proposed in the scheme will lead to the autocracy of educated Indians over the uneducated. Would it not mean that even the educated Indians should be without power, if the Anglo-Indian authorities should, as at present, have all the power in their hands? Would it not mean that a few of the white men in this country would be spending the money paid by the 310 millions without the slightest control and responsibility? That is what the Indians are asking. Will the cry of fox ever reach the heavens? It may, when it develops into the roar of a lion.

72. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 28th December, writes:—Mr. Pal is a pre-eminent patriot and a man of great learning. MANORAMA, Calicut, 3rd Jan. 1919.

75 The Qaumi Report, of the 26th December, writes:—We have already said that it is our duty to preserve Islam from the operation of the secular law. For example, the Civil Law does not approve of our mode of divorce and prevents our men from marrying a second wife. Recently a few such cases have occurred in England in which the unfortunate Muhammadans have been obliged to submit to this high-handed procedure. Marrying a Christian woman is permissible in Islam, but the law prohibits us from marrying a second wife or divorcing her even on reasonable grounds. Certain English Judges have ridiculed our religious rules and with a stroke of their powerful pen have seriously interfered with Islamic freedom. There may be yet some unfortunate Muhammadans who are still undergoing imprisonment for the offence of either divorcing a Christian woman or marrying a second wife.

Islam and the secular law.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 26th Dec. 1918.

Lately similar things have happened even in India. An esteemed contemporary very correctly states that certain things which appear simple in the beginning may, if they are neglected or treated indifferently, be fraught with very serious consequences. Many years have elapsed since the disposal of a case by the Punjab Chief Court in which it was held that the previous marriage of a Muhammadan woman becomes null and void in consequence of her embracing Christianity. There is also a recent decision by the same court which upholds the previous marriage of a Christian woman even after her embracing Islam. Our esteemed contemporary is right in stating that both these decisions are dangerous to the Muslim world. It further invites the attention of all Muhammadans and Islamic Associations to give their best consideration to the question as a matter of duty and advises the Ulima to give up their bickerings for a time and turn their attention to the removal of this menace.

76. The Qaumi Report, of the 31st December, referring to the last day of the year 1918, writes:—Today is the last day of an unlucky year. May God arrest its evil effects and save us from our troubles and hardships. The year has caused much grief and sorrow to Muhammadans, marred the magnificent geography of Islam and trampled under foot its grand history.

77. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 1st January, writes:—The year 1918 to which we have just now said good-bye will never be forgotten; for it has shown to the world how the mighty have fallen before the sword and how those, who were so proud of their vast wealth, innumerable forces and abundant supplies, have suffered. Besides it has sounded the bell of peace and mutual friendship.

Good-bye to 1918 and welcome to 1919.

The editor welcomes the coming year 1919 and hopes that it may settle matters at the Peace Conference favourable to our Government, so that there may come a lasting peace to the people and the Empire.

III.—LEGISLATION.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 3rd Jan. 1919.

78. In a leader under the heading, this Dravidan, of the 3rd January, remarks that the Bill recently introduced by the Madras Government, making some alterations in the rules for the selection of persons as village officers, does not deal with the two existing grievances of the village officers, viz., their low pay and the bad treatment they receive from the Taluk officials and comments on the Bill in the following strain:—The Bill proposes to do away with the rule of primogeniture in the matter of choosing a village officer and empowers the appointing authority to select the best qualified member of the family possessing hereditary claims to the office. We think this will give room to anomalous interpretations. One removed by eight or even ten degrees may come to be chosen as a qualified candidate. We admit that only qualified persons should be appointed to this post. But the Government should specify clearly the required qualifications for the post and afford an opportunity for one succeeding to it to acquire them. It is only when he does not do so that another should be chosen. Then again persons accept these posts now even on the low salary attaching to them, merely on account of the privilege of heredity, and it may be difficult to get strangers to take them upon the same salary. Eventually the new system may give rise to an unhealthy competition. The Bill also takes away the privilege of enforcing the rights attaching to a village office in a court of law which is not desirable. Besides these things, the salary of this office has to be raised and arrangements made for the village officers being treated with respect. We hope the authorities will consider all these points and redraft the Bill in such a manner as to benefit the village officers.

IV.—NATIVE STATES.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 24th Dec. 1918.

80. Referring to the proceedings of a meeting of Nambudri leaders convened by the Director of Education, Cochin State, to consider the advisability of establishing a central school exclusively for Nambudris to provide for both religious and secular instruction and to be financed partly by the existing endowments for religious instruction of Nambudris and partly by the Darbar, the Manorama, of the 24th December, suggests that the central school may be located at a place like Shoranur so as to be available also for the Nambudris of Malabar and that the Madras Department of Public Instruction should contribute for the maintenance of the school and co-operate with the Cochin Darbar in managing the institution.

Nambudri education.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 1st Jan. 1919.

81. Reviewing the Administration Report for 1093 M.E. and the period of Mr. Bhore's Diwanship, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 1st January, congratulates the Raja of Cochin, Mr. Bhore, the Diwan, and the Darbar that the State could sail clear of all calamities during the four years of war and universal suffering. It notes the advance made by the State in education, general and technical, the provision of increased facilities for agriculture, the sympathetic encouragement given to the Ayurvedic system of medical treatment, and the schemes for increasing the resources of the Cochin administration.

State by the harbour project, the Dindigul-Palghat Railway, the extension of forest tramway, etc., and thinks that Mr. Bhore has undoubtedly earned the lasting gratitude, goodwill and confidence of the people.

82. The Samadarsi, of the 28th December, bewails the intense misery suffered by the people of Travancore on account of famine and pestilence. It attributes the present distress to absence of a Government responssible to the people and to the suppression of the capacities of the people to manage their own affairs. If representative institutions were established, they would have effectively co-operated with the Government to combat famine and pestilence before which the present Government stands impotent. It asks "who is responsible for the present suffering and mortality?" The Government have no money to grant a famine allowance to low-paid Government servants or to appoint medical men to cope with pestilence, no money to start industries as a set off against famine and no funds for anything except to enhance the pay and allowances of high-paid officials for increasing their number and for maintaining their glory and prestige. No doubt the Travancore Government is now exerting itself for famine relief in a way that excites the envy of even the Government of India. But this exertion does not result in restoring peace and prosperity simply because the force of public opinion and the place of popular respresentation have long since disappeared from the country.

Samadarsi, Trivandrum, 28th Dec. 1918.

83. An article in the Malayala Manorama, of the 31st December (contributed), refers to an article published in a Madras English newspaper in which the correspondent is said to have reasonably argued that administrative reforms securing to the people their right share in the administration of the State, are urgently required and that such reforms cannot be delayed any longer. That correspondent is said to have further pointed out that the delay in the introduction of such reforms was not on account of any fault of the Cochin Darbar but was due to the unexpected obstruction of the scheme by the Madras Government. The ex-Raja had promised the grant of a representative institution for Cochin and the Diwan declared in that year's administration report that a scheme for the purpose was submitted to the Government of Madras. Six years have passed and yet the scheme seems to be still pending with the Government of Madras. The first scheme was to establish an advisory council with an elected majority. This was returned for revision. It was revised and returned. After that, nothing more has been heard of it. The present Raja has also declared his desire to entrust the people with authority, but the delay seems to be still due to the Madras Government. If this be true, the people are anxiously waiting for the Madras Government to move a little more briskly in the matter in view of the importance of the subject to the welfare of the State.

The Madras Government and administrative reforms, Cochin.

Malayala Manorama, Kottayam, 31st Dec. 1918.

84. The Desabhimani, of the 28th December, protests against the idea of a Cochinite Diwan for Cochin on the ground that the Ezhuvas, etc., who form the majority of the people of State and suffer great social disabilities, cannot expect any sympathetic consideration from a Cochinite Diwan, be he a Brahman or a Nayar.

The next Diwan of Cochin.

Desabhimani, Quilon, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Malayala Manorama, of the 28th December, in an English article on the same subject, makes among others the following observations and suggestions:—

Speaking about His Highness the present Raja of Cochin and the general situation it says:—

"His Highness is a well-meaning inoffensive and kind-hearted ruler, but unfortunately his inexperience and inability to rise above his surroundings have rendered him constitutionally incapable of taking a steady keen and personal interest in all great questions. Those who are thoroughly acquainted with the details of present-day politics in Cochin, emphatically assert that certain hostile influences are at work which tend to mar the splendid effects of the monumental work of the retired Raja. The Demon of Reaction has begun to show his head here and there, and Mr. Bhore, however efficient he may be, finds it difficult to head the adverse current."

Malayala Manorama, Kottayam, 28th Dec. 1918.

Adverting to the Diwanship it observes :—

"It will surely be of the greatest usefulness if Mr. Bhore remains in Cochin to bring to a successful completion the many far-reaching schemes for the inception of which he is solely or mainly responsible. But if either His Highness the Raja is unwilling to retain Mr. Bhore any longer in the service or Mr. Bhore has had enough of Cochin, we would strongly urge the desirability of going outside Cochin in choosing a successor to Mr. Bhore.

"We find that there are two local candidates in the field. One is Mr. T. S. Narayana Ayyar, the Chief Judge, and other is Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyar, the Diwan Peshkar. Mr. Narayana Ayyar is a Cochinite and has earned a good name as a Judicial officer. He was Diwan Peshkar for a short period, but it became evident that his genius lies more in the judicial than in the administrative line. Mr. Kasthuriranga Ayyar has been a great success as a Revenue Officer, but we are not sanguine of his success as the Head of the Executive. If the future administration is to run on old-fashioned lines, there can be little doubt that either of these gentlemen could be tolerated. But present-day Cochin wants strong meat rather than mother's milk. People demand that the natural resources of the State whose possibilities, the spade-work of Mr. Bhore has amply demonstrated, should be greately developed. Hundreds of Committees are at active work in London, discussing the possibilities of developing Empire resources in all directions, and if Cochin does not rise to the height of her opportunities, her immense resources are sure to be exploited in the near future by foreign capital. To avoid such a catastrophe, we would strongly urge the appointment of a European Civilian as the next Diwan of Cochin. In a State where Mr. Locke, a European, once acted as Diwan for about a year and where an Indian Christian Civilian with a European wife has been the permanent Diwan for the past five years, we fail to see any valid objection to this proposal. Moreover, the fact that the Zamorin's Estate including several Hindu temples is administered by a European Civilian, lends support to our view. There may be Indian Civilians of capacity and grit, but we are strongly of opinion that in view of the hostile influences now at work in Cochin, a European Civilian will be better fitted to cope with the present situation. The present is a supreme crisis in the fate of Cochin. The question is whether the State is to once again sink to the deplorable condition from which it was rescued 25 years ago, or whether it should continue to progress on up-to-date lines embracing all opportunities made possible by the sagacity of Mr. Bhore. We believe that no patriotic Cochinite will have any hesitation in choosing and effectively demanding the later alternative. There are a few in Cochin who prate of patriotism, but we are not enamoured of such shibboleths when the other alternation is unthinkable and should be resisted to the last ditch. But if our suggestion is not feasible just now, we would as the next best step strongly urge the appointment of a competent Indian Officer from the British Service. In this connexion the best name we can think of is that of Mr. Paruvakkattu Narayana Menon of the Madras Secretariat. This gentleman is a Cochinite, if we are not mistaken. He is an Officer of sterling merit and unimpeachable character. By sheer merit and hard work alone he has risen from the lower grades of the service until he became a Presidency Magistrate and has now been appointed as an Under Secretary to Government. All those who have come in contact with him including even the most exacting of his official superiors speak in the highest terms of praise about him. We therefore consider it will be a real acquisition if such a tried and trusted Officer could be secured for Cochin.

1. Justice, of the 17th January, observes:—"A member of one of the non-Brahman associations who wanted to put up arches to welcome Dr. T. M. Nayar on his return from England calls attention to the fact that while their requests for permission to erect arches were refused by the Commissioner, arches were allowed, or, at any rate, were erected on the roads on the occasion of the recent reception accorded to Mr. S. Kasturiranga Ayyangar, and he wants us to tell him the reason for this difference in treatment. We regret we have no occult vision to unravel the workings of the Police Commissioner's mind to enlighten the correspondent in the matter. But applying the lessons of ordinary experience in this country we presume that the difference is that Doctor Nayar and the people who welcomed him were loyal non-Brahmans and Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar and those who welcomed him were Brahmans. . . The arch put up by a non-Brahman might be a nuisance to the Madras Police, but an arch in honour of a Brahman perhaps brings merit to the city and the Police. Is not this difference in treatment conclusive proof that the non-Brahman movement has been inspired and backed up by the Government?"

2. The following appears in New India of the 16th January:—"Even before any authoritative announcement could appear in the press, the melancholy information about the conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu had spread everywhere, specially among the masses. His conviction by the Divisional Magistrate was believed to be inevitable. . . Ever since the opportunity afforded by the signing of the armistice was allowed to slip by without even a temporary cessation of the repressive movement, thoughtful people had anticipated a convicting judgment, though few of them were prepared for so savage a sentence. . . During the entire course of this trial, the Executive Government had ample evidence of the popularity of the nationalist in the dock, and this is perhaps the only prosecution conducted in British India with a machine-gun mounted on the Court roof. . . We hope steps will immediately be taken to challenge the decision of the Magistrate in courts of appeal, but in the meantime, the Government would be well advised to examine the situation from a more sensible standpoint. A sentence of fifteen months' rigorous imprisonment to a political worker cannot be justified in any civilised society, and from the administrative standpoint as well, it is unfortunate in view not only of the popularity of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu, but also the electric situation now prevailing in the province because of economic distress."

New India, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

The Hindu, of the 17th January, says:—"The conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu by the Subdivisional First-class Magistrate of Madura of sedition and the sentence of fifteen months' rigorous imprisonment passed on him would cause surprise and deep resentment among the people of Southern India. . . There are some features which are common to this case and the Vaidya sedition case decided on appeal by Sir Henry Drake-Brockman, Judicial Commissioner, Central Provinces, which raise important issues and render the judgment in Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu's case untenable and unjust."

3. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 8th January, writes:—"The London Times is somewhat anxious that Mr. Montagu should go back to the India Office. . . The fear of our contemporary may not be unfounded and we for one shall not be sorry if it turns out to be so. . . We are not behind any one else in appreciating the excellent intentions of Mr. Montagu towards India. . . But his methods of trying to serve India are of doubtful expediency and wisdom. He wants Indians to take a big and instant leap into what he considers to be responsible self-government and acts very much like the fond but foolish parent who would choke his favorite child with indigestible sweets out of sheer exuberance of affection without a thought of the disastrous effects of such kindness. . . It is not only because the changes proposed are catastrophic in their nature but also for the reason that Mr. Montagu has been resorting to questionable methods of canvassing support for them, that we would see him relieved of the Indian portfolio in the reconstructed Cabinet. . . We feel sure that the anxiety of the Times is due to a misapprehension of Indian conditions and an exaggerated estimate of the influence of the agitators for the reforms of the kind contained in the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme over the masses of the Indian population."

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, 8th Jan. 1919.

Mr. S. S. Thorburn and the Reform proposals.

4. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 8th January, says:— "Mr. S. S. Thorburn's recent lecture at the East India Association has been assailed in some quarters as a reactionary criticism of the reform proposals. . . Mr. Thorburn is abused, because he has not hesitated to speak out his mind on a subject which calls for honest speech in the interests of India. He has shown on what slender basis the reform scheme is built and what great risks are involved in subjecting India to reckless political experiments. The central idea of Mr. Thorburn's lecture is that every community in India prefers British to Home Rule, prefers what it knows and trusts to what it does not know and fears. That is the barest truth and no wonder that the agitators here cannot abide it. So they are at elaborate pains to prove that Mr. Thorburn does not know India of to-day and cannot therefore be in a position to appraise the reform proposals at their true value. As we have said it is no cause for surprise if the Home Rule agitators adopted this line of argument against Mr. Thorburn. But we see even Sir J. D. Rees who is not a rabid politician was led into saying during the discussion on Mr. Thorburn's paper that the lecturer's observation that every community in India preferred British to Home Rule was a very confident expression. We may assure Sir John Rees that Mr. Thorburn was quite justified in his confidence and he exactly portrayed the attitude of the bulk of the population in India towards the agitation for Home Rule."

The Indian National Congress.

5. The Cochin Argus, for the week ending 11th January, remarks:— "However, it remains to be hoped that the Delhi Session of the Congress will not be without its good fruit. If it should open the eyes of the Government to the folly and futility of making pooja to irreconcilables whose loyalty and good faith are obviously not beyond question, it will not have been held in vain. If it should awaken the Moderates and the rest of the loyal and self-respecting sections of the Indian intelligensia to the extremely urgent necessity of combining together to fight back and crush a most dangerous political growth, it will have rendered India an immeasurably greater service than that rendered by all its thirty-two predecessors put together."

Hindu, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

The I.C.S. and the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms.

6. Writing on this subject under this heading 'The White Mutiny', the Hindu, of the 13th January, says:—"The ultimatum, for it is nothing less, and the scarcely-veiled threat of a strike implied in it, proceeds from Members of the Civil Service of high standing, including a Judge of the High Court, senior Member of the Board of Revenue, Secretaries to the Government, the President of the Madras Corporation and the Inspector-General of Police. Considering that the authors of the report, as the memorandum throughout describes it, are the Secretary of State for India and the Government of India to whom the members of the Association are subordinates, and the report itself is in furtherance of a high policy, sanctioned by His Majesty's Government, the memorandum is an astonishing repudiation of the rules of discipline and tradition which usually regulate the relations of subordinate officers towards the representatives of the Crown. . . It is clear that the Members of the Civil Service are fundamently opposed not only to the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme but also to the policy of responsible government announced in the British Parliament to be granted to the people of India. Their contention is that their vested interests are being prejudicially affected not only now but for all time to come. India must, according to them, be kept as a close preserve for their benefits. We are glad that the Members of the Civil Service have come out in their true colours. The low and despicable stand as regards Indian reform which they have taken in their memorandum shatters the illusion fostered by interested persons that the Indian Civil Service is a body animated by high and statesmanlike ideals. . . Buoyed up with other mischievous and unfounded utterances in the House of Lords and elsewhere, the Members of the Civil Service have been induced to set up arrogant pretensions and to defy the highest constitutional authorities of the Government of India. . . The action of the Madras Indian Civil Service Association is clearly therefore one of factious and disloyal opposition. . . It seems to us that the time has now arrived when the indenture system under which British skilled labour is imported into India in the form of the Indian Civil Service should be done away with at an early date. In the case of existing Members of the Service whose claims under their covenant are likely to be injuriously affected by any change, compensation could be awarded. . . The Members of the Civil Service have raised a direct issue and thrown a downright challenge to the Government. No Government which has any prestige to maintain can feel any doubt as to the sort of reply which it has to make to this insolent demand."

The Travancore Forest Department.

7. The People's Opinion, of the 11th January, remarks:—"Like the sand in the hour-glass Mr. Subrahmanya Ayyar's term of office has almost run out and the people are only glad to know it. That this forest autocrat has not been given an extension of service which he fondly hoped would come to pass is welcome news to the public and the authorities deserve to be congratulated upon their wise decision that this important department of the State should be placed in better and safer hands than now. With his high academic qualifications and specialistic training Mr. Subrahmanya Ayyar proved a stupendous failure in the management of a department to which even laymen had done ample justice before his time. . . This personal idiosyncracy apart, his administration of the department was unsound and rotten to the core and one would not be far wrong in saying that the permanent interests of Travancore were ruthlessly sacrificed for the needs of the hour or for what is worse self-glorification."

The Naval power.

9. Referring to the fact that Mr. Daniels, the Minister of the Naval Department in the United States of America, has asked for permission to go on building ships even after the close of the war, the Hindu Nesan, of the 9th January, observes:—This Minister is of opinion that, unless a limit for the strength of the navy of each country is fixed during the Peace Conference, it is but proper that the American navy should be made exceptionally strong. Till now the British held the supremacy in regard to naval strength. The statement of Mr. Daniels gives room to infer that America begins to compete with Britain. We hope that, to avoid such a competition, an amicable settlement will be made during the Peace Conference.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

The future of Mesopotamia.

10. The Swadesamitran, of the 10th January, observes:—Eminent statesmen have said that the question in whose charge the former German Colonies, Mesopotamia and other tracts, which have come into the possession of the allies during the great war, should be, will be decided in the Peace Conference. We were also under the impression that the future administration of these countries will be determined chiefly in accordance with the wishes of the people therein. While so, Sir Frederick Smith, the Attorney-General of the British Government, asks us not to entertain such an idea, and says in effect that Mesopotamia, which is a very fertile country, should not be given up as the losses entailed in the war may be mostly recouped from it. Now the question is how far this will be consistent with self-determination. We need not repeat that the future of Mesopotamia continues to be a question of great anxiety among the Muhammadans in India. We have already laid stress on the importance of respecting their wishes in the matter of deciding the future of the territories belonging to Turkey. It appears from a recent telegram that the Commissioner of Mesopotamia has stated that Turkey cannot get it back hereafter. Again, a correspondent to the Madras Times says that the most desirable of all the schemes now under contemplation with regard to the future of Mesopotamia is to entrust the right of its administration to the family of His Highness the Aga Khan. As all these matters will receive a final settlement only in the Peace Confereuce, the whole Muhammadan community fully expects that righteousness and liberty will be upheld and self-determination established.

Rewards for the Police.

11. Adverting to a Government notification to the effect that a reward of Rs. 6,200 has been given to the Police officers who rendered assistance at the time of the looting in Madras in September last, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th January, observes:—The Police Department is intended for preserving peace in the city and it is their duty to suppress any tumult therein. While such is the case, it is not in the least understood why they should be given any reward for discharging their duty at the time of the looting. While the poor are suffering great hardship on account of the scarcity of food-stuffs, it is in no way justifiable to grant thousands of rupees as rewards to officers. We ask with whose permission the Police are being thus rewarded. While the funds collected from the public have to be spent with their approval, how can Rs. 6,200 be granted as reward to Police officers? Under what head is this amount going to be shown in the budget? The public ask what meritorious service the Police have rendered to deserve this reward. What have the Government to say to this?

(e) Local and Municipal.

Administration report of the Madras Corporation for 1917-18.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

12. Referring to the order of the Government of Madras reviewing this report and to the possibility of the Madras City Municipal Bill as amended by the Select Committee, being discussed in the next meeting of the local Legislative Council, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th January, remarks that the delay of about a month in the publication of this order is not known and observes—We ask whether it is proper to bring at this juncture this Bill for discussion in the Legislative Council. The Madras Corporation suggested many amendments to this Bill, but we doubt whether these will be accepted by the Select Committee, inasmuch as the Government did not pay proper attention to them. Further, Legislative Councils are sure to be re-constituted with reference to the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme of reforms, whether it is accepted in toto or with any modifications. We hold that it is not quite expedient at present to attempt to pass this Bill into an Act. Though the Bill is certainly an improvement over the present condition, still it is the opinion of experienced men that there are several defective provisions in it especially in the matter of imparting education in Madras, and that it requires further alterations to suit the present exigencies.

Adverting to the work of the Corporation in regard to water-supply and drainage, the paper continues to observe:—The facilities afforded in this connexion have not been to the satisfaction of the public, and the departments concerned are being found fault with by all including the Government. The Government have stated in their review that the Corporation Engineers should adopt proper remedial measures suited to the present situation, until new pipes are received and proper facilities for drainage can be afforded. The Government have in their control the administration of the Corporation: they appoint all its higher officers, and it is a matter for surprise that they should themselves condemn the actions of such officers. If the Government of Lord Pentland would but reflect for a moment as to who is responsible for the inconveniences caused in Madras in connexion with water-supply and drainage, the truth will become patent. Instead of doing so, to find fault with the Corporation authorities appears to be rather improper.

The Health Report of the Madras Corporation.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

13. Reviewing in its leader the report of the Madras Corporation Health department for the year 1917, the Andhrapatrika, of the 9th January, observes:— . . . It is regrettable that no new measures whatever have been adopted this year also as in the last year for the improvement of health. In spite of the very unsatisfactory state of the city health and the increasing death-rate among the people, we do not know what the Corporation mean by not applying themselves to the health-problem in right earnest. . . We have time and again said that want of proper food for the poor is the real cause of the untimely deaths among them and that the problem cannot be solved unless such a state of affairs is put an end to. There is nothing strange in medicines failing to have any effect on them, when they have no proper nourishment. We further emphasise that their health cannot be improved, if the question of their house accommodation is not settled at once. . . How can the health of the city be satisfactory, when unpurified water is allowed to mix with purified water which is supplied for drinking purposes? Epidemics are raging furiously this year, and the health of the people is in danger. We hope, therefore, that the Corporation will take now at least suitable steps to set right these defects and make the city healthy.

14. The Swadesamitran, of the 8th January, publishes in Tamil a contribution to the Hindu by a Congress delegate from Anantapur, complaining of the conduct of the stationmaster of Manmad towards the delegates proceeding to the Congress at Delhi.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 8th January, refers to this incident and observes:—Which Indian heart will not throb on hearing this? What does the mean station-master think of the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar and others? We doubt whether the stationmaster of Manmad deserves to touch the feet of Mr. Narasimha Ayyar. We do not know what punishment will be meted out by the railway authorities to this petty stationmaster who asserts that only Europeans are 'gentlemen'.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Jan. 1919.

The railways in India.

15. Referring to the administration report of the Indian Railways for 1917–1918, the Desabhaktan, of the 11th January, observes:—The companies that carry on the management of the Indian railways reside in England. Instead of this, it is the opinion of some that the management of these railways should vest in Indian companies residing in India itself and we agree with them. The poverty of India is going on increasing on account of the fact that the several lakhs of rupees earned as profits from these railways are every year being sent away to England. Had the management of the railways vested in Indian companies, will not all the profits remain here alone? Railway passengers in India were experiencing great hardships even before the war and these have since increased tenfold. Apart from the inconveniences, the fare also has been increased by 25 per cent. These hardships should now be removed without any delay.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 31st Dec. 1918.

The Montagu-Chelmsford reforms and the Civil Service.

18. The Swadesamitran, of the 31st December, reproduces in Tamil an article from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika condemning the circular issued by Mr. Millne, I.C.S., of Bihar to his colleagues of the Civil Service to express their views about the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms and welcoming the threat embodied in that circular that the members of the Civil Service may have to give up their posts if their interests are not safeguarded, with the remark that they had better get back to their country in their own interests, as they will not then have to move with the Indians on equal terms or be subordinate to them.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

The civilians and the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms.

Referring to the formation of an association in Madras of the members of the Civil Service in this Presidency, the Swadesamitran, of the 13th January, observes:—It is really strange to see the civilians now stoutly opposing the reform proposals; for Sir William Vincent, a leading member of this service and one of the members of the Executive Council of the Government of India, expressed a quite contrary view in the Imperial Legislative Council on the 7th September last and said that the members of this service would heartily co-operate with their Indian colleagues in the working out of those proposals. Even the framers of the Montagu-Chelmsford report have stated that they expect such a co-operation from the civilians. The Madras civilians are now proposing to say, in effect, that they cannot co-operate as expected. They base their arguments on the fact that their prestige and powers would go if they serve under Indians. Seeing that the civilians demur to work under Indian District Collectors, we learn the Indians in the Provincial Civil Service are seriously thinking of what they should do hereafter. If the members of the Civil Service attach so much importance to the racial difference between them and the Indians, the latter will have no objection whatever to these civilians being given immediately the full pension to which they will be entitled later and sent away. If necessary, the Indians may be willing even to pay a tax for that. The main gist of their objections is that their prestige should not be curtailed. So it looks as if God created this extensive country only in the interests of the civilians. In other countries, different classes of the public servants exist for the benefit of the country. As India is a curious country, its servants want its administration to be conducted in such a manner as not to affect their position prejudicially. It looks as if even the words of the British Government will have to be belied, in the interests of these civilians! That Government is bound to introduce such changes as will gradually lead to the establishment of responsible Government in India and to do this, they will have to entrust powers to the Indians, whether they be few or many. But an attempt to do so may, at all times, be opposed by the civilians on the grounds adduced by them now. This means that India will have always to remain in a subject condition as she is now. But the British Government will only try to keep their word. If then the civilians offer to resign, the only thing the Government can do is to accept their resignation immediately and inform them that they have forfeited their claim to pension, as they refused to obey the orders of Government. Lord Morley did the same thing once with a Lieutenant-Governor and with Mr. Montagu, who was Under Secretary under Lord Morley, also do so? We are on one side glad of the present action of the civilians. The advancement of the Indians will, according to the Montagu-Chelmsford report, depend mostly on the Civilians and as the latter have now clearly come out with their attitude regarding the advancement of the Indians, it is patent that no reforms, which expect their co-operation, will be possible. So if it is the intention of the Government to grant us responsible government, unless we are granted complete Home Rule in the beginning at least in the provinces, the civilians will never permit us to have it later.

Swaraj, the panacea for all evils.

19. The Swadesamitran, of the 2nd January, publishes, under this heading, the gist of a contribution to the India of London by Sir Bernard Houghton, who explains how Swaraj proved to be the best remedy for all evils in Canada and dwells upon the necessity for applying the same remedy to India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

India and the Labour Party.

20. The Swadesamitran, of the 2nd January, reproduces, in its issue of the 3rd January, the substance of an article from the Herald, a Labourite organ, in which it refers to the high death rate and lack of education in India and remarks that the life and liberty of lakhs of Indians are under the control of some high officials led by the Viceroy, that nothing has been done as yet to fulfil the promise in the Proclamation of Queen Victoria to the effect that the administration of India will be conducted in such a manner as to befit her eventually to have Home Rule and that the reform proposals drafted by Mr. Montagu in consultation with Lord Chelmsford do not satisfy the aspirations of the Indians. It points out how deputations sent by the Indians to explain their aspirations to the British public were turned back by the British Government, as "the rulers had realised their folly and were ashamed of it" and observes that many Indians have been employed in England to speak on behalf of the Government and that the latter are adopting the same policy for bringing into disrepute the efforts of the people to attain progress as they do in the case of the Labour movement. It says that the question of granting Home Rule to India cannot be treated lightly and that such a treatment may land both the British and the Indians in danger. It finally appeals to the Labourites in England not to be content with passing resolutions at conferences but to see that countries like India, Ceylon, Ireland and Egypt, are represented in the Peace Conference and that the ideal, for which crores of lives have been sacrificed in this war, is applied to all countries in the British Empire.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 4th January, also reproduces this article in its own words.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

21. The Swadesamitran, of the 4th January, invites the attention of the British public to the words of Mr. Kastiriranga Ayyangar in a speech delivered by him in London in which he is reported to have pointed out that it is the educated Indians that have been taking a great interest in the lot of the ordinary people and that the European capitalists, merchants and officials have been not only keeping aloof from the masses but have also been ever obstructive to the efforts made to benefit the latter and laid stress upon the necessity of reforms being introduced in India on the lines suggested by the Congress and the Moslem League.

The British public and India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

22. The Swadesamitran, of the 6th January, refers to the party spirit that is said to have arisen in Ceylon and Burma in the matter of the reforms demanded by the leaders, and attributing the same to the action of the Anglo-Indians, observes:—In countries, which do not enjoy a democratic form of government, but are under the rule of foreigners, there is always obstruction to any attempt to introduce reforms in the administration. Many officials, who have been exercising absolute powers are not ready to give them up and they create factions among the people. The creation of the Justice party in this Presidency may be quoted as an instance. In addition to this many of these officials also try secretly to oppose the introduction of reforms and the device of the civilians in Bihar will prove this.

Impediments to reforms.

The paper refers also in this connexion to the observation of the Governor of Ceylon that it is imprudent, unjust and also a mistake on the part of those demanding reforms to condemn the officials, who are sacrificing themselves for the benefit of the public and discharging their duty boldly and remarking that no one would condemn officials of the type mentioned by that Governor and that it is only those, who are not caring for the interests of the public, that are found fault with, asks how many officials there are in Ceylon or India, who satisfy his description of them that they should consider themselves to be the servants of the public and allow the latter to approach them freely and represent their grievances.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

23. Adverting to the conclusion of the suit for damages filed against Mr. Clayton by Mr. Hassan Imam by the former apologising fully for his conduct and the latter accepting the same, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th January, remarks:—Some Europeans, however high their culture and status may be, have an unnecessary aversion and hatred for the Indians and Mr. Clayton perhaps belongs to this class. We do not see why the few Europeans, who have come to India in their own interests, attain fame through the Indians and live amidst them, should have this feeling towards the latter. The object of the suit of Mr. Hassan Imam is only to teach a lesson to the Europeans not to behave like Mr. Clayton hereafter. We wish every European will impress on his mind the lesson learnt by Mr Clayton in this case and behave with respect towards the Indians.

The Clayton-Imam case.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 6th January, also refers to the object with which this suit was instituted by Mr. Hassan Imam and remarks that Lord Morley himself has once stated that, if the Europeans are to treat the Indians high-handedly and with scanty courtesy, it will lead to serious consequences.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 7th Jan. 1919.

After pointing out that if Europeans display a brotherly feeling towards Indians, the latter will greatly love the former, which will surely tend to strengthen the bond of alliance between India and England, and that it cannot help expressing regret at the fact that certain Europeans forget these valuable principles, the Manorama, of the 7th January, refers to the conclusion of the Clayton-Imam case and says:—In any case this must have taught a good lesson to Mr. Clayton, and it must serve as a good lesson to such other Europeans as behave rudely towards Indians. If some Europeans treat Indians forgetting that Indians are members of the British Empire like themselves and are the beloved subjects of His Imperial Majesty the King-Emperor, it must be remembered that by doing so they are reducing the strength of the Empire. We, therefore, think that it is absolutely necessary that the Government should issue a general warning about this matter.

The Clayton-Imam case.

24. In a leader on this subject the Desabhaktan, of the 4th January, observes :— The responsibility of Indian administration shifted from the Hindus to the Muhammadans and from them to the British. Now the Hindus and the Muhammadans have become British subjects. So it will be a great folly for these two communities to stand divided hereafter in political matters. Both these are born only of mother Bharata ; and on them rests the affluence or the poverty of the country. It will be detrimental to the progress of the country for the Hindus and the Muhammadans to quarrel with each other on account of petty religious differences and get entangled in the snares of the foreigners. Let the Hindu and Moslem brethren note the story of two calves of a cow fighting with each other when a way-farer took advantage of it, milked the cow and carried away the milk. They have just recognised the truth of this and are trying to stand united. Their union is quite necessary now, as the Labour party has not come to power in the recent general election and many sympathisers of India have not been returned to the Parliament. Both these communities wish for a government responsible to the people. The rulers treat both of them in the same manner, and do not make any distinction between the two. So the communities should note this and come forward to wage a righteous war on behalf of the mother country. If these two communities had attempted to stand united 200 years ago, as they do now, India would not have become a prey to any one. It is our ignorance that has been the cause of our misery. But it is a consolation that we have the British as our rulers, who are lovers of liberty. To get back from them our lost liberty, union, perseverance and constitutional agitation are essential. The Hindu-Moslem entente will open the eyes of the British and will secure for India all the benefits she is in need of.

The Hindu-Moslem entente.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

25. The Desabhaktan, of the 4th January, reports the Madras Mail to have stated that the 'savages' have found fault with the Rowlatt Committee's report, and adds :—Whom this paper mean by savages—all the Congress-men or all that criticised the Rowlatt Committee's report ? The Government should note the despicable words used by this paper in regard to Indians. Is there none to punish this Anglo-Indian paper which behaves as cruelly as savages ?

The meanness of the Madras Mail.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

26. Referring to the 'Mischievous propensity' of the Anglo-Indian newspapers in general and to the fact that the Times has been writing against the Indians for some time past, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th January, observes :— The Government should note that it is the Anglo-Indian papers that goad the Indians into political agitation. This matter has often been urged by us, and the people too are quite in accord with us in this view. But it is very much to be regretted that the Government should continue to evince sympathy with these papers.

The mischief of the Madras Times.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

27. Referring to a speech of Mr. George Launsbury at London, in which he is said to have observed that the non-regulation of industries will lead to the poverty of a country and that, though a large number of articles may be manufactured, this poverty would increase if the manufacturing processes and the methods of distribution are not again properly regulated, the Desabhaktan, of the 4th January, observes :—The words of Mr. Launsbury are applicable to India also. This land of Bharata, which was once famous for its riches, is now the poorest of all countries. If India is to get rid of her poverty, the condition of her industries should be improved. Generally speaking, India has not begun to carry on industries on modern lines. We, therefore, request the Government to take speedy measures to act upon the recommendations of the Industries Commission. State aid is indispensable to India, as she is just beginning to adopt new industrial methods. In addition to affording the help and advice of industrial experts, the Government should interest themselves in starting industrial banks. Let us await the action of the Government of India in this matter.

The industrial advancement.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

In the course of a leading article under the heading "Industries", the Malayali, of the 11th January, points out that Indian patriots are complaining that a beginning has not yet been made to carry out any of the recommendations of the Industrial

MALAYALI, Quilon, 11th Jan. 1919.

Commission and referring to the proceedings of the All-India Industrial Conference recently held at Delhi, it concurs in the opinion of Indian leaders that what s chiefly necessary for the development of Indian industries is capital and Government help, that as Indians neglect to start industrial concerns for want of capital the Government should establish and finance Industrial Banks and impose protective duties on Indian exports of raw products and imports of manufactured articles, that the latter subject should receive the special attention of the Government of India, and that, instead of bringing down industrial experts from foreign countries, young Indians should be sent out to such countries for all kinds of industrial training and industrial concerns should be opened nnder their supervision. It observes further that industries and commerce will never be in a flourishing condition except in a country governed by the people themselves.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

Release of political prisoners.

28. Referring to the news that Count Plunket of the Sein Fein party in Ireland, who was kept in custody in England for eight months for having conspired with Germany, has since been liberated unconditionally and has arrived in Dublin, Desabhaktan, of the 4th January, says:—While such gentlemen are being set free, cannot the Indian |patriots, who are kept in prison and custody, be liberated? Cannot the Government take pity on our suffering brethren at least in consideration of their victory in the worldwar and the help rendered to them by the Indians.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Jan. 1919.

The present civilization.

29. Remarking that all the ferocious qualities, which were found in this country in ancient days, are now having full play in the west and that, if the westerners will give up their modern civilization, they too will come to have righteous qualities, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th January, says:—Even our people have lost their soul force and come to be materialists only after reading the works written by foreigners, who think of securing their own happiness by killing human beings, conquering countries and oppressing the people therein. The devil of the present civilization has possessed our country, is burning our country like poison and is devouring it like a demon. So it is our duty to destroy this civilization and the only way of doing this is to develop soul-force, with which one can get the world round without any money, weapon or strength.

30. The Hindu Nesan, of the 7th January, reproduces, in a leaderette, the substance of one in New India of the 4th idem on this subject.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Jan. 1919.

The Anglo-Indian papers.

31. The Desabhaktan, of the 7th January, writes:—We think the Anglo-Indian papers are always intent only on creating a faction among the Indians. It has become their business to find fault with every undertaking of the Indians. There is not a grain of gratitude among them. It is an admitted fact that the Anglo-Indians come here only to earn money and get arrogant after making a mint of it. Still they deem it a pastime to condemn India and the Indians. We regret very much that the Times of India has also taken up this rôle now. It characterises the resolution of the Congress, suggesting that Mr. Tilak should represent India in the Peace Conferenee, to be worse than the acts of the Sein Fieners. Even a boy in the street will laugh at this observation. If the resolutions of the Congress are to be compared to the Sein Fien movement, how many disturbances were caused by the Congress and how much loss has resulted to the Government therefrom? Mr. Tilak is not an ordinary man. He is an incarnation to do away with the system of bureaucratic rule in India and establish a Government based on truth and justice. This paper thinks that, by having thrown out the resolution offering a welcome to the Prince of Wales, the Congress has degraded itself. There is only a rumour that the Prince of Wales intends going to all the countries that helped in the war, so as to thank them personally. It is not known when he will start or what countries he will visit, and how can the Congress hastily pass a resolution of welcome.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Jan. 1919.

The Madras Students' Convention.

32. Remarking that it is clear from the students having passed a number of resolutions at this convention beneficial both to themselves and the public that they are coming to have a wider outlook, the Swadesamitran, of the 7th January, says:—All along Government service was the only goal for every one in India and even the students tried to befit themselves for this. But, as the trend of the times is changing elsewhere, it is undergoing a change even here. It is very important that not only our students but also others should realise that individual advantages will increase by the people of the whole country improving their condition. The resolutions of this convention show that our students have realised this. Mr. Gardiner, the President of the Convention, declared that the Government were ready to do everything in their power to make the country improve politically, socially and economically. But there should not be an impression that the ideal of the people of India is not compatible with that of the Government. The ideal of the Indians is only that their status in India should be the same as that of the people of other free countries. If the Government are prepared to help India in this direction, they should immediately begin to reform the Indian constitution on the lines suggested by the Congress and the Moslem League and take steps to improve the prosperity of India. Unless the country attains independence politically, the development of trade and industry may at times be hampered. The only way in which the Government can help the advancement of the country socially is by providing facilities for all people of both sexes having education easily. Unless there is advancement on all the lines noted above simultaneously, the ideal of the country cannot be reached. Let us take the words of Mr. Gardiner and believe that the Government are prepared to adopt the measures necessary for such an advancement. If they are not, it is the duty of the people to press them to do so and it is a good sign of the times that our students have come to realise this duty.

The Medical Service in India.

33. The Hindu Nesan, of the 7th January, upholds the prayer of the all-India Medical Conference held at Delhi that the temporary commissions given to the Indian Medical officers, who went to the front in this war, should be continued to them even after they return to civil duty, in that they risked all their future prospects and volunteered to do military duty and it is the duty of the Government to appreciate and honour the services of all who have done good medical work in the army and made a name, whether they be Englishmen or Indians. This paper also approves of the resolution of the conference urging that the recommendation of the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu, that the Indian Medical Service examination should be held simultaneously in India and England, should be given effect to and adds that, as men are required for the higher posts in the Medical service, it is necessary to provide facilities for Indians entering that service.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 7th Jan. 1919.

Juvenile smoking.

34. Referring to a law passed by the Bengal Legislative Council prohibiting smoking on the part of youths, the Hindu Nesan, of the 7th January, says:—Much money is spent in this Presidency on smoking, which is an unnecessary waste. This amount can well be spent in some other useful direction. It will be advantageous to pass a law here too to prohibit smoking by youths.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 7th Jan. 1919.

The Publicity Boards.

35. Referring to a notification by the Bengal Government that the Publicity Board in Bengal will be dissolved as the war has closed, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th January, observes:—It is not known what Lord Pentland's Government propose to do in this matter. They cannot blame us, if we say that they are always wanting in forethought. As regards the food situation and the Park Fair, they did not take any precautions and they paid no heed to the warning of the public, fearing loss of prestige. But seeing that even the Government of Bengal with Lord Ronaldshay, who was once aid-de-camp to Lord Curzon, as their head, have acted with forethought in some matters, it is a great disgrace to us that Lord Pentland's Government should be backward in every respect. Sir Alexander Cardew, the Finance Member, should consider what a huge amount of money is unnecessarily spent on the Publicity Board in Madras. If the Government of Madras had realised the present situation properly, they would not have permitted such a waste of funds. Will they pay attention to this at least hereafter?

Desabhaktan, Madras, 8th Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 8th January, also refers to the dissolution of this Board in Bengal and, pointing to the large expenditure which its retention entails, which can be utilized profitably in various other ways, remarks :—The Board in our presidency is very active. But this is no reason for retaining it, nor is there any emergency for the same. We therefore urge again that this Board should not be kept on even for a single moment longer.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Jan. 1919.

The ship-building industry.

36. The Desabhaktan, of the 8th January, refers to the flourishing condition of this industry in India in ancient days and remarking that it was the East India Company, who ruled India on commercial lines, that prevented, on various grounds, the development of this industry and the shipping trade in general in this country, and reporting them to have stated that, if Indian sailors were to enter England, they would lose the regard and fear they had for the Europeans in India, observes :—In these ways the very traces of the ship-building industry and shipping trade have been effaced from India. If the British had encouraged the ship-building industry in India from those days both England and India would have been immensely profited by it. Owing to some misfortune, the administrative officers of those days paid no heed to this matter. Will the British Government patronize this industry in India at least hereafter and benefit both the countries ?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Jan. 1919.

British trade and industry.

37. Referring to the opposition of the Europeans in Burma to a new scheme of reforms prepared by Sir Reginald Craddock for that province and to the remark said to have been made by one Mr. Forbes that, in the absence of the trade and industry worked by the efforts of the British, the whole Government would come down for want of funds, the Swadesamitran, of the 8th January, deems this to be a curious argument and adds :—According to the puranas, the snake Adisesha supports the whole world. In this 20th century the Europeans are the pillars on which India and Burma rest. Perhaps, before their advent, these two countries never existed.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Jan. 1919.

Wake up.

38. In the course of a leader under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th January, observes : —The recent huge war may be compared to a deluge and now that the deluge has come and gone, President Wilson is the Lord Brahma who is engaged in the work of creation and the whole world is anxiously awaiting the results of his work. The sun of liberty has dawned and the world is eager to enjoy the pleasure of that sunshine. Some may take it that the world here includes India. President Wilson has always used the word 'world' when speaking about liberty, though it is not known what exactly he means by this word. It is doubtful whether it applies only to the white world, or to the countries that entered into the war or the whole world. Our object in writing about this subject is only to point out that we should not get ourselves deceived in thinking that India also is included in the word 'world'. It is usual for the Indians to be pleased by small words and little courtesies and, getting duped thereby, give up their position. Hence it is, this paper is often uttering words of warning 'Awake, awake'. No western country can deny that India once excelled all the other countries in respect of wisdom, administration, war, agriculture and industry. Since the time of Alexander the Great, the educational, material and industrial wealth of India is being steadily transferred to the western countries and India has, in return, imbibed the false western civilization and is ruining herself. The westerners ruined our industries here and transplanted them in their own land. The way in which the East India Company, out of sympathy for the English merchants, destroyed our factories, oppressed our industrialists and imposed unjust duties on our articles, is clearly described by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in his dissenting minute to the report of the Industries Commission. It is recorded by historians that the muslin manufactured in our country was purchased by the Egyptians and that ships built in India navigated in the Thames. A thrill passes over us when we read these things and our blood boils. Alas! Our industries have perished. We, who built ships, are now idling away in playing football with the westerners. Our lives become a prey to empty titles, are spent in banqueting halls and offices. Industry, the main spring of the country, has been seized by the westerners and our country thereby stands tarnished and disgraced. It is only to remove our shakles that the European war appeared. The night has passed, the darkness has waned and the sun of liberty is just rising in splendour. Afraid of this Doctor Nayar too has returned, and Mr. Tilak is striving to turn the light of the sun on India. O Indians! Are you still asleep? The war front of liberty awaits you. Awake to wage war for righteousness. Lloyd George and President Wilson are the Commanders in the war of liberty of the world. The flags of liberty are waving in the air, and the drums of victory are sounding. Awake, arise, to advance to the front with truth and courage in either hand.

39. Referring to the telegram given by the Bombay Rice Merchants' Association to the Viceroy complaining against the steamer freight having been increased sixfold now, the Swadesamitran, of the 8th January, observes:—It is a known fact that the Government have taken over all the ships and are managing the business themselves. The chief grievance of the rice merchants is that the freight demanded is far above the cost of running the ships. Seeing that the increase of freight is one of the chief causes of the unduly high price of rice and the regulation of the scale of this freight is under the control of the Government, can they remain quiet without caring for public benefit? We urge that they should pay prompt attention to this matter and do the needful.

The steamer freight.

SWADASAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Jan. 1919.

40. The Desabhaktan, of the 9th January, contains a short note under this heading and observes:—The acts of the bureaucrats appointed by the Britishers in India and Ireland, have cast a slur on the British justice. An Irish dramatist is reported to have been sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment for having sung two Irish songs in a certain place. Oh what a punishment for the offence! This punishment may well be compared to the punishment inflicted upon the students who cried out Vande Mataram at the time of the Partition of Bengal. We understand that the Irish people are endeavouring to return as members to the Parliament only such as have been inflicted such unjust punishment Why cannot we too elect as our representatives those that are charged by the bureaucrats for political offences and unnecessarily punished?

The British justice

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

41. Remarking that Sir Reginald Craddock, the Lieutenant Governor of Burma, wants to cut off all connexion between India and Burma and that he is making efforts to secure this end, the Desabhaktan, of the 9th January, observes:—We can well assert that many evil consequences will result by thus separating Burma from India. It is evident from history that, for ages past, there has been a close connexion between these two countries. So the people of both the countries will regret the proposed separation. The Burmese cannot pull on even for a day without the assistance of the Indians. It is highly regrettable that, without knowing this, a way-farer like Sir Reginald Craddock should be devising some new course. It appears the European Association in Rangoon is urging the appointment of a committee to settle the financial relationship between Burma and India, in view of the proposed separation of the two countries. It is not apparent how this association will be a gainer by this projected separation. It is the opinion of the wise that, if Burma is not administered under the supervision of the Viceroy, it will suffer under the autocratic rule of the Lieutenant Governor. Will the British Government act realising this?

Burma and India.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

42. Referring to the fact that a circular had been sent by the Madras Chamber of Commerce to the Chambers in other provinces calling upon each of them to make a representation to the Government of India to crush New India, "which preaches disloyalty" and to confine those in charge of it for writing seditious articles, and to the refusal of the Burma Chamber of Commerce to accede to this suggestion, the Desabhaktan, of the 9th January, says:—What benefit is likely to result to this Anglo-Indian Association by crushing New India? It has not acted more ignominiously than the Madras Mail and no respectable Indian paper would do so. The above circular of the Madras Chamber of Commerce has created in us various doubts. What right has this tiny association to ask the Government to crush a paper which is published for the benefit of the public? Who are the members of this body? We fail to see why those, who have come down here from England to amass a fortune, should interfere in other matters without confining themselves to their business. The Hindu and New India have been prohibited from entering into Burma. We have to suspect whether this may be due to the suggestion of this Anglo-Indian mercantile association. This makes the wise presume that the present administration is run only by these Anglo-Indian merchants. Apart from this, we can certainly say that these mercantile associations have no power to crush a newspaper, working for the benefit of the public.

New India and the Madras Chamber of Commerce.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

MAHA VIKATADUTAN, Madras, 4th Jan. 1919.

43. The Mahavikatadutan, of the 4th January, remarks that titles are usually conferred either for contributing money lavishly to the war fund and other public purposes or for doing Government work properly and referring specially to those in the new year honours list this time. observes that this Presidency gets very few titles and that even then a great difference is made between black and white.

The new year honours.

LOKOPAKARI Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

The Lokopakari of the 6th January, echoes almost the same views as those contained in the Desabhaktan, of the 1st idem on this subject and abstracted in paragraph 34 of Report No. 2 of 1919.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 6th Jan. 1919.

A correspondent to the Sampad Abhyudaya of the 6th January writes:—The titles of Diwan Bahadur and Rao Bahadur have been conferred this year on Rao Bahadur P. Tyagaroya Chetty and Mr. Kandaswamy Chetti. Both these persons are leaders among Brahmin haters. They are very clever in creating ill-will between the Brahmins and non-Brahmins. The grant of titles to these persons shows to what extent they have earned the good will of Lord Pentland. There are some of this type in Mysore too and, one or two among them even surpass these. I earnestly hope that they, too, may get titles in proportion to their Brahman hatred.

The new year honours.

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 11th Jan. 1919.

A correspondent, writing in the Samadarsi of the 11th January, states that out of a total of 310 new year honours, 226 have been given to Europeans and only 84 to Indians; and this in a land inhabited by 320 million Indians and only a few hundred thousand Europeans and in a matter where work in India for King and country was to be rewarded. This is how the bureaucracy moves. How can the people expect to deserve the generosity of the bureaucracy, before a Government which finds fault with the people in whatever they may try to do for the public good or for the King's glory, in a land weakened by caste hatred and jealousy in every direction whether in respect of Social Reform or Administrative freedom or industrial advancement?

The new year honours.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

44. The Lokopakari, of the 6th January, reproduces the substance of the comments of the Hindu Nesan of the 31st December 1918 and the 4th January 1919 on this subject, which have been abstracted in paragraph 24 of Report No. 2 of 1919.

The Madras Tramways.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

45. The Swadesamitran, of the 9th January, publishes an article from the pen of a correspondent in which he dwells upon the "Cruel acts" of the Censor in detaining at times the news of this country from reaching the west, and in which the following observations find place:—The last Congress at Delhi has chosen Tilak, Ghandi, Hassan Imam and others as representatives of India at the Peace Conference, and it is proposed to send a telegram to these persons to this effect. But my anxiety is that the telegram should reach them unobstructed by the Censor. As this is a matter of very great importance, the Censor will be incurring the displeasure of the thirty-three crores of the Indian population, unless he, without being careless (as he was in regard to Mrs. Besant's cable), arranges to see that the message reaches the destination in the appointed time.

The Censor.

DESABHAKTAN Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

46. The Desabhaktan, of the 9th January, publishes an article from the pen of a correspondent, in which the following observations occur:—Persons that are appointed to the post of the Secretary of State for India, however staunchly they might have supported liberty and swaraj, hated repression, and entertained liberal views in general before their appointment, stamp under their feet the rights and privileges of the people, and become enemies to liberty the moment they are appointed to this post. It is only when Lord John Morley, the chief disciple of the late Mr. W. E. Gladstone and a follower of John Bright, John Stuart Mill, Thomas Bain and Bradlaugh, known for his wide experience and deep learning, was wielding the administration of India holding office as the Secretary of State that such repressive measures as Regulation III of 1818, the Seditious Meetings Act, the Press Act, and the Special Tribunals Act were revived and passed. It is only then many patriots were kept in custody and deported. The official publications based on the Rowlatt Committee's report clearly show how the patriots who, with disinterested motives, rendered services to the country, were oppressed by the Government with the help of the moderates, at the time Lord Morley's scheme of reforms was published. Even at the present time, when Mr. Montagu of the Liberal Party is the Secretary of State, repressive laws such as the Defence of India Act are still in force to enable the bureaucrats to gag, imprison and oppress the patriots who in a spirit of self-sacrifice work for the liberation of the thirty crores of the people of India. In Bengal and other provinces thousands of youths are being kept in custody for years together without any inquiry and ill-treated in prison merely on the strength of the C.I.D. reports. It is known to all how our hearts are throbbing every moment at the sufferings of our countrymen in various ways. To add to this, the Rowlatt Committee's report also teems with recommendations for repressive measures. What is the necessity for this incessant increase of such measures? The present council of the Secretary of State for India should be dissolved and reconstituted with Indians as members thereof, and the law relating to the administration of India properly amended. Or the council should preferably be disbanded once for all. How violently did Mr. Montagu condemn the present method of Indian administration when the report of the Mesopotamian Commission was discussed? Then again how strongly he pleaded for India's cause, at the time when Lord Morley's statue was unveiled and the Indian budget was discussed? In spite of all this, what is the reason for India to be suffering like this now? It is only the retention of the India Council. Mr. Montagu himself has exposed the defects in the method in which this council is transacting business. If this is disbanded, then the voice of the old civilian bandicoots therein will not prevail, and then only will the harmony between England and India be strengthened and lead to the formation of a mighty empire in the world.

British officials in India.

The Madras Administration Report for 1917–18.

45. The Desabhaktan, of the 9th January, observes:—The Government of Madras invariably entertain wrong notions of all matters, and they are perhaps unaware of the evil consequences thereof. We would repeatedly urge that it is neither fair nor just on their part to blindly place all manner of constructions on the several events happening in the country, the movements started therein and the objects of such movements and publish the same without ascertaining their real significance. For instance, taking the case of the administration report of the Madras Presidency for 1917–18, everybody will admit that the opinions therein expressed by the Government in regard to the political situation of the country in the year under report, are erroneous. We do not know who writes such false statements and misrepresentations in report like this Whoever he may be, we cannot but think that the fat salary given to him is only a waste. He can now give publicity to such untruths and escape, but we are afraid he cannot escape God's retribution. The Government have in their report attributed the political agitation in the year under review to three causes. But in doing so, have they forgotten that the increase of political agitation in this presidency is due to the evil deeds of the bureaucrats and their wicked attempts to overthrow the Home Rule League and the Labour Union? It is certain that though the authorities might forget their evil deeds through the opulence of their power, yet the public cannot forget it. Then regarding the newspapers published in this presidency during the year under report, the Government think that these papers employed violent language while writing about political matters. If it had been a fact, we have to ascribe it only to the action of the Government. The report attributes the increase of the Home Rule agitation to New India and the Hindu. It is seen that in the year 1917 nine newspapers were crushed for the reason, as it appears to us that security was demanded of them. If the Government had evinced sympathy with the wishes and aspirations of the people, there would have been affinity between the rulers and the ruled. But the Government had their own old way. Whose fault is this?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

The Madras Administration Report for 1917-18.

In commenting upon this report, the Swadesamitran, of the 9th January, observes:—Though one should be glad at the Government having realized the importance of the political struggle of the people and given it a prominence in the preface to this report, the statements made therein do pain us much. These statements give room to the conclusion that the labourers have no grievance whatever and that it is the Home Rulers that have set them up. It may be that some Home Rulers are connected with the labour movement. But we warn the Government that, unless they realize that this movement is worked solely by the labourers, they will fail to discharge their duty at critical junctures. It is really surprising that, while this report should contain a narration of the incidents that occurred last year, it should embody the opinions of the bureaucracy that drafted it. It is stated therein that the extremist papers contained some violent articles in May last year, that His Excellency Lord Pentland had to give a warning about Home Rule at the next meeting of the Legislative Council, that, as this warning was not heeded, Mrs. Besant and others were interned and that, though the agitation set up thereupon was not a genuine one, they were subsequently released according to the wishes of the Government of India. Perhaps the gentleman who drafted this report is unaware of the facts that after Lord Pentland's warning Mr. Montagu made an announcement in Parliament on the 20th August 1917, that he visited India in pursuance of it and that, in consultation with Lord Chelmsford, he has made some proposals for bringing about Home Rule in India! Though it is stated in the report as if Lord Pentland had anticipated at Ootacamund what was to happen afterwards, subsequent events have proved that His Excellency's views are not those of the British Government. We anxiously await the action of the Government of India on the unusual procedure adopted by the Local Government of adding a preface to their administration report and of making statements therein which insinuate that they acted rightly in interning Mrs. Besant and others and that the Government of India were wrong in having directed their release. The report again makes it appear that the Home Rule movement was a failure and that the non-Brahman movement has proved very effective, which means that all efforts made to reduce the strength of the bureaucracy and transfer it to the people of the country have become useless, while the movement carried on to preserve the strength of the bureaucracy intact has spread like wild-fire. This only makes it sure that the Government are building castles in the air, without understanding the attitude of the people of the country. We have often referred to the impression of many that the non-Brahman movement has the support of certain highly placed officials. But it is only in this report that the Government themselves ventured to appreciate one party and depreciate another. In that portion of the report dealing with newspapers, an appreciative reference is made to the Justice, the organ of the non-Brahman party, having severely condemned the life and work of Mrs. Besant. During the discussion about the Press Act in the Imperial Legislative Council in September last, Sir William Vincent pointed out the inadvisability of papers throwing dust over one another, instead of discussing subjects. But the appreciation of the Justice by the Local Government shows that they are in favour of this undesirable act. The object of the writer of the preface to this report is perhaps to crush Mrs. Besant, New India and the Home Rule movement. As the Government have allowed this impression to be created, the Madras Chamber of Commerce may hereafter press them closer to suppress New India. If the English merchants of Madras try to injure those that work for the Indians, how can the latter tolerate them? Have not the Indians the right to demand the suppression of the Madras Chamber of Commerce?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 10th January, reverts to this report and says:—A close scrutiny of this report cannot but disclose the regret and jealousy of the bureaucracy in having to give up their power. The haphazard statements in the report cannot be justified on any account and the partial attitude of the Government on political questions is to be condemned. It is stated in the report that the efforts of the extremists to promote national education have not been very fruitful. How can the development of national education harm the Madras Government and why should they be jealous of it? They are provoked perhaps because all their attempts to put it down have proved futile. The report shows that the Local Government have a great sympathy for the party, which is traitorous to the country. What can be their motive for this? Perhaps they gloat over the widening of the gulf between the Brahmans and the non-Brahmans. They are inciting class-hatred because they think that their own powers can be preserved intact only if the factions among the people increase. They seem to have a better knowledge of the secrets of the non-Brahmans. It is admitted by many that several statements in the report are contrary to truth. If a few zamindars have joined the aforesaid traitorous party, can it be stated that all zamindars are averse to Home Rule? There is again an observation in the report that the release of Mrs. Besant was taken by those who did not understand the situation correctly and those who had been given a wrong version of the facts, to mean a weakening of the Government in the war. This argument is compatible with that of the Government that political agitators were the cause of the food-riots. The people will clearly understand from this the nature of their rulers. It is not fair for the Government to take sides, when there are factions among the people. We have often pointed out that the Local Government are proceeding on a wrong track. Though they commit mistakes, they are provoked if such mistakes are pointed out. As they are siding with the Anglo-Indians and the non-Brahmans, there is room to suspect that they may conduct the administration according to the wishes of Mr. Welby. When will the time come when the bureaucracy cease to act on the evil advice of a body like the Madras Chamber of Commerce?

The Madras Administration Report for 1917–18.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

Referring to a statement in this report that the people were loyal, happy and contented during the year under report, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th January, observes that they suffered greatly last year on account of the rise in the price of food-stuffs, and scarcity of cloth and fuel, and remarks:—We accept the statement that the people were loyal and contented, and the reason for this is that the Indians are accustomed to bear calmly any kind of hardship. But the statement that the Indians were happy is contrary to truth. The authorities can write whatever they like. But none can hide the truth. The Government have probably interpreted as happiness the calmness of the people who, being loyal, could do nothing else.

High price of rice in Madras.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

48. The Desabhaktan, of the 10th January, writes as follows:—For the past one week rice is being sold at exorbitant prices in the markets of Madras with impunity. Further, it is stated that the stock of rice in the markets is also diminishing. For centuries together, it has been usual for rice to be brought into Madras from other places. But now, instead of this, to find rice being sent out of Madras to places which grow paddy, is due to nothing but the anomalous exigencies of the times. Are the Government aware that rice is being sent from here to Conjeeveram, Sadras, Kaveripakkam and other places? Are not the miseries suffered by the Madrasees enough? It is necessary that the Government should come forward, at least hereafter, to relieve the distress of the people.

President Wilson and the future.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

49. Referring to the statement of the Madras Times that President Wilson is a visionary, the Swadesamitran, of the 10th January, observes:—Attempts can be made to refute his views only by such criticisms, but it is next to impossibility to refute the same by argument. If all the great powers in the world would adopt the views that President Wilson has been expressing ever since the Americans entered on this war, the statement of the Christians that all men are brethren will become a reality. His recent observation at Milan that force can be put down at any time but not so the love of liberty, is borne out by the experience of the world. Let those who dream to wield unlimited authority by curbing the love of liberty bear the above words in their mind. If President Wilson's views end only as empty dreams, he cannot be held responsible for it. If the powers that meet at the Peace Conference refuse to accede to his views, it is certain they will have no manner of justice in their cause, but the mere ambition to rule over others keeping the latter under subjection. So far as these views concern India, they have been accepted by all parties. What he said in Turin on the 7th instant about the investment of the foreign capital in a country and the consequent increase of the influence of the foreigners therein is borne out by the experience of India. Before the time of Lord Dalhousie, the Europeans did not begin to work out industries in India on a large scale investing their capital here. Till then, though the East India Company were mindful of increasing their profits, they attempted to rule India for the benefit of the Indians. But Lord Dalhousie arranged for English merchants to start industries investing large capital here. Since then foreign merchants began to take a firm root in this country and their influence grew strong. Even now, they form the main obstacle in the way of the Indians' getting responsible government. The cry of Lord Sydenham in England that the grant of Home Rule to India will affect the British capitalists, is known to all. As India has thus become a pasture-land for the foreign capitalists, all the political parties here demand the right of imposing import, export and counter duties. When once the right of taxation is obtained, the British will no longer wish to have political control, which is now employed towards acquiring wealth and thereby increasing the prosperity of their countrymen. If India gets this right, then Britain will agree to maintain with her the same relationship as she has now with the colonies, and renounce political control. So India is thoroughly convinced of the truth of the statement that, when once foreign capital is allowed in a country, the influence of the foreigners will predominate therein and is demanding a right to imporove the present condition.

Home Rule.

50. In a story published in the form of a dialogue in the supplement to the Swadesamitran of the 11th January, the following observations find place :—

A.—Are you aware of the fate of the Home Rule League?

B.—Yes. I am. Even the local Government have made some remarks about it in the preface to their administration report, which indicate their aversion to it.

A.—It is but natural. The time is at hand. Now, what has become of the Home Rule movement?

Sale of indigenous medicines in India

51. The Desabhaktan, of the 9th January, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Times on a booklet on the indigenous medicines in India by Mr. J. C. Ghosh, Chemist, Madras Government Medical Stores, detailing the necessity for a special legislation in the matter of the sale of such medicines here.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

The future of India.

52. In a lengthy article under this heading contributed by a correspondent to the Desabhaktan, of the 9th January, extolling the greatness of India in ancient times, the following observations occur :—As the Britishers and the Allies entered on the war with high ideals, the Indians also came forward to sacrifice their body, life and wealth in favour of the British. Is it not then the duty of the British to confer on India, a country that waged war to safeguard the rights of foreign countries, her own rights? The Minto-Morley scheme of reforms was in fact not productive of much good to us. Now the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme has come out, about which varied views are held by the people, and, judging from the present situation, we have to say that even this is not adequate for us. . . The East India Company that came to India for purposes of trade gradually established their rule here by alternately helping one party against the other. From this it can be understood that it is trade that gives a country a status. Generally speaking, it is those countries that are foremost in trade and industry that excel in prosperity and wealth. . . The British merchants, afraid of the rapid progress of Japan in trade and industries, think that the trade of Japan with India should not be permitted to develop. Fearing that the progress of industries in India would materially affect their profits, they have now begun to prefer the growth of Indian trade to that of Japan. This we should attribute to our good fortune. . . The riches of India have risen in flood and emptied themselves into the ocean of the western countries and the annual drain of wealth from here is not small. Now India is unable to take care of herself.

The food situation.

54. Inviting the attention of the Government to the present condition of the rice market, the Hindu Nesan, of the 11th January, observes:—What is the cause of such a stress even in places where plenty of rice could be had? What made it necessary to send rice out of Madras to Conjeeveram and the neighbouring villages? What became of the rice available in these places? The Government should have accorded permission for the export of rice from there. Before granting this permission, should they not have reserved the quantity required for local consumption? Large quantities of rice are allowed to be in stock in the Gōdāvari and Kistna districts and, in some places there, rice can be had even now at five measures per rupee, whereas in Madras it is difficult to get even three measures. The authorities, who were managing the rice trade and regulating the distribution of that commodity among the various places, should see that rice is sent out only from the northern districts to other places. It is a serious mistake that they should have acted just the other way. While the internal affairs of this Presidency are in this condition, matters in Burma and Bengal are also painful. The Government of India remained inactive for a long time in regard to the food question and the measures subsequently adopted were not adequate. Finally, we were under the impression that they had since made proper arrangements in the matter. Now we have reason to think that our impression was wrong. The rice merchants in Bengal and Burma have again increased the price of rice. Who has permitted them to do so? It appears that the proprietors of rice mills in Rangoon are bent on making huge profits at this crisis. We should try to convince them that it is not proper to raise the prices as they please. The Government of India should not give them so much liberty.

'Food production.'

The Hindu Nesan, of the 13th January, observes:—It is true that the Agricultural Department preserves carefully in their farms cattle manure and demonstrate the application thereof. But they stop with this. They should devise means to instruct the ryots in different places about the way in which the manure has to be collected. If this work is carefully done, it is certain that the yield will improve though not immediately, at least in course of time. So great benefit will result by the Government paying prompt attention to this matter.

Officials and agriculturists.

55. The Swadesamitran, of the 11th January, refers to a statement in the report of the Gwalior State in which the Chief of that State is said to have observed that the officials should never forget that their wealth, happiness, and welfare entirely depend upon the agriculturists, and that, if they follow the modern principle that their prestige should be maintained at any cost, the State will be ruined, and observes that these words apply very well to many of the bureaucrats here.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Jan. 1919.

Necessity for agitation.

56. The Swadesamitran, of the 11th January, reproduces in Tamil the speech of the editor of the Hindu in Ceylon and certain opinions expressed by the editor of the Basumati on their return from England, and makes the following observations among others:—We should try to achieve our ends by making every Englishman realize that the eminence of the British Empire can be maintained only if India is prosperous and contented. In addition to this, propagandist work must be carried on in India on an extensive scale. The cry of the Indians should reach the ears of the Englishmen, who assume an attitude of indifference towards India. As Mr. Lloyd George, who is a Liberal, has to be at the head of the Conservative party, it is not likely that the Cabinet, as constituted under his Presidency, will continue long in power. This coalition may hold only until a final peace is concluded. When foreign affairs are settled and internal questions taken up for consideration, differences will naturally crop up. A new election may then take place, the Labour party may come into power and through them India may be benefited. It is our business to seek the means to this end. . . Though India was not kept in a proper position to offer any assistance at the time of the war, she helped the Empire beyond her means, and the reason for this is her love for the Empire. It is, therefore, the most important duty of the British to satisfy the Indians and the British Statesmen should take care to see that the love of India does not wane. If they do not realize their responsibility, we should make them to do so.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

Death-rate.

57. Quoting figures to show the large number of deaths from cholera, plague, smallpox and other diseases during 1917–18 in this Presidency, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th January, observes:—Very meagre have been the efforts of the Government to prevent these diseases. If these at least had been properly directed, so many deaths could have been avoided. The Government have not made any mention, in their Administration Report, of the measures they propose to adopt to prevent an increase in deaths during this and the following years. We warn the authorities that sound statesmanship demands protection from danger beforehand.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

Recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee.

58. Referring to a recent telegram regarding the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee to be introduced for consideration at the ensuing meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th January, says:—We are greatly afraid whether the peace which at present prevails in the country will be upset if the above recommendations should come into force. Experts in politics say that these recommendations are being brought into force to suppress constitutional agitation in India. We ask the just and the kind Britishers whether it is fair to suppress such agitation. British rule is regarded with a kind of reverence and respect by all. Why then should such a rule give room for being regarded with contempt in India alone? We have many a time pointed out that the administration by the bureaucrats in this country violates justice. When would this administration be supplanted here by true British rule?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

The ignorance of the British.

59. Referring to the statement of Mr. Ghose that none in England knows anything about India, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th January, observes:—This should be particularly noted. The people there are said to be under the impression that the present method of Government in India is a right one. We, as British subjects, are ashamed to note that the British should be unaware of the way in which the country under their sway is being governed. It is highly regrettable that many among the British are not even aware of the existence of a country like India, which has been the cause of all their glory and wealth. It does not matter much if such people keep quiet without talking anything of India. On the other hand, they give out their opinions as if they know much about her and hinder her progress. It is to counteract this, that the people here wish that a deputation should be sent from India.

Religious interference.

60. The Desabhaktan, of the 13th January, refers to an order of the Government of Bihar and Orissa that one Mr. R. Mujumdar, who is now imprisoned in the jail at Hazaribag, should perform the funeral rites for his dead mother within the precincts of the jail and remarks:—It is regrettable that the Government do not realize that, according to the tenets of Hinduism, funeral rites should not be performed in a jail. This reply will certainly cause grief and surprise to the Hindus. The authorities are every day growing ignorant of the religious observances of the people and slighting their feelings. Should we point out that this is contrary to British justice and to the promises of the Government?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Jan. 1919.

Medical facilities in the Madras Presidency.

61. Referring to the statement in a report published by the Government that, during 1917–1918, out of the total number of in-patients in hospitals in this Presidency, 27,281 persons were suffering from infectious diseases, the Desabhaktan, of the 11th January, observes:—What arrangements have the Government made for preventing the spread of infectious diseases in the country? The health condition of the people of our Presidency during the said year was not satisfactory as compared with that of the previous year. It is highly doubtful whether this condition will any way improve during 1918–1919. Day by day famine and pestilence are increasing, and it is not known whether the Government propose to pay due attention to these.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Jan. 1919.

The Madras Mail and the Congress.

62. Adverting to a statement of the Madras Mail that the Home Rule movement which has been in existence in India for the last some years has not received the support of the public, that the main object of this movement is to drive away the British from India, and that the proceedings of the last Congress clearly show how a small coterie consisting of party-spirited and uneducated persons and inexperienced youths have hindered the progress of the Indians, the Desabhaktan, of the 11th January, writes:—We are at a loss to know how this paper made up its mind to remark in this strain. How did it come to know that the Home Rule movement in this country has not obtained the support of the public? Ah! What an insight it has!! Similarly its observation that the Home Rulers are endeavouring to drive away the British from India, has necessarily to be condemned by all Indians, as this is quite contrary to truth. We can strongly assert that none can excel the Home Rulers in loyalty. What construction does the Madras Mail place on the word 'loyalty'? Does it mean that only those that are nodding to all the wrong actions of the Government are loyal persons? There may be so many differences and disputes among the Indians; but what right has this Anglo-Indian paper to deal with them? All are agreed that it is only the Indians that should determine the progress of India and that the Anglo-Indians should have no say in the matter.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Jan. 1918.

Sir S. P. Sinha.

63. Referring to the universal satisfaction caused to the Indians by the appointment of Sir S. P. Sinha as the Under Secretary of State for India, the Swadesamitran, of the 13th January, remarks that this appointment clearly shows that Mr. Montagu is determined to reform the administration in spite of any devices of the civilians to prevent the introduction of administrative reforms.

MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, 14th Jan. 1919.

Sir S. P. Sinha.

In its leading article on Sir S. P. Sinha and the importance of his appointment as Under Secretary of State for India, the Malayala Manorama, of the 14th January, observes that the honour is not only unprecedented but is such as could not have been looked forward to at any time by Indians, and that doubtless all Indians will be immeasurably pleased with the unprecedented honour bestowed upon Sir S. P. Sinha and will be immensely grateful for it to the British Government.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

The Second South Indian Non-Brahman confederation.

64. Adverting to the speech of the Chairman of the Reception Committee of this confederation, in which it is stated that, in spite of the majority of the population being non-Brahmans, it is regrettable they have not adequate representation in the Legislative Councils, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th January, remarks in effect that non-Brahmans would secure high positions in the Legislative Councils and other places if they have the necessary qualifications and that the Government would not wilfully exclude them.

Coming then to the President's speech, this paper makes the following observations among others:—Some of his statements are indeed strange. He says that non-Brahman movement is the only one that tends towards securing Government by the people in India. It is left to our friends to judge how far this statement is true. The only benefit derived from it is so far as we know, the creation of class-hatred and religious differences. . . The President finds fault with the Government and says that the motive of the Government is not apparent, in having taken into their confidence some who are opposed to their views and their administrative policy. . . What is his object in saying like this? Does he mean that the Government should hate the Home Rulers? Again, his observation, questioning the action of the Government in having chosen among the press representatives sent to England, the editor of a paper which was proscribed from two provinces in India, deserves to be ridiculed. Has the loyalty of the editor of the Hindu become tarnished because the Hindu has been thus proscribed? Is not Dr. Nayar, who went to England wholly at the expense of the non-Brahman movement as the true representative of the non-Brahmans, the editor of Justice, a paper which is not found fault with by the Government? Why have not the Government of India chosen him also as a representative of the Press? Perhaps the Government lost sight of him then!

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

The South Indian non-Brahman Conference.

Commenting on the proceedings of the second South Indian non-Brahman Conference, the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th January, remarks:—. . . The resolutions passed by the Conference relating to the prohibition of export of foodstuffs and to the enhancement of water-rate are in accordance with public opinion and the Government will do well to give effect to them. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 8th Jan. 1919.

The National Conferences: A retrospective view.

65. Reviewing the proceedings of the several conferences held at Delhi, the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th January, observes:—. . . The declaration of rights is the most important resolution of the Congress. To reform the system of administration, denying to the people the right of meeting, the right of speaking and the right of the Press will be ineffective like decorating a lifeless idol, and is not certainly calculated to further the national progress. The conflict between the two races under a foreign government gives rise to restriction on national freedom which kill national vitality. The fall of the Russian Empire and the imbecility of the Indian people are the strongest proofs of this statement. . . To those who have understood the opinions expressed by the Muhammadans at their conference, it will be clear that the era of ruling Indians by dividing and cajoling them has come to an end for the British authorities. . . That the desire of Indians for self-government is unanimous has been shown by the National Congress and the Moslem League which met at Delhi. The British Government will do well, in the interests of this country and of the Empire, to establish self-government recognising the force in the resolutions passed by the aforesaid great national assemblies. . . Both the Moderates and the Nationalists are crying aloud with one voice that political reforms without fiscal autonomy will be just like a mirage. . . The well-being of the people will be impossible so long as the resources of the country are used not for its benefit but for the benefit of other countries. . . This economic slavery must be got rid of in order that the poverty of the people which is the main cause for the increase of disease and death among them may be rooted out. The establishment of self-government is the only royal road for the attainment of this object. . .

Village officers.

66. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 9th January, expresses approval and another disapproval of the Village Officers' Act Amendment Bill.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

Village officers.

A correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 6th January, comments as follows upon the Bill to provide for certain changes in the rules governing the succession of persons to village offices and suggests the desirability of the Bill being taken up for consideration after an interval of six months and after making inquiries of the village officers in every district:—The right of registering a mirasi right in the name of a minor has been cancelled, without the principle of succession by mirasi right itself being cancelled. This is not fair. The name of the heir should, under any circumstances, be registered, otherwise the Revenue Divisional Officer should nominate one qualified from among the heirs or relations of the last holder. As the section empowering the Tahsildar and Deputy Tahsildar to levy a fine has been omitted, they will have to be vested with the power of the Revenue Divisional Officer even when they are appointed Tahsildar or Deputy Tahsildar. As Tahsildars and Deputy Tahsildars have a direct control over the village officers and their slightest displeasure may cost the latter their appointment, it is not wise to entrust them with the powers of a Divisional Officer, or if they must have these powers, such powers should be given only to such of them as are above 50 years of age. It is not sound to provide only for one appeal and revision. The decision of a Civil or Criminal court is at times altered at a number of stages and justice obtained only in the High Court. Justice can always be expected from the higher officials. So two appeals and a revision should be allowed. "Regulation suits" will increase the work of the Revenue officials. Rules should be framed for permitting suits in civil courts regarding nomination.

Village offices and the hereditary right.

SUDARSINI, Viswasarayapuram 1st Jan. 1919.

With reference to the Village Officers Act Amendment Bill, the Sudarsini, of the 1st January, writes :—The right of minors to succeed to the posts of their fathers will be dispensed with in future. Will all have major sons to succeed them? If not, should the karnam's office coming on from grandfathers and fathers go to strangers? . . . They are now cutting at the very root of this hereditary right. . . . When deputy tahsildars are made the appointing authorities, does the resulting corruption need to be described? How many persons holding magistrates' posts are not taking bribes? How many tahsildars are not building palacial houses, and acquiring lands? Our readers know all these facts by experience. Caste favouritism is another evil. . . Even now, there are many Achari tahsildars who beat karnams and many Nayudu tahsildars who abuse them. Is there any doubt that in future tahsildars will exact all sorts of service from village officers, just as Ravana did from the eight Regents of cardinal points? . . . The poor village officers pay 4 out of the 8 rupees of their salary for the feast of the officer. Will the matter end there? Can the 'Mamuls' to the peon and the cook be avoided? The Revenue Inspector's 'Mamul' is likewise inevitable. Should it be specially said how much money the village officers should take with them to a jamabandi camp? Officers with fat salaries are granted travelling allowance. The poor village officers have no such allowance. . . God only knows what difficulties the village munsif will have to suffer, if he does not tip the clerks in the District Munsif's Court when he goes there for the inspection of the civil cases register of his village. When officers drawing salaries below Rs. 30 a month are given grain compensation or war allowance, it is not understood why the low-paid village officers should not receive it. . . However frequently memorials were sent for the redress of the village officers' grievances, there has been no reply at all. But the Government come forward to destroy their hereditary rights. We can say with certainty that the want of wisdom in their officers is responsible for this. . . It is not for the means of livelihood but for the prestige and influence which they give their holders in the village, that people still cling to these offices. . . The Government themselves will realize in future the advantages which result from the appointment of outsiders to these offices in preference to the members of families holding them with respect from time immemorial. . . It is our belief that an outsider will not care to keep up the old prestige of the family and cannot discharge the duties of his office with the same diligence and devotion as the members of the hereditary family. The Government will do well to consider this aspect and withdraw the proposed amendment

The Park Fair accident.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 2nd Jan. 1919.

68. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 2nd January, writes about the Park Fair accident :—. . . It is understood that some wicked men taking advantage of the panic robbed some women of their jewels. The crowd then increased, people began to run in crowds and in this confusion, two women and one or two children, it is said, lost their lives from pressure. . . The occurrence of the accident is strange considering that the Fair was held in spite of protests from the people and the Corporation.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 4th Jan. 1919.

The Madras Park Fair.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 4th January, writes:—His Excellency the Governor was prepared to show that he was for the holding of the fair by presiding over the sports. It is astonishing that the administration should come to such a deplorable pass. In the face of this, a large number of members of the House of Lords were found to be opposed to the grant of responsible government. The British have struggled hard for their constitutional government. It is regrettable that despite this fact a large number of them are of opinion that they should have democratic powers in their own country and remain autocratic in India. It is not proper that Lord Pentland should incur any obloquy on the eve of his retirement.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 6th Jan. 1919.

The same paper, in another article in its issue of the 6th January, writes:—People are advised not to eat their food in the vicinity of dung, but who can answer him who says that he would eat dung itself? It was suggested that large concourses of people should be avoided when there was danger of the spread of epidemics such as plague. If the authorities should disregard the suggestion and answer in anger that the people have no right to oppose their views, the people will naturally keep their mouths shut. A self-willed Government will perforce have to reap the fruit of its autocratic deeds.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 10th Jan. 1919.

The fire at the Park Fair.

A note in the news columns of the Manorama, of the 10th January, says that several complaints are being heard regarding the incident. One party complains that His Excellency the Governor left as soon as the fire broke out, without doing anything to relieve the situation of distress. Some Anglo-Indians, on the other hand, maintain that His Excellency the Governor remained there till the fire was completely extinquished. Another complaint is that if the fire engine was properly tested beforehand much of the suffering and loss could have been avoided. The Commissioner of Police has issued some statements about the incident, but nothing satisfies the people at large.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 3rd Jan. 1919.

The National Congress.

In a lengthy leading article dwelling on the proceedings of the Congress, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 3rd January, remarks:—This year's session was a great and unprecedented success for more reasons than one. The President's speech was as supremely logical, comprehensive and indicative of high statesmanship in its content as it was captivating, elegant and lucid in expression.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 6th Jan. 1919.

Writing on the same subject, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 6th January, writes:—As President Wilson observed in the west too, mutual cordiality, truthfulness and justice are by no means universal. It would be difficult to achieve this end. The British are democrats by their birth as also by their action. It behoves us to consider why they have denied Home Rule to Ireland for the last 700 years and have not given the Indians opportunities to practise even the a, b, c of democratic rule since they obtained suzerainty over India, while they granted responsible government to South Africa within six years of the territory coming under them. The British are democrats. They are not people who will yield to mere prayers. They yield if one quarrels like the South African people. The latter resolved that they must either get responsible government or lay down their lives. It became clear that the situation might lead to the loss of the territory itself. Then they were granted responsible government. . . We shall be sure to get responsible government. If we fail, let the self-seeking among the Indians live for themselves. Among the millions of our students there are enough who are prepared to perform the yagna (sacrifice) for obtaining democracy and also enough to offer themselves as victims for the sacrifice. They are getting ready to offer their person and lives for securing the well-being of future India. God will be sure to reward their efforts. The British Rulers and the British public would do unto us as they do unto themselves and grant complete responsible government. We are fully confident that it will be so.

71. Reviewing, in its leader under this heading, the Madras Administration Report, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th January, observes:—The report contains a description of the political situation. Had this description been made by the Sydenham party, there would have been no occasion for surprise. But that a Provincial Government which must be impartial to all political parties alike should publish such a report is strange. . . The efficacy of the present system of administration was brought to light by the Mesopotamian muddle. Mr. Montagu exposed the drawbacks of the present bureaucratic Government in such strong terms that no Indian political reformer would ever dare to use . . It cannot but appear strange in these circumstances that the Madras Government should criticise the conduct of the Government of India. It was the internment of Mrs. Besant, and not the action of the Government of India that enhanced her influence. It is not true to say that the protest meetings in connexion with the internment were spurious. They simply expressed the strong and abundant public feeling in the matter. There is no doubt that the campaign of constant vilification started by the Mail and the Justice against Brahmans and political leaders contributed not a little to the intensity of that feeling and strengthened the Home Rule movement. If these papers had been warned by the Government the situation would not have become so bad. The anti-Brahman movement has been viewed with favour in the report; but its leaders and the European community freely abused the Brahmans and thereby fanned the flame of Home Rule movement. Though it was pointed out by the leaders of the people that the occurrence of lootings and labour strikes were entirely due to economic conditions, the labour movement was referred to in the report as an offshoot of Home Rule agitation. . . It is very improper to say that such nationalist organs as the Hindu have given expression to strong views simply to attract subscribers. The reception accorded by His Majesty the Emperor to the editor of the Hindu will clearly show that this remark in the report is unfounded. . . The administration report has failed to take a liberal view of the present political situation. . .

Short-sightedness.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

72. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th January, observes:—. . . On close consideration, it may be said that practically, the Unionists who are opposed to progress will hold all power. It will easily be seen that such a Ministry which is incapable of inaugurating liberal measures even in ordinary times is totally unfit to be in power at the time of reconstruction of the Empire. . . It cannot be a sign for future progress that all the important appointments should be given to the Unionists. . . It is understood that Sir S. P. Sinha will shortly be made a peer. This honour will have no other effect than lessening his usefulness to a great extent. . . On the whole, the appointments are mostly disappointing. And the ground for disappointment becomes all the stronger in view of the problems of reconstruction which the country has to face.

The new English Government and reconstruction.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

73. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th January, writes:—. . . It cannot but appear strange that the nationalist papers, the Hindu, New India, the Bombay Chronicle, and the Amrita Bazaar Patrika do not reach England, while the Bengali and the Leader find a free passport. It is not known as to who should be held responsible for this bad state of affairs. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

With reference to the contribution of Madras to the Government of India, which according to the Scheme of Reforms happens to be more than that of Bombay or Bengal, the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th January, commends for the consideration of Mr. Montagu the unanimous opinion of Indians and Anglo-Indians against the proposal.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

The arrival of Mr. S. Kasturiranga Ayyangar.

79. The Andhrapatrika, of the 13th January, gives a report in Telugu of the welcome address presented to Mr. S. Kasturiranga Ayyangar, the editor of the Hindu, last Sunday morning, and his reply thereto.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 5th Jan. 1919.

Prohibition against the export of foodstuffs.

80. Under this heading the Hitakarini, of the 5th January, writes :— . . . The loss that is likely to accrue to the ryot from the order that the paddy produced in a district should be kept within that district, will be immense. We request that the District authorities will reconsider the question and provide at least for the export of paddy from one district to another. Otherwise, we fear that unrest will grow among ryots.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 5th Jan. 1919.

An appeal to the ryots of Gudivada.

81. In the course of an appeal to the ryots of Gudivada, a correspondent to the Hitakarini, of the 5th January, observes :— When the dumb ryot is already groaning on account of the proposal to enhance the water-rate, being at a loss to know what to do, the terrible and arbitrary order of the authorities relating to the prohibition of exports has come to worry him as if to add insult to injury and completely crush him, who is already a bloodless skeleton. It will be hopeless for him to live in case redress is further delayed.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 10th Jan. 1919.

The Indian soldiers.

82. Under this heading the Andhraprakasika, of the 10th January, writes :— . . . It seems to be a great wrong that these non-Brahman communities which are thus well known for their loyalty should not command at the hands of the Government equal respect with the so-called high caste people. . . After all it is very regrettable that our Government have not cared to respect the rights of the non-Brahman communities. It will be but just to reserve in future at least some posts exclusively for non-Brahmans in view of the fact that they are backward in Government service. We request the Government to help in a suitable manner the many non-Brahman soldiers who have returned and will return to this country from the several theatres of war.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 10th Jan. 1919.

The New Parliament and Indian Reforms.

83. In the course of its leading article on this subject, the Manorama, of the 10th January, observes that the result of the general election has increased the despair of Ireland, and if it has affected the prospects of Irish Home Rule so much, it is no wonder that Indians are afraid that it may affect India very badly indeed. They nervously ask themselves whether even the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme, which was prepared for the purpose of introducing some reforms though not to the extent demanded by Indians, may be thrown out. If, however, the opinions expressed by Barrister Mr. Ali, who recently returned from England, come true that Mr. Lloyd George will stand by the pledge given to India by the British Government that all parties of the House of Commons will support the Reform Scheme, that Mr. Montagu—a true friend of India—is likely to continue as Secretary of State, that though there may be opponents in the House of Lords they are likely to be few in number and that the London Times has all along been supporting the scheme, then Indians may be reassured that the general election just over will not be to their disadvantage.

84. The Qaumi Report, of the 1st January, has a leader on the marginally-noted subject which is briefly to this effect:—The editor tenders to the King and all royalists new year's greetings and hopes that people may not be deprived of the blessings of freedom. Qaumi Report, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

The ill-omened past.

The might of Islam is at the point of death. No religious observances prove beneficial. The lamp of the faith is flickering. The genuine hand, which grasped the crown of Chosroes, is paralysed. The feet, that trod the land of Pharoah, are tottering.

Divine limits have been transgressed. The Holy House of Abraham, whose doors had been absolutely closed to Polytheists, has become the abode of rebels and murderers. The house of the Prophet is a centre of mischief and disorder. The Hedjaz, for whose valleys Abraham prayed and Arabia for whose prosperity Ishmail offered sacrifice, are in a disturbed and perplexed condition. Jerusalam, for the liberation of which Mussalmans gave their lives, Damascus and Baghdad, for whose fertility the faithful sacrificed their own harvests, have to-day become Islam's houses of mourning.

The Khalifate of the Prophet, that had been handed over to the children of Othman, has to-day become a butt for hostile and rebel shafts. How is it possible to destroy the freedom of the Khalifa? How is it possible for us to be patient over the disgrace and the humility that have befallen the throne and crown of the Khalifate?

The adhesion of Islamic territories has been destroyed. The Othman Government has been shattered to pieces. The legacy of Mussalmans, which is in the hands of the nation, is being wrested from them and it is proposed to establish non-Mussalman States in Basra, Mesopotamia, Damascus, and Syria, and to free the Armenians, Jews, Egyptians and Arabians from the protection and support of the Khalifa. Plans are afoot to loosen the binds of Islam in Muslim lands. Persia has become a dead man's legacy, and Afghanistan a poor house. The age desires that Muslims should accept slavery and that their fraternal concord should be relegated to the limbo of forgetfulness.

85. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 6th January, has a report of the meeting held on the 4th at the Amir-un-nisa Begam Sahiba Mosque, Triplicane, under the presidency of Moulvi Muhammad Pudrat Halim Sahib, Nasri, in which a resolution to the following effect was enthusiastically passed:— Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, 6th Jan. 1919.

Meeting of the Sunnis' Anjuman.

That this general meeting of the Anjuman enters its emphatic protest against the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hasan's Registration Bill, and requests the Government not to accept it on the ground that it is a case of interference with religion. It interferes with marriages and divorces and these are religious matters.

86. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 1st January, in giving a retrospect of the past year hopes that the new year will be of good luck. India expects distinctive place in the realms of education and commerce. Mussalmans of India are anxious for the spread of education in their country and to secure separate electorates in corporations, municipalities and boards. Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

The new year.

87. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 1st January, in an item on the marginally-noted subject says that as a detailed account of the meeting has already appeared in the Jaridah-i-Rozgar, we merely give translations of the two letters published in the Madras Mail of the 30th December 1918. Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, Madras, 1st Jan. 1919.

The Esplanade meeting.

88. The Mushir-i-Deccan, of the 8th January, writes under this heading:— Mushir-i-Deccan, Hyderabad, 8th Jan. 1919.

New year honours. Disappointment of the people of Hyderabad and Secunderabad.

As Hyderabad and Secunderabad had loyally done their bit with other parts of India, it was expected that they would be well represented in the Honours lists for the new year. On perusing this list however we were amazed to find that their expectations have not been fulfilled even in the slightest degree. After the list was out the Bulletin published a sort of supplement in which the name of Mr. Gamlen, Director of the Mint, appeared adorned with an O.B.E.

Thus have many in Secunderabad and Hyderabad, who were entitled to decorations, been disappointed. Mr. Gamlen, therefere, appears to have been fortunate in being made an officer of the Order of the British Empire!

The handsome and generous manner in which the citizens of Secunderabad and Hyderabad subscribed to the war loan merited liberal recognition in the lists of both English and Indian titles.

We assert, without fear of contradiction, that in the matter of these decorations the Government of India have been guilty of a very serious oversight; and we hope they will make a special effort to make up for this omission on the occasion of His Imperial Majesty's birthday in June next.

III.—Legislation.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

88. The Qaumi Report, of the 28th December, publishes a lengthy letter from a correspondent in which the writer reports that on the 26th December a mass meeting was held at the Esplanade in support of the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hasan's Bill.

The Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hasan's Bill.

Moulana Abdus Subhan Sahib was voted to the chair who requested Moulavi Tajum-ul-Husain Khan Bahadur to take his place, and later the former spoke in support of the Bill. He was followed by Moulavi Tajum-ul-Husain Khan Bahadur, Moulavi Abdul Majid Sahib and the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Husain Sait.

A resolution in support of the Bill was moved. When it was put to the vote, sounds of 'approved' 'approved' were heard from all sides. A few lads of the Diwan Sahib's garden, however, shouted 'not approved', and one called out 'disapproved'. Some one wanted to say something, but the chairman did not allow him to do so as he had already given expression to his views at a previous meeting. The meeting was then dissolved. A few boys were observed muttering and then went away.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, 28th Dec. 1918.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 28th December, also has a different report of the proceeding. It says—

In the notice the meeting was advertised to be a public one, and a promise was made that doubts would be cleared, and hence a considerable number of supporters of the Bill were present.

Moulana Abdus Subhan Sahib, who waived his claim in favour of Moulavi Tajum-ul-Husain Khan Bahadur, was voted to the chair.

Moulana Abdus Subhan Sahib spoke and was followed by Moulavi Tajum-ul-Husain Khan Bahadur, Abdul Majid Sahib, editor of the Qaumi Report, and the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Husain Sait.

An opposer of the Bill requested permission to speak; but he was not allowed to do so.

A resolution was read out in a low tone and some one seconded it. When the chairman put it to the vote, sounds of 'not approved' were heard from the southern and western sides of the assembly.

A gentleman requested the chairman to say whether there could be two chairmen of one and the same meeting. The chairman replied—

"The meeting is in my hands. I can nominate any one I like."

After this the meeting was dissolved. Votes were not taken in a regular manner.

The writer contrasts the meeting of non-supporters held previously and the meeting of supporters now held at the same place and says:—

The former was notified to be exclusively one of non-supporters and hence supporters were not allowed to speak, whereas the latter though notified to be public, non-supporters were not allowed to open their mouths. Non-supporters got their resolution unanimously passed in their meeting, but this was not the case with the supporters in their meeting.

IV.—Native States.

90. The Desabhimani, of the 11th January, in its leading article on the subject, submits to the consideration of the Madras Government and of His Highness the Raja of Cochin the suggestion that Mr. P. C. Govindan, who is a member of a respectable Tiyya family in North Malabar and who occupies a high position under the Bombay Government in the Political Department may be chosen as the next Diwan.

The Cochin Diwanship.

Desabhimani, Quilon, 11th Jan. 1919.

A note by "S.P." in the Samadarsi, of the 11th January, characterises the suggestion that a European may be appointed as the next Diwan of Cochin as a "silly notion" and is sorry that the Cochin State has had to nurse offspring so foolish as to suggest that she should be handed over to be administered by a European. What an idea this, that India and even Asia cannot, but only Europe can, provide a man to administer Cochin!

The Cochin Diwanship.

Samadarsi, Trivandrum, 11th Jan. 1919.

91. The Malayala Manorama, of the 14th January, refers in detail to the possibilities of harnessing the water power available in Travancore for generating electricity for industrial purposes, and advocates early investigation of the subject by the Darbar.

Travancore rivers and electricity.

Malayala Manorama, Kottayam, 14th Jan. 1919.

V.—Prospects of the Crops and the Condition of the People.

92. Remarking that the people are suffering from cruel infectious diseases and famine, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th January, says:—The Government officials receiving fat salaries do not seem to have acquainted the Government with the real condition and hardships of the people; nor do the Government come forward to ascertain them. It is really cruel that, under this benign British Government, the people should be suffering without food to eat and cloths to wear and with none to care for them. The time has gone when food-riots were attributed to political agitators. Famine, which was at the threshold till now, has entered the country. Neither the Government nor the Anglo-Indian papers can deny this. However much the bureaucrats may arrogantly say that there is no famine in the country, they are sure to suffer hereafter, unable to prevent famine. So the Government should think over what they should do. Every one will admit that the department formed to regulate the supply of foodstuffs has not achieved the desired object. The merchants are afraid that the orders and actions of the head of this department will perpetuate the high prices in the country. When even the wholesale merchants, making large profits, condemn the orders of the Director of Civil Supplies, we need not write about the cry of the merchants, working with a small amount of capital. The Government should now note the situation and take proper steps. First of all the department controlling foodstuffs should be abolished. The charges for transporting foodstuffs should be reduced. Grains should be exported from the country, only if there is a surplus above what is required for the Indians. For this, food grains should be cultivated on a large scale here. These measures are not impossible ones nor will they entail any serious loss on the Government. We hope they will adopt them. We should go on agitating until the Government redress the grievances of the poor people.

The present situation.

ENGLISH PAPERS.

II.—Home Administration.

(b) Courts.

1. The South Indian Mail, for the 16th January, observes:—"Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu has been sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for fifteen months. The bureaucracy invested as it is with almost irresponsible and uncontrolled power has incarcerated one whom the people regard as a patriot of the purest motives and who worked for them for nearly two years incessantly. . . It is clear that bureaucracy is determined to deal harshly with those who most persistently and patriotically advocate popular reforms. . . The plain fact is that in this country the Magistracy is so completely in the hands of the executive that it can be made the tool of the latter. . . Recent happenings in this country have unmistakably shown that the popular party has to contend against the bureaucracy in all its blind force and in its precipitate career it is impossible for that body to be persuaded by any sense of justice which has been the mainstay of British supremacy in this country. . . The Indians now realise that the fight between their representatives and the bureaucracy in possession of immense power and with a grim determination to retain it at all costs is going to be of the most stubborn kind

South Indian Mail, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

If it is intended that such incarcerations are to strike terror into the hearts of the political workers and to stay the onward progress of the popular agitation on lines of approved constitutional nature, that is bound to be ineffective. . . We wish to lay utmost emphasis on the point that justice should not be sacrificed and that it is time that the British statesmen should be awakened to the stren necessity of realising that the bureaucracy in this country should be effectively checked in its mad career. . . There can be no doubt that Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu's imprisonment will be regarded with the utmost dissatisfaction and what is more the faith of the people in the sense of British justice for its own sake in spite of temptations in the path of the authorities to transgress it, will receive a tremendous shock which, if not immediately set right, is exposed to the danger of passing the bounds of irreparability."

The Commonweal, for the week ending 17th January, says:—"The conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu for sedition has provoked keen regret and discontent in the Province. A sentence of fifteen [months' rigorous imprisonment can never be justified in any civilised land in the case of a political worker whose only fault is the use of language which has outraged the overdelicate sensitiveness of the Bureaucracy. . . This prosecution is popularly believed to be due to his strong advocacy of the cause of labourers in Madura during the last mill strike—a belief that was strengthened by some of the evidence disclosed during the trial. While the conviction is bound to be appealed against, the Government would be well advised at least to alter the sentence into one of simple imprisonment, by doing which it will be merely removing what one may call the mark of savage justice."

Commonweal, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

2. The following appears in the Hindu, of the 20th January:—"Among the agenda for the meeting of the Corporation tomorrow is a resolution by Mr. Srinivasa Achariyar on the Park Fair muddle. The persistent and cynical flouting of public opinion by the authorities has latterly reached the proportions of a scandal and the untoward loss of life and property which took place in the unrehearsed item that wound up the tamasha drew lurid and pointed attention to a discreditable episode. Public opinion apart, that the considered judgment of the body responsible for the health of the city should have been so lightly disregarded on the puerile plea that the preparations had gone too far forward to be countermanded, is an insult to the Corporation which that body cannot but resent strongly and we believe there will be little difference of opinion on the resolution of Mr. Srinivasa Achariyar at to-morrow's meeting."

The Madras Corporation and the Park Fair muddle.

(k) General.

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, 15th Jan. 1919.

3. The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 15th January, writes:—

The Indian Civil Service and the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms.

"The memorandum prepared by the Indian Civil Service Association of Madras setting out in detail their view of the reform proposals is worth attention, and it does not suggest any unreasoning opposition to all constitutional reform. The main contention of the service is that 'as it is to the service that the authors of the report look for the successful realisation of their proposals, we trust we may reasonably claim that, before the scheme is put into effect, our feelings in the matter may be fully considered.' In the topsy-turvy procedure so far adopted by Mr. Montagu in regard to his scheme of reform, there is no provision made for consulting those whose opinion is worth having. Irresponsible busybodies have been taken into the confidence of the Secretary of State and they have been consulted and conciliated at every turn. Those who have practical experience of the difficulties of administration have been sedulously avoided and their opinion of the scheme has not been sought as it ought to have been. . . It is an one-sided arrangement deserving of strong condemnation and who can question the soundness of the contention of the Madras Indian Civil Service Association that as it is to the service that the authors of the scheme look for the successful realisation of the proposals the Civil Service may reasonably claim that before the scheme is put into effect the feelings of the members of it in the matter may be fully considered? . . . The Indian Civil Service Association details with great force and cogency the reasons against the minister system of administration. . . With an illiterate electorate who will be under the dominating influence of interested wirepullers and agitators of sorts clamouring for office and power, the risks pointed out by the Indian Civil Service Association are most likely and we devoutly hope that whatever shape the reform scheme may ultimately take, it will make no provision for this thoughtless experiment of appointing ministers from the elected members of the Councils and entrusting to them the administration of certain subjects."

Hindu, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919

The Hindu, of the 21st January, has the following:—"The open revolt of the European Members of the Civil Service against the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Scheme tends very much to clear the air in regard to the proposal for political reconstruction in India. . . The Members of the Civil Service refuse absolutely to be cajoled, comforted by or reconciled to the new order of things to be brought to existence by the Reform Scheme. . . The last two demands are a clear indication of the view of the Civil Service that they have no faith whatever in the stability of the Indian Government under the Reform Scheme proposed by the Secretary of State for India, the Viceroy and the Members of their respective Councils. The Indian public will eagerly wait to know how the Secretary of State for India and the British Cabinet will deal with the most truculent demand on the part of the pampered Members of the Civil Service. . . Now that the eyes of the authorities have been opened to the reality of the situation by the action of the Civil Service, we hope the Reform Scheme will be so reconstituted as to dispense with the assistance of a foreign unsympathetic element."

Justice, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

4. Justice, of the 20th January, states:—"We have before us this morning the reports of two addresses delivered in this city by two Indian political leaders, one a Hindu and the other a Muhammadan. What Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar has to say about the present Indian political situation is as interesting as the views of Mr. Aftab Ahmad Khan on the same subject. Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar, the Editor of the Hindu, has just returned from England where he had been as a member of the Indian Press deputation. . . He confirmed what we had guessed some time ago, that Mr. Montagu tried to convert him, and failed.

Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar and the Indian political situation.

It is one of the harmless delusions of Mr. Montagu that he can convert any Indian to his view, not by arguments but by beaming smiles. The Secretary of State unbends and smiles and appears gracious, and any refractory Indian politician capitulates. That apparently was the idea prevailing in Whitehall. We are glad that Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar has contributed his quota towards dispelling this delusion . . He might have gone further and said with perfect accuracy that outside the India Office there is hardly anyone who believed that the scheme in its present form could be worked. And if there is practical unanimity of opinion on the unworkable nature of the Montford scheme it stands to reason that it will have to be altered in some way or other and made to look something like a working scheme."

5. Writing under the heading "the faith that is in us," Justice, of the 22nd January, says :—"Secret investigations and underhand wire pullings are the rich gifts bestowed on the people of India by the Montagu methods. Already we begin to feel quite at home. These political methods take us back to the old days of the Indian Rajas and their political methods. The Montagu methods have met with a certain amount of success, for Mr. Surendranath Banerjee addressed a meeting at the Lawley Hall, Mount Road, in which he preached the Montford gospel of political faith. Considering that it was not so very long ago that Mr. Surendranath Banerjee was the orator in chief in support of the Congress League Scheme which the Montford report takes a whole chapter to pulverise, the coverson is fairly satisfactory. . . By an insidious system of propaganda opposition to the Montford report is being stifled, while supporters of it, official or non-official, are encouraged to come forward and boom the report. Those members of the Indian Civil Service who seem to have met together to consider whether any steps should be taken to safeguard their position are now pilloried in the columns of certain newspapers as if they were criminal conspirators, whereas Mr. Montagu has been steadily utilising paid public servants for carrying on regular propaganda work on behalf of the Montford scheme. It has come to this : that an official who has anything to say in favour of the Montford report will be discharging a public duty by booming the report. An official who has anything to say against it will be guilty of grave breach of official decorum by saying or writing anything that is not complimentary to the Montford proposals. . . Opinions of high officials expressed against the Montford scheme cannot be published, because it would be against the public interest to do so. But any prise of the report from official sources will be readily published for the same reason, we believe, namely that it would be in the public interest to do so. . . We have had quite enough of these Montagu methods. And we are glad to see the last of Mr. Montagu's Reform Committees, so far as Madras is concerned. For the rest we rely on the British Parliament to investigate the Indian problem and mete out such redress as they think fit. We feel confident that when an open investigation is held the British Parliament and the British public will not approve of the Montagu methods or uphold the Montagu proposals."

Justice, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

The Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms Scheme.

III.—Legislation.

6. Writing under the heading 'Repression again' New India, of the 18th January, observes :—"The Government of India have decided to give effect to the Rowlatt Committee's Report, which means that personal freedom is to be still further curtailed in India. It is monstrous, to say the least of it, that legislation of that type should be introduced in India when British statesmen are so profuse in their talk of Liberty and Self-Determination. Now is the time to convince the Government that they are courting a serious danger in proceeding with the Bill, and we hope the protests will be strong enough to check its further progress."

The Government of India and the Rowlatt Committee's Report.

public would read the proposed provisions with shame, indignation and disgust. The first addition to the Penal law is one which is calculated to paralyse all public work of whatsoever kind. Whoever has in his possession, the section says, any seditious document intending that the same shall be published or circulated shall, unless he proves that he had such document for a lawful purpose, be punishable with imprisonment for two years. Considering that the expression 'sedition' has a remarkable flexibility of interpretation in the hands of an alien bureaucracy in the country, and of Magistrates who combine in themselves executive and judical functions, the untold mischief which such a clause would create can well be imagined. . . The arm of tyranny is made to stretch far and wide. It is virtually made penal to associate with a person once convicted of sedition. Other provisions of a similar draconian character are to be found in the Bill. The Bill is a handsome reward to a country which has given glorious and heroic assistance to the allies, the British and others in the Great World War."

Hindu, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

The Hindu, of the 24th January, says:—"It is a good suggestion that has been made by Mr. C. Rajagopala Achariyar of Salem that sound legal opinion should be obtained on the competence of the Council of the Governor-General in regard to passing the Bills prepared on the basis of the Rowlatt Committee's Report. The Bills contain provisions of such revolutionary character, violating in several respects fundamental principles of jurisprudence and constitutional law, that it is eminently desirable that competent legal opinion from England should be obtained on the point. . . In our opinion it has no moral authority and as in some points it contravenes provisions contained in Parliamentary statutes, it has no legal competence. Even if it is found that it has constitutional and legal authority, a strong agitation must be immediately set on foot to convince the British public that the issues raised by the two Bills are so important that the Indian public earnestly desire that the British Parliament should take up the matter and dispose of it".

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

8. Referring to the constitution of the new Parliament in England, the Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, observes:—In a way we can say that the Conservative Party preponderates in the new Parliament. But, so far as India is concerned, it is a matter for satisfaction that no changes have taken place in the Parliament. As Mr. Montagu continues to be the Secretary of State, it is certain that his scheme of reforms will not receive a rough treatment at the hands of the British. It is a great consolation to us that Mr. Austin Chamberlain, who is now the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has not been appointed to any post, wherein he will have an opportunity of attending to Indian affairs.

The new Parliament.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

9. Referring to the proposal made in Ceylon that in the reforms now under contemplation, there should be two separate representatives in that Legislative Council to safeguard the interests of the Indians in the Colony, having been opposed by the Ceylonese, the Vartakamitran, of the 26th December, remarks:—Though, for all external appearances, the Indians and the Ceylonese are moving closely, they are not agreed on all points. The latter cannot openly be hostile to the former as they require the assistance of the Indian merchants and coolies in important matters. But as the majority of them have taken to western customs and manners, they think that they are more civilised than the Indians and that they should have greater privileges. The fact that cases of Indian coolies being teased and treated brutally in Ceylon attract attention in the Colony only after a cry is raised about them in India may be quoted as an instance in point. When the reformers are prepared to give separate representatives for the European merchants, bankers and Muhammadans, why should they hesitate to allow such representatives for the Indians alone? Neither the Europeans nor the Ceylonese can safeguard the interests of the Indians there. So the Indians themselves should try to protect their interests. When the Hon'ble Mr. Kesava Pillai went to Kandy to preside over the anniversary of the Ceylon Indian Trades Association he witnessed a girl of about 15 years crying aloud, having been caned after removing the cloth, by a planter for a mistake in the process of taking rubber and he took her to the adjacent hospital and wanted a certificate from the doctor to prove that she was beaten. But the doctor refused to give such a certificate. Who is to question the planter as to why he caned girl and the doctor as to why he refused to give a certificate. Would these things happen, if there were representatives in the Colonial Legislative Council to safeguard the interests of the Indian coolies? It is on account of the absence of such representatives again that the Indian rice merchants there have been subjected to great many hardships. The Indian Trades Association were never consulted in the matter of the appointment of a rice committee recently in Ceylon. There is a rule in Ceylon that certain merchants have to take out licences. If there are not Indian representatives in the Ceylon Legislative Council, a law may be passed, as is the case in South Africa and other places, that Indians should not generally be given such licences. All these things prove the necessity for some representatives in the Colonial Legislative Council for the Indian merchants and coolies, chosen from among themselves.

Indians in Ceylon.

Vartakamitran, Tanjore, 26th Dec. 1918.

Expressing its regret again at the Ceylon Government having ignored the interests of the Indians in Ceylon in choosing the members of the rice committee and their having given two representatives in it to the European Chamber of Commerce, while there is only one Indian in it and even he is not connected with the Indian Trades Association, the same paper, in its issue of the 2nd January, reverts to the reform of the Ceylon Legislative Council and observes:—In the proposed reform, they say that electorates will be formed on the basis of provinces. This will deprive the Indians of the privilege of having any representatives. It is contended that communal representation will create complications in the administration and that all classes of people in Ceylon are united. But it is not communal but trade representation that the Indians there require. The reformers in Ceylon base their view upon the opinion expressed in the Montagu-Chelmsford report against communal representation. But they should note that this very report requires separate representatives for the European merchants and planters. There is no difference between the condition of the Indians in Ceylon and that of the Europeans in India and the Indians in Ceylon are again in the same position as the European merchants there. The number of Indians in the Colony is sufficiently large, and the capital invested by them there is not less than that of the Europeans. If, with all this, the Indians, who have been in Ceylon for 2,000 years, have not the privileges enjoyed by the Europeans who entered the Colony only 150 years back, it is on account of their apathy in guarding their own interests.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

Freedom of the seas.

10. Observing that it is the naval strength of the British which prevented steamers from reaching Germany and brought the war to a successful termination, the Hindu Nesan, of the 18th January, says:—Would anybody agree to give up such a naval force? It does not, therefore, appear probable that at the ensuing Peace Conference, representatives of big kingdoms will agree to this condition. However, it would be necessary to devise means for preventing neutral countries from supplying to one party articles which are injurious to other party. The right of examining each vessel that goes to a hostile country to see whether it contains any such articles should be granted to every country. This of course will end in much trouble and disaster. Neutral ships may be endangered by the mines which the belligerent nations lay for destroying the vessels sailing in midseas. Passengers' steamers may be torpedoed and sunk by means of submarines. Such subjects should be settled at the Peace Conference, while the question of the freedom of the seas is discussed.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

The Peace Conference.

11. The Desabhaktan, of the 20th January, observes:—All the uncivilized countries are to enjoy the benefit of the Conference. Though India is far advanced in civilization and learning, we have to think that she will not be profited by it. The reason for this is not far to seek. The editors of the Anglo-Indian papers and the Anglo-Indians inform the British public that the British bureaucratic Government in India is a good one and that the Indians like to have only this form of Government. We are being prevented from apprising the British public and the Peace Conference of the actual condition of India and the grievances of the Indians. We are at times even threatened. What shall we do for this? A London correspondent of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika suggests that the Indians should, before the end of January, give a cable to the Prime Minister of England to the effect that India demands self-determination and send a copy of it to the President of the Peace Conference. Will the Indians let lose this opportunity too?

JARIDAH-I-KOZGAR Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

The Peace Conference.

The Jaridah-i-Kozgar, of the 18th January, on the authority of a telegram from Paris, dated the 15th idem, writes—It is said that only the Allies' representatives will be present at the Conference. After the proposals have been discussed and decided upon enemy delegates will be instructed to come to Versalles when the decisions arrived at will be presented to them for their approval.

A communiquè from Paris, dated the 15th January, states that the first question regarding Russia to be put forward at the Peace Conference is a very delicate and difficult one. They say that the question will be a thorny one for the statesmen of the Allies to settle. Russian affairs are indeed assuming such a serious aspect that unless they are settled at the Peace Conference, no real peace is possible. In this connexion a very distinguished person has said that a peace, which leaves half of Europe and half of Asia in a disturbed and chaotic condition, really provides facilities for another worldwide war. By half of Europe and half of Asia the statesman seems to have meant Russia, for the Russian Empire consists half of European and half of Asiatic territories. He also states that all the Russian States are in the dark as to what is going on in Russia at present. There is no regular Government to consider matters relating to the Peace Conference.

The editor suggests that it remains to be seen as to how the plenipotentiaries will impartially discharge their duties, for the Conference does not deal with Europe alone, but with the whole world whose very existence, well-being and progress depend on its decisions.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

12. The Swadesamitran, of the 18th January, reproduces in Tamil the following extract from a pamphlet issued by this League in New York advocating the establishment of a democratic form of government in India:—The reforms proposed by Mr. Montagu are neither very liberal in character nor such as to establish democracy extensively. Neither self-determination nor Home Rule nor even the right of taxation is possible under these reforms. In spite of this many take exception to this scheme in Great Britain. If the 33 crores of people in India continue to be without democratic rights and without proper education democracy cannot make a stand in the world.

Indian Home Rule League in America.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

13. Remarking that peace in the world is impossible so long as India is in a deplorable condition, and referring to the League of Nations which President Wilson is endeavouring to organise, the Desabhaktan, of the 20th January, makes the following observations among others:—For the League of Nations to work successfully, it is necessary that India should be granted complete self-government. Until Home Rule is granted to India, a big army will have to be maintained by the British for the defence of this country. Surely, other nations will insist on possessing an equally big army. Increase of such armies will lead to war again and again. If this state of things is to be prevented, there should not be big armies in India. So, let those who attempt to organise the League of Nations understand that, by granting complete self-government to India, permanent peace in the world will be secured. We remind President Wilson and others that, in the absence of such a measure, no benefit will be derived by forming this league. We are grieved to see that, though England has been ruling India for the last 150 years, she should be ignorant of the real condition of India. This clearly indicates the tactics of the bureaucrats. While their oppression is increasing in India, we cannot but characterise her condition as pitiable when we see that the Government intend introducing a Bill embodying the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee instead of cancelling the present repressive laws which are themselves more than enough for repressing the patriots and the nationalist papers in this country.

India and the League of Nations.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

14. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th January, writes:— . . . Revolutionary movements cannot grow in an atmosphere of freedom. This shows the urgent necessity of establishing freedom all over the world regardless of all distinctions of race or religion, of east or west, or of great or small powers. If the Peace Conference lays the work of its reconstruction of the world on foundations of freedom, Bolshevism is sure to disappear, yielding place to orderly progress. There is no doubt that the Allies who could crush German militarism will be able to exterminate Russian Bolshevism. The means to be employed by them in this respect will be different. The Peace Conference will decide this matter to-morrow. May God inspire it with the liberal outlook and firmness of mind which are required in such a matter.

The Peace Conference and Bolshevism.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

15. Referring to the decision of the Peace Conference not to allow Press correspondents to publish information other than that given in its own official communiqués, the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th January, remarks:— . . . This decision of the Conference is disappointing. . . It is strange that the Peace Conference which wants to do away with all secret transactions in international matters should hold its own proceedings in camera.

The Peace Conference and its secret proceedings.

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, 11th Jan. 1919.

16. Referring to the letter of a correspondent to the Madras Mail, attributing the surrender of Germany to the superiority of the Allies in men and resources, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 11th January, writes:—We are not disposed to agree with this correspondent. The German Emperor too possessed extraordinary military strength, and his men and munitions were of undoubtedly superior quality. The German people, however, grew tremendously proud and gloried over their strength, on which alone, they thought, their success or defeat in war mainly depended. They turned their faces against truth and justice and wished the whole world to act up to their bidding, threatening with destruction all those who refused to do so. But for this, America, Portugal and Italy would not have entered the war on behalf of the Allies. It is really the haughtiness of Germany that brought about this revolution in Europe as well as her own unconditional surrender. The Allies did not defeat Germany; it is only the pride of her officials that brought about her downfall. Truth will surely triumph in the long run. It is no good for the Allies to boast that they have conquered Germany. If the Allies are wise, they should consider that it is truth that has triumphed and willingly accept the scheme of a League of Nations suggested by President Wilson and work for universal welfare in co-operation with all the other nations of the world. If, on the other hand, they act just as the Germans did hitherto, the same fate that has befallen Germany will not fail to befall the Allies as well.

Germany and the war.

Mysore Star, Mysore, 12th Jan. 1919.

The Parliamentary elections in England.

17. In its leading article under the heading the 'New Parliament', the Mysore Star, of the 12th January, gives the relative strength of the different parties now elected to the Parliament and writes:—The Indian Home Rulers fear that the present coalition party, having a preponderance of Conservatives, which has come into power, instead of the Liberals or the Labourites as was expected by them, will not be conducive to the grant of the proposed reforms to India. Mr. Montagu however has come out successful in the recent elections, and should he be taken into the Cabinet, we believe, there would not be much room for any such fear. The cause of India would be weakened only if he is not there. Mr. Lloyd George, who was before the war, a sworn enemy of the Conservative Unionists, had, at the time of a grave crisis, to willingly co-operate with them for the sake of imperial interests. But it is difficult to say how he will, during the present time of peace, be able to get on with them if they should be in a majority and attempt to throw obstacles in his way. In one of his recent speeches, while referring to his future policy, he said that if the Government that would be formed now should fail to carry out the promises made to the people he would resign his Premiership and once again appeal to the people. From this it is very clear that he would not be a tool in the hands of the Conservatives and would dissolve the Government and go in for a fresh election, rather than go against his cherished liberal principles. We hope that the new ministry will be able to effect a satisfactory peace and would, by granting freedom and political reforms to India to the extent that she deserves them, give happiness, peace and prosperity to all parts of the British Empire.

Swadeshabhimani, Mangalore, 10th Jan. 1919.

The Parliamentary elections.

Referring to the success of the coalition party in the recent general election to the British Parliament, the Swadesh-abhimani, of the 10th January, writes:—The defeat of Mr. Asquith means the setting back of the Liberals and Labourites. So long as this new coalition Government continues in power, the programme of the Labourites will not make any progress towards realization. How surprising that even in countries like England, where liberty, self-determination and such other lofty principles are so dearly cherished, political events shape themselves in so strange a manner! Let alone that considered with reference to their effect on India the new elections give us ample room for despair. Mr. Asquith has not been elected, the Labour party has suffered defeat, members of the Liberal party have not been elected in sufficiently large numbers and most of those who were sympathetically disposed towards India have not been returned to Parliament. It will not, therefore, be surprising if Indians entertain the fear that the question of Home Rule for India might be shelved. It is a matter for consolation, however, that Messrs. Mantagu and Wedgwood have been elected and there is room for hope that Mr. Montagu will see that his scheme of reforms is passed by Parliament. Should Mr. Montagu accept the scheme outlined by the National Congress and modify his own scheme on these lines and see to its safe passage through the Parliament, then, India may be considered to have been really benefited by his re-election.

18. The Qaumi Report, of the 9th January writes:—The supreme question that, at present, calls for the greatest attention and consideration is what will be the fate of Islam after the conclusion of peace. The problem is so delicate and involved that it baffles the understanding of even statesmen and international leaders and they apprehend unrest and revolt.

Arabia and Turkey.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 9th Jan. 1919.

America has totally failed to appreciate the existence of Islam, France has taken no trouble to understand it, Italy has made a mistake in her investigation and Great Britain has failed to solve the problem. The Islamic world is anxiously waiting to see the kind of treatment that will be meted out to it at the Peace Conference and the resultant effects.

India forms a large part of the Islamic world and Muhammadans are anxiously waiting to hear Great Britain's decision. The Prime Minister, however, failed to make mention of it either in his election speech or in his peace proposals or to state as to what view he takes of the existence of Islam and whether or no there is any possibility of its condition improving.

Great Britain has no friendly feeling for the Muhammadans and if there exists any power at all on the face of the earth that can take up and support the cause of the Islamic world, that power is the British Empire. But the ministry has, of late, neglected and gave expression to misconception in this respect. Mr. Lloyd George has reduced its importance and prestige from the position at which it was placed by Lord Salisbury. Once the question of Islam was known as "the Near East" and it was Britain alone that has fought with the Russians for the Khalifate and assisted the Turkish forces with her powerful fleet; but Mr. Asquith undid Lord Beaconfield's policy and suspended Mr. Gladstone's object, and Mr. Lloyd George has ignored the views both for and against it. At present no one knows the condition in which they want to place Islam when peace is concluded, and what ideas they entertain, and what object they have at heart in signing the Peace Conference.

India, as the chief Muhammadan centre and as the home of the most loyal subjects of the great king, has the right to see Islam more secure and powerful, and with that object in view it can discuss and demand at least three things:—

(1) The sanctity of the office of the Khalifa.
(2) The sanctity of the holy places.
(3) The inviolability of Islamic territories. Unless these three things are well understood and their importance and delicateness are considered, it is feared that just and free discussion may not take place and the connexion with the Islamic world may be wiped out.

It is admitted that America, among her fourteen peace proposals, has laid down one or two which tend to support the existence of Islam in future.

Unless those minor points are finally decided at the Peace Conference, it cannot satisfy us that the principles convey the same substance and idea as we understand it or as words express.

The chief cause of this confusion and commotion in the Islamic world is due to the non-existence of a Muhammadan representative at the Peace Conference. Those matters have been left to the Arabs or the Turks to decide who are both inimical and persistent, to a certain extent in obtaining their freedom and independence. Neither have the Turks any right to realise their objects in the name of Islam nor the Arabs have the right to represent their aspirations in the Islamic garb. The Arabs have religious connexion with the Turks but not a political one, and the former cannot, however, claim that they should be freed from the Turkish yoke. The dark page of the history of the Arabs consists of how the latter brought about the ruin of the Khalifs of Baghdad and Spain and also the decline of the Khalif of Egypt to the lowest level on the face of the earth. They cannot, however, claim the right of laying the foundation of an independent kingdom with their own hands. (To be continued.)

The Qaumi Report, of the 11th January, in continuation of the article in the issue of the 9th January, writes:—The day before yesterday a telegram from Karachi announced that, at a meeting of the principal Shaikhs held in Mesopotamia, the Civil Arabia and Turkey, No. 2.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 11th Jan. 1919.

Commissioner declared that the Turks will not return to their country and that their tyrannical rule was at an end. We do not understand how this decision could have been announced prior to the matter being settled at the Peace Conference, and we are at a loss to know on whose authority the Civil Commissioner has been able to express views calculated to cause a commotion among Muhammadans.

The British Government itself has not made any announcement on the subject. Such questions will in all probability stand over until the Peace Conference meets. The fact is, a few Military officers have raised a storm by giving expression to their views and an ignorant public is alarmed and cannot understand what is actually taking place.

The History and Geography of Mesopotamia both bear witness to the fact that it is a grave error to grant Home Rule to the Arabs, and if their connexion with the Khalifate be severed they will be excluded from the Islamic world and deprived of the blessings connected therewith. The Arabs are not engaged in commerce, nor are they acquainted with arts and industries. Indeed it is impossible for them to make any progress in these things, because their condition is worse than that of our Indian Muhammadans.

The Arabs will share our fate in the matter of literary, industrial and commercial education in contrast with the proficiency of non-Muhammadans and they will never be able to qualify themselves for self-government. The result of giving the Arabs independence will be that the Jews and others will advance and the Muhammadans will become even more degraded and impoverished than they are now. The unfortunate position will be that non-Muslims will belong to non-Muslim States while the Muhammadan States will not be able to interfere in the case of Muslims.

Conditions in India are different. Here both the Hindu and the Muhammadan communities are governed by a Christian nation, and, rightly or wrongly, the authorities are generally accused of encouraging quarrels between Hindus and Muhammadans in order to maintain their rule (a case of divide et impera—Tr.) Possibly this may not be so, but it is true that it is easy for a third nation to rule over two other nations. Although the Hindus and Muhammadans are the children of the soil, their civic rights are small, when compared with those enjoyed by foreigners and settlers. An Indian does not enjoy the same privileges as an Anglo-Indian.

This will be the state of affairs in Mesopotamia. If the connexion with Turkey is serious and no friendly relations exist between an Islamic State and Mesopotamian Muhammadans, the Jewish people and others will naturally get the upper hand of the Muhammadans, and some European power or other will step into support and safeguard their rights and interests.

If the real object is to secure independence for Mesopotamia, its connexion should be maintained with the Turkish empire which should be required to prepare its people for Home Rule and to gradually grant them responsible government. In this way alone can the Islamic States ensure their continuance and stability. Otherwise small kingdoms will gradually disappear as did the Tribal Kings in the days of Arab ascendency.

The first question for the Peace Conference to consider is what advantage the world derive by depriving the Turkish Empire of her captured territories.

President Wilson has stated that the map of the world will be changed, but it is not known whether the old lines will be re-drawn or whether new ones will be produced at pleasure.

As regards Palestine we hear that a Jewish Kingdom will be established there as the country formerly belonged to them.

With reference to Mesopotamia it is stated that the Government will be entrusted to the Arabs, as they were the original inhabitants of the land. Obviously these two principles are opposed to each other and that in some places old lines of the map are to be used and in others new ones. According to this involved principle some philosophers opine that Constantinople should be taken from Turkish hands on the ground that they are not the original inhabitants. If this erroneous principle be accepted, we do not know how many European Cities will have to change hands, and what a storm of indignation will be raised. Probably the British Government is not responsible for such unsound principles, but that is all due to the words and acts of some short-sighted politicians.

The salvation of the Arabs lies in the maintenance of their connexion with the Islamic Khalifate, and if they sever this tie instead of being free, they will find themselves bound in the fetters of slavery ; for, the rival communities of Jews and Syrians, etc., will have them behind in the race of progress with their historic rights forfeited.

19. The Qaumi Report, of the 12th January, in a leader on this subject writes :—As we expected Mussalmans have read the news with great astonishment and amazement. It has created a sensation among people. Every one is asking himself : Is this right ? Is this justice ?

Qaumi Report, Madras, 12th Jan. 1919.

The Agha Khan to rule Mesopotamia.

Here the Editor gives a translation of an extract from the Madras Times, of the 10th January, on this subject and observes :—These words which quietly announce that the decision, with reference to the administration of Mesopotamia, is being arrived at, are not only contrary to the opinion of Mussalmans but also opposed to Islam. If the correspondent of the Times is correct, it is the duty of Muslims to make known their opinion and save the Government from error.

The best form of loyalty is for us to approve an opinion calculated to benefit the British Government and increase its prestige. We are not among those, who out of flattery say 'yes'; or through greed or fear say 'yes sir'. We candidly assert that the proposal is not only opposed to the principle of Islam, but also against the principles of the British Government. It has never been the policy of the Government to interfere with the religious or the national affairs of any people. If the suggestion materialise, the power of the Turks in Asia will be reduced and the prestige of the Arabs lowered. Besides there will arise friction between Indians and non-Muslims which will not be easy to remove.

We are not opposed to the name of His Highness the Agha Khan, and we do not propose to discuss his fitness or unfitness for the position. We should certainly be grateful if the Agha Khan be entrusted with the administration of German East Africa, the colony being annexed to India. As Germany has forfeited her right to rule, it is for us to see that it is made a clean sweep of. This view, however, does apply to the Turks. It would indeed be regarded as unjust to deprive them of their right.

In the first place it is evident that the Turks were forced to join the Germans and were not willing to fight against the British. This fact has been repeatedly mentioned by them, and English correspondents have referred to it. Recently His Majesty the Sultan made a declaration of his friendship and we had hoped that a similar declaration would be made by His Majesty the King Emperor to the effect that the British Empire has no quarrel with Turkey.

Instead of this, however, we have suddenly the report that Agha Khan Sahib will be appointed to rule Mesopotamia. This news has not only blasted the hopes of the Muhammadans, but has also dealt a death blow to their aspirations. In their utmost despair and disappointment they are anxiously waiting to see what His Majesty the King George has to say on the subject and whether or no he will sympathize with the wounded feelings of Muslims.

The political principle of Britain is that every nation should advance by its own efforts and is that every people should be by nature free. France fought against Britain but her administrative power was not wrested from her. The Boers waged war against Britain but they did not forfeit the right to rule in consequence. China crossed swords with Britain but her authority was not taken away from her. It is therefore amazing to find that the Turks should be turned out of the land of the two rivers and the dwellers of Mesopotamia placed under a foreign ruler.

If the Turks made mistake in going to war, the punishment for such an error should not be forfeiture of sovereign rights.

No such severe rule has ever been applied before in the political realm and we are anxious to know in whose brain the idea originated, whose mind approved it, and whose hand sanctioned it.

There is no doubt there are certain persons in England who are not in favour of Turkish independence, just as there are a few who are opposed to the granting of independence to India. Be that as it may, we have nothing to do with their opinion. We appeal to His Majesty the King and to the great British Parliament, and we invite the attention of the British nation to the matter so that they may not destroy the universal brotherhood of the Muhammadans or create dissension among them. If another Government be set up in Mesopotamia, authority of Turkish Empire will sustain a blow from which it will never recover. If the Turks are given sufficient help and saved from the hands of their enemies, they will always co-operate with Britain and thus perpetual concord will exist between the only Muhammadan State and the greatest Muhammadan power in the world and these two Empires will be sufficient to deal with all the mischief-mongers on earth.

It is regrettable to find that certain shortsighted people are suggesting a course from which it is feared nothing but loss will accrue.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The case of Mesopotamia and the Agha Khan.

20. The Qaumi Report, of the 15th January, has a leader on the marginally-noted subject which is briefly to this effect:—The Madras Times of Friday last writes: "It is proposed to appoint His Highness the Agha Khan, Ruler of Mesopotamia, and that Mussalmans will be glad to hear the news." New India opposes, but the Madras Mail supports the proposal.

The Editor in commenting on the report says: "Mussalmans cannot approve the absolute separation of Mesopotamia from the control of the Khalifate. Mesopotamia is not German East Africa to give any occasion for apprehension. Germany is charged with the desire of dominating the world, but no such unholy stigma has ever been found on the escutcheon of the Khalifate. Turkey has never tried to conquer any country or has claimed to be superior to all European nations. Therefore we ask for what offence her country is being wrested from her?

Mesopotamia is a precious heritage of Islam. The Turks did not conquer it, but the Government thereof was handed over to them. Basra was founded by the Muhammadans and hence the city is a part of the Islamic world. So long as the Khalifate exists, no one else can rightly become its master.

As a matter of fact, the question as to whether Mussalmans approve or disapprove of His Highness the Agha Khan is beside the point. Government does not find its origin in the personal equation. We are amazed at the political intelligence of our esteemed contemporaries in attaching superior importance to the name of the Agha Khan, the result of which will be to spread enmity among the mass of Mussalmans.

The Tamil Pandits' Conference.

21. Dwelling at length upon the proceedings of this Conference, the Sirturuttam, of the 1st January, trusts that, as the resolutions passed at this Conference are productive of great good to the Tamil language and to the students of Tamil literature, the Government will pay heed to these and set right matters.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

Report of the Educational Department.

22. Reviewing in its leader the report of the Educational department for 1917–18, the Andhrapatrika, of the 20th January, remarks:—. . . It is very regrettable that the University should invite the third rate or fourth rate men from Europe instead of such well-known scientists as Dr. J. C. Bose for delivering University lectures. Their invitation to Doctor Ray may be said to be a new departure which, we hope, will be observed on a more extensive scale by the University in future. . . On the whole, the progress of education is not so satisfactory. We trust that it would be more rapid after the introduction of the scheme of reforms.

(e) Local and Municipal.

23. The Panchayat, for July-August, observes:—We learn that in a large portion of Northern India, village panchayats have obtained legal sanction, and that they are working well in Assam, Baroda, Bengal and other places. Why should the Government of Madras alone still remain inactive in this matter?

Village panchayats.

PANCHAYAT, Trichinopoly, July-Aug. 1918.

Referring to a statement in a Government report to the effect that a District Collector was against the introduction of the panchayat system altogether and was of opinion that more harm than good would result from it, the same journal remarks:—It is not desirable that a Collector ignorant of Indian history should have thus expressed his narrow views. Perhaps he is unacquainted with the administration in ancient India. He is neither an Indian, nor is his opinion sound. Let the Government pay no heed to this opinion. A careful scrutiny of the ancient inscriptions of our country will furnish us with many instances to prove with what interest and regard village administration was in those days conducted by the villagers themselves.

24. Referring to the report of the Select Committee on the Madras City Municipality Bill, the Andhrapatrika, of the 16th January, observes:—. . . It is not proper that the Indian Chamber of Commerce should be allowed only two representatives. The Indian Chamber is more prominent and numerically stronger than the European. We, therefore, request the Legislative Council to accord the first place to the former. . . We commend the action of the Bombay Legislative Council in allowing women to vote in the Muncipal Council to our own and request it to remove the same disability in this Presidency also. . . The Select Committee's report shows farsightedness. But the Bill should be even more liberal in view of the fact that self-government is shortly going to be introduced into the country. . .

The Madras City Municipality Bill.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

(g) Forests.

25. The Panchayat, for July-August, observes:—Though the number of forest panchayats is increasing year after year, there is ample scope for improvement, which necessitates the appointment of a special officer for the purpose. Want of harmony among the ryots and their disinclination to allow their cattle to graze in forests impede the progress of this movement. A Government official has once said that, in Kurnool, though the District Collector was in favour of starting panchayats, the ryots, who are generally obstinate and full of factious spirit, considering these panchayats to be profitless would not patronize them. But the truth of this statement is not clear. The Government themselves are responsible for such conditions, because villagers are generally indifferent in regard to matters lacking facilities and conveniences, and attempts should therefore be made to exhilarate them. The ryots will, if questioned, represent their grievances and the trouble caused to them by forest guards. The case of Kurnool alone should not be taken, for, as far as we know, other districts are not so backward in this matter. If the authorities had only taken interest and explained to the ryots of any place, the aims of the panchayats, they would certainly have yielded. The officers may be inclined to shirk the responsibility in various ways, but no opportunity should be given to them to do so. Panchayats cannot be formed and set to work without much effort. The appointment of a special officer for this purpose will not entail much expenditure, and it is essential to appoint such officers to instruct the villagefolk in matters connected with panchayats.

Forest panchayats.

PANCHAYAT, Trichinopoly, July-Aug. 1918.

(k) General.

26. Condemning a recent order of the Government effecting certain changes in regard to the rules about grazing grounds, the Panchayat, for July-August, observes:—We infer that the view of the Government is rather curious in this matter. They are of opinion that as cattle, by promiscuous mixing in grazing grounds, fail to produce good breed, and suffer from diseases, the grazing areas should be restricted by being brought under cultivation and that the cattle should be fed at stalls. Though we are entirely ignorant of the cause of such an order, still we are sure that it will lead to many baneful results. The Government should understand that cattle should not be made to remain in shed all day long and that a free airing will be conducive to their health and growth. No one can deny the fact that in former days there were extensive grazing grounds in which cattle were freely grazing and no harm resulted in regard to their breed. . . As pattas are being granted in respect of communal lands in villages during the settlement, public interests are prejudicially affected. If grazing grounds and waste lands are granted on pattas, who can witness the sufferings of cattle? What can the agriculturists do? What can be done to provide the necessary fodder for cattle?

Grazing grounds for cattle.

PANCHAYAT, Trichinopoly, July-Aug. 1918.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

Sir S. P. Sinha.

27. Expressing its satisfaction at the appointment of Sir. S. P. Sinha as the Under Secretary of State for India, and offering its thanks to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for India for this appointment, the Hindu Nesan, of the 15th January, observes:—No one either in England or India ever dreamt that Sir S. P. Sinha would be appointed to this high office. This appointment is indeed of great moment as it will serve as a precedent for the appointment of Indians as Under Secretary in future. Queen Victoria assured us that when qualified Indians were available they would be appointed to posts befitting their qualifications and that no racial distinction would be made in the matter of appointments. That assurance may be said to have been fulfilled by this appointment. If Sir Sinha is raised to the peerage, that will be another evidence to prove the impartiality of Mr. Lloyd George.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, also expresses its satisfaction at this appointment and makes the following observations among others:—This appointment appears to be a small move in favour of the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme. We have, however, to give a warning to the British Government, that the Indians will not, by such appointments, forget themselves and consider that the British have done their duty towards India by conferring certain high posts on the Indians here and there. India is panting with the thirst for liberty, and it is the duty of the British Government to enable her to quench this thirst without delay. India expects justice and liberty from the British Government. Home Rule should have been granted to her long ago. If the British still remain without fulfilling their duties towards India, they will become the subject of reproach by the whole world and earn an undying notoriety. This unexpected appointment appears to have been made, because it is proposed to enact a statute ere long reforming the administration of India. There is no doubt that Sir S. P. Sinha will try to do as much good to India as possible, while holding this post, and that he is better fitted than any Englishman to espouse the cause of India and to refute the arguments of the Sydenham Party in the House of Lords when the Bill for the reform of the Indian administration is brought for consideration. But how far his efforts and influence will succeed remains to be seen, as most of the members of the new Cabinet are Conservatives and are not likely to hold liberal views regarding Indian affairs. A careful consideration of the Indian administrative reforms will show that, by this appointment, no Indian can expect the grant of Home Rule to India soon, and that it cannot be taken to be the first step to self-government in India. Can the Indian subjects rest contented with one or two of such high appointments? It is only for self-government that Indians are striving and not for securing high posts under Government.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

Sir S. P. Sinha.

Remarking that the assurance given by Queen Victoria in 1858 regarding the appointment of competent Indians to high offices in the British Empire is just now being fulfilled, the Lokopakari, of the 20th January, observes:—Administration by an Indian of the capacity of Sir S. P. Sinha will give greater satisfaction to the Indians than that conducted by those that are ignorant of Indian affairs or have no sympathy with the aspirations of the Indians. The Anglo-Indian party will be weakened by Sir Sinha's appointment. Sir Sinha will be a lion to the Sydenham party when the Montagu-Chelmsford report is taken up for discussion in the House of Lords. Though he holds moderate views in regard to reform questions, he will not allow even an inch to those who are hostile to Indian aspirations. However, the Indians should not remain idle under the impression that their aspirations have been completely realised by the exaltation of Sir Sinha to a high office.

Sir S. P. Sinha, K.C.

Under this heading, the Vrittanta Patrika, of the 16th January, writes:— We note with much pleasure that Mr. Lloyd George has appointed Mr. Montagu as Secretary of State for India in the new Cabinet formed by him. Judged by his previous record we feel sure that Mr. Montagu will leave no stone unturned to carry into effect the reforms in Indian administration outlined by him in his Report. Even more pleasing is the fact that the Premier has appointed Sir S. P. Sinha, K.C., as Under Secretary of State for India. This is an unprecedented and unexpected step in the history of India, as this is the first time that an Indian has been appointed to so high a place in the British ministry. This will undoubtedly be highly gratifying to one and all in this country. Sir Sinha is an eminent lawyer and has held high posts under the Government of India and Bengal, and has earned the confidence and respect of his countrymen as well as of the British Government. He has, besides, worked with the British ministers as the representative of India and is a member of the Peace Conference as well. As he is fully acquainted with the aspirations and requirements of the people of India, it may confidently be hoped that he will be of invaluable help to Mr. Montagu, and that this country will make progress in all directions during the tenure of his office.

VRITTANTA PATRIKA, Mysore, 16th Jan. 1919.

Writing on the same subject the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 21st January, remarks that the appointment of Sir Sinha goes to prove that men like Mr. Lloyd George consider that the welfare of India is as important as that of British and that both the people are equally entitled to the protection of the British Government.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 21st Jan. 1919.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 17th January, also expresses its gratification at the appointment of Sir Sinha, and proceeds to remark as follows:—There is no doubt that Sir Sinha's elevation to this high office is unprecedented, but let not any one forget that the mere appointment of a few more Indians to such high positions brings India any the nearer towards the goal of self-government. Even if all the appointments should be held by Indians it would not mean that self-government has been secured by India. If, on the other hand, the administrative policy should be guided by the popular will, we would not mind much even if outsiders hold all appointments. If, for example, America were to impose her administrative policy on England, and leave all the high appointments to Englishmen themselves, would it mean that England is in the enjoyment of self-government? To sum up, therefore, the appointment of Indians to high places does not mean that any advance has been made in the direction of self-government. One thing, however, has been made clear by this appointment, and that is that instances such as this will shut the mouths of those who contend that India is not yet fit for self-government.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 17th Jan. 1919.

THE MALAYALAM PAPERS.

Sir S. P. Sinha.

All the Malayalam newspapers received during the week hail with delight the announcement of the appointment of Sir S. P. Sinha as Under Secretary of State for India and many of them express gratitude to the British Government for their taking this unprecedented step on behalf of India.

The Desabhimani, of the 18th January, considers the appointment as very important and significant inasmuch as it demonstrates that a British Indian citizen is considered to be on a par with any citizen of the British Empire and that no position in the Empire is closed against him.

DESABHIMANI, Quilon, 18th Jan. 1919.

The Yogakshemam, of the 17th January, expresses the same opinion.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Malayali, of the 18th January. The appointment of an Indian to such an exalted position surpasses all possible expectations.

MALAYALI, Quilon, 18th Jan. 1919.

The Samadarsi, of 18th January. The appointment has increased the self-respect of Indians to an extent inexpressible in words. This good news is a good omen of approaching good fortune to mother India.

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 18th Jan. 1919.

NAZRANI DEEPIKA, Mannanam, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Nazrani Deepika, of 17th January. Sir S. P. Sinha differs from the extremists of India, has sincere respect for the British Government and has shown himself to be a man with the courage of his convictions.

SATYANADAM, Ernakulam, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Satyanadam, of 17th January. This unprecedented move of Mr. Lloyd George is most commendable.

KERALA BHARATI, Kottayam, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Kerala Bharati, of 17th January. Among the various things done by the British Government to satisfy the longing of Indians to have a greater share in the administration of India, this appointment of Sir S. P. Sinha is all important.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 15th Jan. 1919.

The Kerala Sanchari, of 15th January. The appointment is very opportune in view of the now pending Reform Scheme.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 14th Jan. 1919.

The Manorama, of 14th January. The appointment has caused great surprise in England. Indians will ever remember with gratitude the name of Mr. Lloyd George who had the considerateness to appoint an Indian as Under Secretary of State for India at this important juncture.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

28. The Swadesamitran, of the 15th January, observes:—It is certain that the future of India depends on the recommendations of these Committees. If one of them is in favour of placing all the departments in the provinces under the control of the Indians as desired by the Congress held at Delhi, it can recommend accordingly. If the other Committee wishes to divide a province into many districts and make the people in each district with some property or income, eligible to vote, it can recommend to that effect. If the two Committees make their recommendations in this way, the aspirations of the Indians will be accomplished. But to persuade the Committees to make such recommendations, public opinion should urge it strongly on them. Provincial Governments also should sympathise with and support public opinion. We cannot say that our Provincial Government evince this sympathy very much. We learn that they have sent to these communities a memorandum expressing their views which it is said are all retrograde in character. It appears their views are those of a few who raise a false cry in the name of the non-Brahman party. It was noticed recently that, in their administration report, the Government had written in favour of this party, and this is in consonance with the impression already created that many of the Government officials in this Presidency are greatly supporting the non-Brahman movement. That the Government should have communicated their views to the Committees without furnishing any reasons for such views, and deputing officials to answer cross-examinations shows that high officials in Madras have resolved to see that the aspirations of the Indian political workers are not fulfilled. This Presidency, as it is ahead of other provinces in certain items connected with administration, is also foremost in having a strong, united and influential bureaucracy. It has thus become very difficult for the Committees to gauge true public opinion fully. The Committees would have by this time become aware of the memorandum of the Civil Service Association which contains a statement that civil servants consider it to be prejudicial to their individual interests if the chief departments are transferred to Indian control. The memorandum makes it clear that the civil servants will not be in favour of any reforms. The chief members of that body hold high offices in the Madras Government. So we request the Committees to consider the present exigencies and make their recommendations only after realizing the real state of affairs, without commending the views of the Madras Government or those of the non-Brahman party, which has the support of that Government. Though, on the plea that there is none on these Committees to safeguard the interests of non-Brahmans, the South Indian Liberal Federation has resolved not to send any of its representatives to give evidence before them, it is understood that certain members of the Federation will give evidence in their private capacities. These members may express the views of that association as their own. It may be stated before the Committees that, if all the important powers are allowed to be in Indian hands, the whole administration will come to a standstill, and that one class will monopolize all the powers and crush the other classes. The Committees should note that, for the last many years, whenever any administrative reforms were contemplated in India, self-interested people were advancing only such arguments. The peculiar feature this time is that some of the Indians themselves have been set up to oppose the reforms. The Committees should also note that though these people may raise a loud cry still their number is very small. We, therefore, expect that the Committees would make such recommendations as will enable the aspirations of the Indians, and the assurance of His Majesty's Government to be fulfilled.

The Reform Committees.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 17th January, writes :—It is but natural that the Committees would desire to ascertain the cause for the origin of Doctor Nayar's anti-Brahman party which now goes under the name of the non-Brahman party. Will they patiently inquire and ascertain the truth? The Committees would also do well to note the formation of an Indian Civil Service association in Madras. The officials, who were till now posing as the friends of the poor Indians, have now come out in their true colours. Their attempt to overthrow the reform scheme is noticeable. Unless the devices of the bureaucrats and the false pretensions of the traitorous party are properly understood, no real benefit will accrue to us by these Committees.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The Reform Committees.

Referring to the electoral roll furnished by the Local Government to these Committees, the Dravidan, of the 16th January, observes :—As this roll will be a document having an important bearing on the question of communal representation, every one will admit that it should be free from doubts. We ask whether it is really so. The question is whether the statistics furnished by the Government of Madras are correct. It is reported that the President of the Anglo-Indian Association has declined to give evidence before these Committees on the ground that the statistics furnished by the Government in regard to their community are incorrect. We hear that the Hon'ble Mr. Richmond has proved them to be so. If statistics in respect of even such a small class are unsatisfactory, unreliable and likely to create misapprehension to the Committees, how many errors would have been committed in the statistics relating to bigger classes? For various proper reasons, it was resolved by the non-Brahman Confederation that non-Brahmans should not give evidence before these Committees. The facts that have since come to light prove the discreetness of this resolution. We believe that the Committees will accept, with much caution, the statistics now furnished and will not come to any hasty decision in the matter.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The Reform Committees.

With reference to the Franchise and the Subjects committees now sitting in Madras, the Andhraprakasika, of the 16th January, observes :—. . . The Hon'ble Mr. Richmond has declined to give evidence before the Franchise Committee, stating that the list of Anglo-Indian voters has not been correctly drawn up. When there are such mistakes in respect of a small community, we do not know what mistakes there may be in the voters' lists of the large non-Brahman communities. Communal representation is the backbone of political freedom and national progress. We cannot now prophesy whether the Franchise Committee will earn the gratitude of the people by recognizing this secret or their ill-will by ignoring it. . . We suggest to the Franchise Committee that it will do well to act wisely, as its work will be, anyhow, thoroughly sifted by the Parliament and the Select Committee to be appointed in England.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Reform Committees.

Referring to the inquiry held by the Reform Committees, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th January, says :— . . . The inquiry made by them is no open inquiry. . . All that the witnesses say will not be recorded. Even what is recorded will not be published. It is not known to whom the inquiry will be useful. The people can have no confidence in it. These committees have been fittingly called Purdha Committees. To treat with such indifference a matter which decides the future well-being of India does not seem proper.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

High price and steamer freight.

29. Referring to the telegraphic intimation recently received that a reduction has been made in the steamer freight from Rangoon, the Swadesamitran, of the 15th January, observes :—We should no doubt commend the action of the authorities in making this small concession. The price of rice, however, continues to be as heavy as ever, and the losses and sufferings of the poor are great. So, though it may not be possible to get rice free of any steamer charge, yet we urge that steps should be taken to reduce the steamer freight still further.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The Hindu-Moslem entente.

30. A correspondent to the Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, makes a strong appeal to both the Hindus and the Muhammadans to stand united in the matter of preserving their rights, without giving room to the attempts that will be made by their enemies to frustrate such union and without playing into the hands of the emissaries, who are their own brethren, but are doing slavish service to these enemies, sent by the latter to mar that union. He adds that, by allowing others to occupy positions to which they are entitled, the Indians are only helping the people of other countries to declare them unfit to administer local bodies and asks why the Indians should care much for the feelings of those who treat them with scant courtesy.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The lessons of the war.

31. The Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, reproduces an article apparently from another paper, which contains the following observations, among others:—Every one knows that the mean acts of the petty-minded bureaucrats have caused indescribable heart-burning in the minds of the public in India and Ceylon. If the bureaucrats holding responsible positions should at times lose their heads and make contradictory statements, then they should certainly be said to be lacking political wisdom. The cause of all this is that responsible government has not been given to the people. Are not the annihilation of governments that inferfere with the liberty of the people in countries all over the world, and the establishment of self-determination in them, the chief causes that induced our Gracious Emperor to enter on this war? Further, in the proposals relating to the reform of the Indian administration, it is stated that because the Indian subjects are to some extent dissatisfied with the present administrative policy of the bureaucrats, a responsible form of government should be established. We can, therefore, say that, as a result of the great war, the feeling that responsible government will be established in India and Ceylon, is growing strong.

The Indian Civil Service Associations.

32. Referring to the formation of an Indian Civil Service Association in Madras, the Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, writes as follows under the heading "The European Conspiracy:—As far as our knowledge goes, the main object of this association is to set aside the announcement of the 20th August 1917 and to make endeavours for preventing the grant of liberty to India in accordance with the Montagu-Chelmsford report All these years it was everywhere stated that the Indian Civil Service officers in India were not at all hostile to her progress. But the Indians alone were contradicting this statement. Now the truth has come out. These officers have come forward to declare publicly that India exists only for their own comfort, and they have formed an association also to safeguard their interests. They have begun to act against the Secretary of State and the Viceroy. In fact they may be said to have commenced to oppose the British Government itself. Brethren! Don't lose time but consider what we should do hereafter. Remember that an association to conspire against India has been formed.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

The I.C.S. Association.

The Desabhaktan, of the 18th January, observes:—There is a rule in vogue in India prohibiting Government officials from taking part in politics. But this rule is in operation only with regard to the Indian officials and does not affect the European officials. . . The Indian Civil Service party are endeavouring to govern the Indians unconstitutionally as if the greatness and power already enjoyed by them are not sufficient. This only betrays their jealousy and selfishness. The Anglo-Indian papers blab that these are the guardians of the masses in India. How can the Indian Civil Service party who are one with the Government oppose the reform scheme published by them? How can these interfere in politics against the rules? The Government should at once inquire into this. At present the Government is full of Indian Civil Service officers, and we can therefore easily infer what views Provincial Governments and especially the Madras Government will express on the reform proposals. To quote an instance, Mr. Couchman, a chief member of the Madras Indian Civil Service association, which is hostile to the reform scheme, is also a member of the Reforms Committee. He will only suggest all possible means to crush the reform scheme but will never offer any suggestions to improve it. Let the Indian officers' association in Madras wake up at once and agitate for equality in pay, privileges and power with the Anglo-Indian officers.

Remarking that similar Indian Civil Service associations are formed in every province in India to work against the carrying out of the reform scheme, the same paper further observes:—Indians by their union and unrelenting agitation will succeed in their competition with the European officials. The latter should cast away from their mind the foolish belief that India exists for their benefit. Their scheming nature has been understood by the Indians very well, and their threats will no longer be feared. We point out that it will be fair and becoming on their part to cement the relationship between England and India, considering the Indians to be their own brethren.

The I.C.S. Association.

Referring to the formation of this association in Madras, the Lokopakari, of the 20th January, observes:—Both the Government of India and the British Government cannot now be unaware of the truth of our grievance against the I.C.S. party. It is only when India is governed for India's sake by the Indians, good time will dawn upon her and the British Empire. The Government will not fail to note that this party have come forward to interfere in politics against the Government rules. What is it else but sedition that this party who have been characterising as seditionists those that uphold the Congress and agitate for Home Rule, should themselves come out against the Government? It seems as if to curb the spirit of this party that Sir S. P. Sinha has been appointed Under Secretary of State for India. This appointment will cause great annoyance to the I.C.S. party as well as to the Anglo-Indians. If the Indians exhibit a feeling of union among themselves all their aspirations will surely be fulfilled. It is only want of union among the Indians that led to the invasion of India by various nations and its capture by them. The British who are bent upon securing self-determination for even small countries and nations, will not deny it to India.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

A further war contribution from India.

33. Referring to the request of His Excellency the Viceroy that an additional contribution of a crore of rupees may be made by the Indian princes and subjects for making suitable provisions for the maintenance of the helpless families of the Indian soldiers and European officers who lost their lives in the battlefield, and remarking that, as pointed out by the Industries Commission, the Government in this country have, unlike those in other countries, failed to afford the necessary facilities for the country's progress and that, consequent on the failure of the seasonal rains, the foodstuffs have become scarce and their prices increased abnormally, the Swadesamitran, of the 15th January, observes:—Though India is in such a stressful condition, we believe that the Indians will not in the least shirk to come forward with subscriptions to contribute their mite to the war relief fund and thereby adequately discharge their duty to the families of their dead brethren who rendered heroic service in the war and established the good name of India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

Newspapers and the authorities.

34. Referring to the news published in the Janamitran of Ceylon that the Indian newspapers which published the proceedings of the Congress in toto were not permitted to circulate in Ceylon and observing that, while certain nationalist papers such as the Hindu, New India, the Bombay Chronicle and the Amrita Bazaar Patrika were prohibited from England, a nationalist paper in Bombay that published the proceedings of the recent Moderate Conference in that place is said to have been permitted to circulate in London, the Swadesamitan, of the 15th January, says:—From this it is clear that only those papers that are in favour of the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals are permitted to circulate in England, while those that condemn them are prohibited. It will be no surprise to us to be told, in such circumstances, that the British public have no correct ideas about Indian affairs. It is not easy to ascertain the reason why the British who are known for independence and liberty, give room for such injustice. It is incumbent on the part of the Government to offer a satisfactory explanation for this and see that such things do not recur.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

Remarking that Indian affairs are not correctly represented in England, the Desabhaktan, of the 17th January, observes:—Methods which are not adopted in other countries are adopted in respect of India for reasons not known. Newspapers that can boldly represent the true aims of India are prohibited from entering England. Only some 'moderate' papers and Anglo-Indian papers are allowed to go to England. If such a system is adopted in America, will the Americans keep quiet? Will the Government of America be so silly? In no civilized country has such a thing been done, and we can assure the bureaucrats, will ever be done. Why should Indian nationalist papers be prohibited from entering England? Will they burn away England or drown her in the deep seas? Or will they create disunion between the King of England and his subjects? We can vouchsafe that nothing of the kind will happen. We are surprised to see that a nation should wish to remain ignorant of the real state of a country ruled by it. Only the false statements of the papers of the Anglo-Indians, who come here to carry away the wealth of India, get currency in England. For example, the Madras Mail which often blabs that the Indian Home Rulers are seeking the aid of Germany, goes to England. If an Indian paper should contradict the false statement of this paper, that Indian paper cannot go to England. We ask the British to explain the propriety of this. O God! Is there none to question the Sydenham party who, on the strength of the writings of these Anglo-Indian papers, make all manner of statements about India. Indians are not permitted to go to England to put them down. This traitorous party in England have discovered a new hold at present. They are said to be making much noise on the strength of the Rowlatt Committee Report, a heap of C.I.D. rubbish. Do the members of this small party know how the Rowlatt Committee conducted its inquiries and who gave evidence before it? After making an onesided inquiry, the Committee published its report. Will sane men accept this as an authority? Hereafter at least, it is essential that the British Government should deal faithfully with India. Though England may not help India, let her give India its rights. But we ask the British to note that India will not be satisfied even if the Montagu-Chelmsford Reform Scheme is carried out in toto. What India wants is Home Rule, which England is bound to give and India is entitled to get.

SWADESAMITRAN, & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th and 18th Jan. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

35. The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 15th and 18th January, respectively publish in Tamil a letter from the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar to the effect that the President of this Council has stated that, at the ensuing budget session of the Council, no interpellations or resolutions unconnected with the budget will be included in the agenda.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 15th January, comments on this letter as follows:—The Legislative Council meets only occasionally and if even on such occasions opportunities are denied to the people to express their views on public affairs and to get information on matters they wish to know, these Councils may as well cease to exist. Lord Pentland has said that these subjects will not be included in the agenda as usual. There is nothing to show such a precedent before his time. What if other questions are taken up for consideration along with the budget? What if the session of the Council is extended by another day? Does not the Parliament continue its sittings all through the year? Are not the daily proceedings therein conducted with the consent of the people? Is this the way to carry out the words of Lord Morley, that people here too will be allowed to share in the daily administration?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

36. Referring to the conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu, the Desabhaktan, of the 16th January, describes the Doctor as the Tilak of South India and remarking that he has now entered the jail only to liberate Mother (India) from her bondage, observes:—While every one in the west is immersed in an ocean of joy at the end of the war, the sons of Bharata are immersed in an ocean of sorrow. When even the political prisoners in Germany have been released, not only have such prisoners not been released in India which is subject to the British rule, but the bureaucrats here seem also to be bent upon imprisoning even loyal patriots. Is it not the duty of the Government to maintain the joy of the Indians at the close of the war? If they had withdrawn the prosecution of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu, India in general and especially the Tamil land would have been grateful to them. But the bureaucrats, who have been accustomed to tease the patriots by means of repressive measures, have pushed the prosecution to the end and got our Doctor convicted at this period, when the war has come to an end, when the sun of liberty has dawned and when there is quietude everywhere. The Madras Presidency will never forget the mercy shown to Doctor Varadarajulu by Lord Pentland on the eve of his retirement. It is no exaggeration to say that the Doctor stands foremost among those who infused a feeling of patriotism in the Tamil land, ever since Lord Pentland spoke disparagingly of Home Rule for India on the Nilgiris. The Tamil land is wailing over the news of the imprisonment of one, who inculcated patriotism to lakhs of people, that had no idea of it. Alas! When all countries are in ecstacy, should the Tamil land alone be immersed in misery! The news of this conviction was received in the Tamil land by some with wailing, by some with gnashing of the teeth, by some with indignation, and by some with enthusiasm. The imprisonment of one for the sake of Mother Bharata will convert nine crores of people into patriots. One Varadaraja entered the prison yesterday; but nine crores of Varadarajas are born of Mother Bharata to-day. And this is due to the bureaucrats. How can we avoid being grateful to them? When Mrs. Annie Besant was interned, one Varadaraja sprang out. His imprisonment now has brought out nine crores of Varadarajas, behind whom are standing several crores of Varadarajas again. The repression of the bureaucrats is only the sharp sword that cuts what binds Mother Bharata. Let our friends realise that, until India acquires the liberty to which British subjects are entitled, the prison will be the abode of true patriots in India. Mahatma Ghandi has provided us with two weapons, viz., truth and courage, and these two are shining in the hands of our Doctor. To those that are armed with these weapons, life in prison is the same as life elsewhere. It will be foolish to deem the place where they stay to be a prison. Wisdom will deem it to be a temple. The place where those who commit crimes like theft for selfish ends are confined is no doubt a prison. If one who was serving others is also confined therein, it cannot be a prison to him. So, it will be foolish to think that Doctor Varadarajulu is in prison. He should be taken to be in a place of penance for thirty-three crores of people. O Tamilians! do not lose courage. Doctor Varadarajulu was looking only in one direction before. He is now looking in all directions. His life is not different from ours, nor is his body different from ours. He is one with us, and his imprisonment is our imprisonment. Friends! Do not wail, but be active. Wake up and come out armed with the weapons of truth and courage. O Varadaraja! The goddess of righteousness is going before you. You are following her and behind you stands the Tamil land. Neither righteousness nor you or the Tamil land will be ruined. O Varadaraja! You have won laurels on the war front of liberty. Good bye! Sisters! Why do you cry? Did the tears of Sita go in vain? Did they not take the shape of the arrow of Rama later on? But our rulers are not Rakshasas, but the British, who are the embodiment of righteousness. It is the bureaucrats that are committing wicked deeds contrary to British righteousness. The tears you shed should become an arrow against the bureaucratic rule and for establishing the British righteousness and liberty. Friends! the work of Varadarajulu will be done by the Desabhaktan.

The Swadesamitran, of the 17th January, also refers to this conviction and, pointing to the fact that rigorous imprisonment, inflicted upon ordinary offenders, is not extended to political offenders in England and other countries, says:— From the summary of the judgment now received, the Magistrate seems to have applied the law wrongly in the case of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu. He does not deny the right to prove the necessity for Home Rule and no one versed in law can deny that, to do this, it is justifiable to point out the defects in the existing foreign administration. This view is borne out by the decisions of superior courts. Though the Magistrate does not deny this, he does not seem to have realised and accepted it. He admits that Doctor Nayudu did not say that the British connexion should be cut off. To seek Home Rule, continuing under the British Empire, cannot be a hostile attitude towards the Government. The Doctor has confidence in the superiority of Home Rule and he spoke in support of it, for which he had to point out the defects in the existing system of administration. While remarking that there is nothing wrong in speaking of the Queen's Proclamation, the Press Act, etc., the Magistrate begins to discuss whether the object of the Doctor was merely to make it appear that the actions of the Government were not proper or to create disaffection towards the Government, and comes to the conclusion that it was the latter. In all criminal cases, the intention of the accused is an important point to note. In this case, the object of the accused was only to demonstrate the superiority of Home Rule and he was justified in condemning the measures of the present Government for this purpose. But it was the view of the Magistrate that, in doing so, he transgressed proper limits. The law does not lay down the limits for this. This depends wholly upon the opinion of the Magistrates But the very statements made by Doctor Nayudu have been decided to be proper criticism in the case of Narayan Vaidya at Nagpur. So, it is our opinion that he cannot be taken to have committed an offence. If the civilians are entitled to demand that they should not be made responsible to the people by any reforms introduced in the Indian constitution, it should be proper to impress on the people the necessity of their demanding that the Government should be made responsible to them. There is no basis for the conclusion of the Magistrate that the object of Doctor Nayudu was only to create a hostile feeling towards the Government. His contention was only to set right, renew or alter the machinery of the Government and this cannot be an offence. Therefore we believe that Doctor Nayudu is not guilty.

SWADESAMITRAN & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

The Swadesamitran, and the Desabhaktan, of the 16th January, contain an appeal for funds to maintain the family of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu during his absence in prison and to help him in the further conduct of his case in the High Court.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 16th January, quotes in this connexion the following words of Charles Bradlaugh:—No imprisonment whatever can obliterate truth, though it may cause temporary obstructions in its way. It may delay truth but for an hour; but truth will, within the walls of the prison, develop widely like electricity and startle the people of the world when it gets out.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 17th January, also referring to his conviction makes the following observations among others:—In a way the people could guess what would be the result of the trial of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu, inasmuch as it was their impression that the authorities hated him as much as the people loved him. So, nobody ever expected his acquittal. However, the sentence passed by the Divisional Magistrate appears to be rather excessive. Those who lecture to the public and write to newspapers in their enthusiasm for their themes are at times very lavish in their expressions, which they themselves regret in their calm moments. As such persons are generally wise men working for the welfare of the public, mere warning would prove an adequate punishment in their case, and even on an occasion justifying a more severe punishment we trust that there is no necessity at all to award a sentence for such a long period as the one passed at present.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

The Dravidan, of the 18th January, publishes a contribution from the pen of a correspondent, from which the following is an extract:—The Desabhaktan in its issue of the 16th idem wrote about two pages on the conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu which contained the following words: "Sisters, why are you weeping? The tears of Sita did not go in vain. Is it not these tears that subsequently became Rama's arrow? The tears that you shed should become the arrow for the bureaucratic system of government. When you weep, weep for the ruin of the bureaucracy. Friends! the work of Varadarajulu will be done by the Desabhaktan." What exactly is the significance of these words? Are these the proper attributes to the bureaucrats? Alas! This indeed is patriotism! Will not the benign Government note this? Have they no eyes? Is there none to check those who use words calculated to breed sedition and hatred towards the king among the sons of Bharata who are the very embodiment of patriotism. We do not know when the time will come for the curbing of the mischief of this seditious paper.

37. Remarking that the diplomacy and the farsightedness of the British who are known to be the foremost in these characteristics in the whole world. Yield better results in india, the Desabhaktan, of the 17th January, observes:—Ever since the advent of the British administration in India, it has been customary to deal out to Indians reform in one hand and repression in the other. While doing so, the bureaucrats, who are the agents of the British, used to pat on the back those that are amenable to their ways and get their own wishes gratified. This is India's political history. As historic truth can never be falsified, even now the bureaucrats have begun to pat the moderates. Sir S. P. Sinha has been appointed Under Secretary of State for India. Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal gives a warning to all Indians, that such high posts might be given to many more Indians, that, by this means, the British Government will draw many persons to their side and that the public life and work of Indians will thereby be spoiled and the Indian national feeling will disappear. This warning is a right one.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The diplomacy of the British.

38. The Sirturuttam, of the 1st January, expresses its satisfaction at the views expressed by the Madras Adi Dravida Sabha in their communication to Government on the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals.

SIRTURUTTAM, Madura, 1st Jan. 1919.

The Madras Adi Dravida Sabha.

Appreciating the action of this Sabha in having plainly expressed their views in regard to giving evidence before the Franchise Committee, the Dravidan, of the 17th January, observes:—The members of the Sabha decline to give evidence before this committee so long as the two Brahman members thereof continue to sit on it. This is indeed acceptable to all who seek justice. Whatever might have been the object of the committee when it started its inquiry, its members must have learnt by this time that many insist on communal representation being granted through communal electorates. It will, therefore, be a difficult task for them now to say anything to the contrary against their own conscience. It appears to be quite essential that the members of the Parliament should peruse all the connected papers that have been published since the assurance given on the 20th August 1917. If they happen to go through these papers, they cannot but recognise the necessity for granting communal representation by means of communal electorates. . . Who can ever believe in the possibility of the non-Brahmans getting justice by representing their grievances before Brahmans who are solely intent on their own advancement?

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

39. Commenting again on the speech of the President of this Confederation, the Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, makes the following observations among others:—It gives us much pleasure that he has urged on the necessity for the development of industries in this country. He attributes the unrest among the labourers in Madras, Madura and other places to political agitators. We are not surprised at this, as he is merely repeating the views of the Madras Government. Probably he has not considered how the labourers will view his observations about them. The labourers belong to the very class for whose advancement he poses to work. There is no doubt that they will feel astonished if this is all the service he can do to them. Why should he and his party, who stand aloof without helping the poor labourers, speak disparagingly of those that actually help and are being helped? This Confederation passed a resolution prohibiting non-Brahmans from appearing before the Reform Committees for giving evidence. It is really surprising to us that Justice party who were making fun of the Home Rulers resorting to passive resistance are themselves adopting such resistance at present.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The second non-Brahman Confederation.

HINDU NESAN. Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

Adverting to this resolution and remarking that in a way it advocates passive resistance on the part of the members of this non-Brahman association, the Hindu Nesan, of the 16th January, observes:—This resolution is very nice. The Government are sending the Reform Committees from place to place for instituting local inquiries. It behoves all of us to acquaint these committees with our views and facilitate their work. The newspapers conducted by this non-Brahman association have been often crying out that those who do not co-operate with the Government are disloyal. Did not those papers characterise as seditionists some of the Home Rulers when they declined to accept honorary offices given to them by the Government? So, now, according to their own contention, the members of this non-Brahman party are themselves seditionists in that they say that none of their party should help the Reform Committees who are only doing the work of Government.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

The second non-Brahman Confederation.

Referring to the resolution passed by the Confederation that none of its representatives should give evidence before the Reform Committees, the Lokopakari, of the 20th January, also remarks that this is only opposing the action of Government by means of passive resistance, and asks how this move of the non-Brahmans to resort to this policy can amount to loyalty?

SIRTURUTTAM, Madura, 1st Jan. 1919.

Stray notes.

40. The Sirturuttam, of the 1st January, contains under the heading 'notes' the following observations among others:—Rival parties crop up in the Congress meetings; but still the Congressmen speak of union and deceive the Englishmen who are thousands of miles away from here. If different parties submit different memorials to the English ministers, which of these have the ministers to believe to be the proper one? . . . All the parties in India should join together and considering deeply the political reforms, submit a common memorial to His Gracious Majesty and his ministers detailing the reforms which are the most suitable for India. . . It is stated in the 'Montford' report that within ten years after the introduction of the reforms mentioned therein, no modfications will be permitted. . . If we do not therefore with one voice protest against the many defects and drawbacks in these reform proposals, all the 30 crores of the Indians will have to suffer for ten years more.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The following is an extract from the stray notes contributed to the Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, by a correspondent under the pseudonym of Narada:—The Christmas festivities in Madras are all over. Despite the resistance of the people and mindless of the loss of lives, and of the diseases which might break out, the authorities would have their own way, and the festivities were somehow gone through. In consequence of the carelessness of the authorities and more especially of the extraordinary carelessness of the Police, the celebrations thus carried out by the obstinacy of the authorities resulted in a great fire and made the people blink like devils. I have read that, in ancient days, Emperor Nero was playing on his harp and enjoying himself from the upper storey of his palace the sight of the whole city of Rome in flames and I doubted the veracity of this statement. But, now I hear that in our Madras City Lord Pentland was thanking the Police and appreciating their abilities, when the sheds caught fire and were in flames causing a panic among women and children, who were running in different directions without knowing what to do under the circumstances.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

Stray notes.

The Lokopakari contains the following notes among others in its issue of the 20th January:—The Madras Government have in their administration report for the year 1917–18 written unfavourably of newspapers working for the liberty of India and at the same time have written well of the Justice which has been endeavouring to mar the union among the people by creating a hatred towards Brahmans. This partial attitude of the authorities does not indicate fair administrative policy . . . The Hindu, New India, the Bombay Chronicle and the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, which are in support of the Home Rule movement, cannot enter England, Burma and certain Provinces in India. The imposing of such restrictions on certain newspapers is only a devise adopted by the authorities. The Government should gratefully patronize those papers that openly point out the defects in the system of administration. Without doing so, their attempt to suppress the papers does not indicate sound statesmanship. If newspapers transgress all limits in their writings, it is only proper to have them punished by a court of law. If, instead of doing so, the authorities should adopt uncivilized measures, it will not only interfere with the liberty of the Press, but also cause unnecessary dissatisfaction in the country . . . The Pioneer says that the Bill embodying the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee will soon be published. The whole world is now agitating for liberty and even small countries demand self-determination. To attempt to enact many repressive laws in India even at this juncture, would not amount to a fulfilment of the assurance publicly given in Parliament on the 20th August 1917.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

Co-operation in Madras.

41. Remarking that the progress of the Co-operative movement in this Presidency is very slow when compared with that in the other provinces, the Hindu Nesan, of the 16th January, observes:—From the report for the year ending 30th June 1918, it is clear that the number of Co-operative Societies at the end of the year was about 400 more than that of the previous year. If only the authorities had evinced enthusiasm in this matter, the increase would have been far greater. Lack of progress in the co-operative movement in this Presidency is due to the slackness on the part of the Government. The administration of the co-operative work has been entrusted to the bureaucracy. When once they begin to have a control over it, of what avail will be the enthusiasm of the people however great it may be? It appears the officials of this department are not so much responsible, for such a slow manner in which work is being done here, as the controlling authorities over these officials. For purposes of co-operative work, this Presidency has been divided into a number of circles and there seems to be a rule prescribing 100 to be the maximum number of societies to be started in a circle during a year. It is not known why the Local Government should so circumscribe the progress of this movement, while it is both necessary and emergent that enthusiastic endeavours should be made to increase the number of societies largely. When the Government fail to increase their efforts at a time the people are enthusiastic about the movement, later on, all enthusiasm will flag. A similar experience we had in regard to local self-government. When for want of facilities to work with enthusiasm the people turned their attention from it, the authorities began to find fault with them and say they were lacking interest in this matter. We apprehend that co-operative movement also might share the same fate. Why not societies be started in villages, which can do useful work in directions other than lending money? Why not dairies and insurance companies be established in different places? Great benefit will accrue to our Presidency by this department, only if it successfully carries out such useful work.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The British Congress Committee.

42. Commenting on the work of this Committee in London, the Swadesamitran, of the 16th January, observes:—It is of great importance that propogandist work should be carried on in England, where not only the common people but also the British politicians are said to be quite ignorant of Indian affairs. Unless the British voters are apprised of the real condition of India and made to feel that contentment in India will be a source of strength to England, while discontent will weaken her, complete salvation for India will be difficult of attainment. Arrangements should, therefore, be made to carry on our work in England, for which a Committee is necessary. The existing British Congress Committee should be reconstituted, and fresh spirit infused therein, and the Committee should be endowed with necessary funds for carrying on work in all possible ways. Unless some experienced Indians serve on this Committee and do propogandist work in England, good results cannot be obtained. The All-India Congress Committee should meet at once and, without the least delay, decide on the necessary measures to be adopted in this connexion. . . The Civilians who eat the salt of India are against allowing the Indians to advance even by one step and the Sydenham party would support them. They will proclaim that, if the reforms are granted, the civilians will resign in a body and India itself will slip from their hands. To counteract this, we should acquaint the British voters with our grievances and requirements. This is, therefore, the time for all to sink their differences and work conjointly.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

The British Congress Committee.

Remarking that this committee in London should be reconstituted with the object of giving wider publicity to the views of the Congress in England next year and stating that a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Congress Reception Committee at Delhi by Messrs. Tilak, Kasturiranga Ayyangar and three others regarding the working of this committee has not reached Delhi at all, the Hindu Nesan, of the 18th January, observes:—It is not known what has become of the original letter sent by post. Will anybody give the reason for its disappearance? We have seen authorities only pleading ignorance in such cases.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The Arms Act.

43. The Swadesamitran, of the 16th January, observes:—What became of the Committee appointed by the Government of India for offering suggestions in regard to the amendment of this Act? What became of its recommendations? The Government of India stated that the Provincial Governments had been referred to. Nothing is known up to date about this. Why are the bureaucrats, who were very liberal in their promises to amend the Act, holding silence still? It is certain they will not have the mind to amend it so easily.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The authorities and the people.

44. Referring to the statement of Mr. Evans, the Collector of Malabar, that there is not a newspaper at present without an article condemning alike as cruel or self-interested both the Government he serves and the civilians of his class, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th January, observes:—Mr. Evans made this remark at a recent meeting of the Malabar District Board when his services were appreciated by the Board on the eve of his departure to Europe on long leave. He gets excited at the mere idea of an article being written criticising the Government and the Civilians. Truth is always unpalatable—so goes the proverb. Some of the important members of the Civil Service in this Presidency are against political reforms and claim for themselves all powers and high positions. Again, some of their predecessors in office, now enjoying their pensions with ease in England are working under the name of the Indo-British Association against any reforms being granted to India. Some members of this class, who have given evidence before the Reform Committees, have said without any hesitation that no department should be entrusted to the Indians. While matters stand thus and the people believe that swaraj will be productive of good, how can the Indians and the Indian newspapers be without criticising the actions of the members of this class? When a few of them get excited, what will be the attitude of the Indians who are denied their birth right? Is there any doubt that Mr. Evans has spoken thoughtlessly?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

Popular rights in England and India.

45. Referring to the statement of a London correspondent to the Hindu that, because of the strong agitation of the people in England, the Government have already afforded many facilities to them and that in the near future all the old privileges will be restored to them in their entirety, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th January, observes:—When compared with the liberty of the Englishmen in England, that of the Indians is nothing. Even the few privileges we had, have, in view of the war emergency, been curtailed by the Defence of India Act. When we claim them back is it not ridiculous for the Pioneer to say that a Bill embodying the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee is to be introduced shortly and that it will have the support of people of moderate views?

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 19th Dec. 1918.

The present situation.

hard to reform him and make him realise his responsibility towards the people. Much need not be said of the obstinacy of this official class. A demand for the control of foodstuffs in the country has for the last six months been met by some excuse or other. The first excuse was political agitation and when it was pointed out that this was not the cause of the food-riots, they say that no benefit will result, unless foodstuffs are controlled at the source, and that famine conditions have not yet arisen. Which is the source for India? She has up to date been maintaining herself, and the question arises as to why the produce in the interior of the country, which is the 'source' for her, cannot be controlled. There are people in the country, who do not use rice, but other grains like raggy, millet, etc. The supply of Burma rice cannot benefit these. So it is the produce in the country that should be controlled. The measures now suggested resemble applying an ointment to the knee for a swelling in the back.

The same paper, in its issue of the 26th December, observes:—The Government exists only to enable the people to live and not to bring about their death and the efforts made by the different Governments entangled in the war to remove the economic hardships caused to their subjects on account of it are sufficient proofs of this. If the European Governments feel that it is their duty to enable the people to live and devise the measures necessary therefor, the Government of India are also bound to realise that it is their duty to render the small assistance that is required to enable their subjects to live. Then again history shows that the ancient Hindu and Muhammadan kings in India used to distribute the funds in their treasury among the people during periods of famine, and also remit the land tax and several other taxes until better days prevailed. But the present day Government is not acting like this and it is due to change of times and ideas. The foodstuffs produced in England are sufficient for the people only for three months and it is the Government that takes the responsibility of providing foodstuffs for them for the remaining months of the year. This should be noted by the Government of India. The Government in England deem it their duty to secure the welfare of the people and if they fail in this duty, questions will be asked in both Houses of Parliament about it and their position may be at stake. It is not possible there to deceive the popular representatives and keep them down by offering false excuses, as is done here. The Government of India here represents only the Government in England and why do the former hesitate to take up all the responsibility borne by the latter? Though the machinery of the Government is all right, the different parts of it are not acting harmoniously. Though the actions of the bureaucrats are done with the best of intentions to benefit the country, they prove to be unsuitable and even prejudical to this country, as they are based on western customs and habits. If the bureaucrats first gain the confidence of the people and then act in accordance with the nature and habits of the latter, all the existing difficulties will disappear.

47. Referring to the speech of the President of the Indian Industrial Conference held at Delhi, the Vartakamitran, of the 2nd January, demands to his statement that the acquisition of political privileges by the people should precede their industrial advancement and says:—As far as India is concerned, the acquisition of responsibility and privileges by the people should go hand in hand with their industrial advancement. The difference between England and India here is that between building a new house and adapting an old house to later conditions. Even the Industrial Commission have recommended that the aid of the Government is necessary for the industrial advancement of the country. Besides this, it requires capital, labour and industrial knowledge and experience. The rich people are afraid to invest their money in industries and the labourers are wanting in industrial knowledge and experience. The education imparted in the country gives only instruction in language and does not inculcate industrial knowledge. If these are to combine, the sympathy and help of the Government are necessary. The Industrial Commission have suggested the formation of an Imperial Executive Board for promoting industries and the inclusion of an additional member to the Viceroy's Executive Council representing this Board. It is an excellent idea of Mr. Petit that, without stopping with this, an Advisory Board should also be formed for each province and a representative of the Board should have a seat in the Provincial Executive Council. But all the appointments in the Department of Industries should be reserved wholly for the Indians. The Commissioners themselves say that there may be much difficulty in India getting industrial experts from England and the Colonies after the war, as there would be a great demand for them there alone. But industrial experts are required in India at the present juncture and they have to be got from other countries, though this should not be made a rule. Whenever such experts are sent for, they should be clearly told that they can remain here only for a short time and that they should train the Indians within that period and make experts of them.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 2nd Jan. 1919.

The Government and Industries.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

In a leader containing many of the sentiments expressed by Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar in his speech about his visit to England, the Swadesamitran, of the 20th January, remarks that it was because the East India Company did not help the people here as much in utilising machinery for industrial purposes as the Government in England did to the people there, that India has lagged behind the western countries in industrial advancement and that it is only, if the Government of India realise this, that they will be impelled to promote the industries of India rapidly, as a recompense for the folly of their predecessors in office and adds:—As has often been observed by many, there are abundant raw products in India available for industrial purposes. Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar says that experiments are being made in England to know how to utilise them industrially. Why should not these experiments be made in India and the results communicated to the Indians? The conducting of such experiments in England will only lead to British capitalists starting new industries and to the export of raw products from India but will not help the starting of industries in India It may be capital is not forthcoming as easily and as largely in India for starting industries as in England. The main reasons for this are the poverty of the country and the lack of industrial experience on the part of the people. Though this country has no money, its Government has it. Enormous amounts of money in the shape of gold and silver reserve belonging to the Government of India are in England and are being utilised by British capitalists. The Government can retain a large portion of these amounts in India alone and help industrial progress. There is no dearth of labourers in India. It is only want of work here that drives them to foreign countries. They should also be retained here. If, with this, means are devised to impart industrial knowledge to students, it is only the far-sighted that can realise what a tower of strength India will prove to be for England. For India to improve industrially like this, she must acquire independence in the political field; otherwise, the petty view that the progress of India will prejudice the interests of the British capitalists will retard that progress. As a matter of fact, the prosperity of India may benefit the British capitalists. After Japan and the United States of America had become strong industrially, their imports also increased. Similarly, if India becomes strong industrially, the needs of the people will increase and the imports also. So there is no reason whatever for the British to be afraid. Then again the interests of a few capitalists are not more important than those of the British Empire.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The bureaucrats and the patriots.

49. The Desabhaktan, of the 17th January, writes under this heading as follows:—We have often written about the increasing oppression of the bureaucrats in India. It is a matter for consideration whether it is the British or the Indians that should get rid of the bureaucratic system of Government. As the control of the Indian administration is in the hands of the British, the duty of changing this administrative system rests on them. With such a conviction the Indians, however, should not remain idle. Unless British are apprised of the oppression of the bureaucrats, they will not be inclined to introduce any change in the administrative system of India. Therefore, all those that are interested in her welfare should take up the sacred duty of representing this oppression to the Britishers. It is no sedition either to talk or write about their cruel deeds. It will only be doing good to the British whose good name is getting tarnished on account of the bureaucratic excesses. Those that are timid in pointing out these defects are only breeders of evil to their motherland as well as to the kind-hearted Britishers. These can be styled as traitors to their country and their sovereign. It is only the Home Rulers that now and again point out such defects. Many should come forward to put an end to the bureaucratic system of administration in India, as this step will benefit the 33 crores of the Indian population. No one is ignorant of the fact that the bureaucrats are bent upon oppressing those who come forward to serve in the cause of their motherland. They will continue to curb patriots by means of repressive measures; and those that have the welfare of the country at heart should continue to work fearless of these measures. Those that fear such measures are indeed committing the sin of murdering their mother.

There are again some with a very strong feeling of patriotism, who want to destroy the old leaky machine of the bureaucratic rule and, with the aid of its own parts, construct the new machine of responsible government. The bureaucrats have always an eye on such people. These patriots will invariably be shadowed by the petty deities of the bureaucracy, who consider these to be enemies and are unremittingly concerting measures to repress them. It is necessary that these patriots should go on serving their country in spite of the terrible cruelties which might be caused by the bureaucracy. No union is possible between the bureaucrats and the patriots until India gets a responsible form of government. Each party should do its duty. Many should come foward to serve the country like Doctor Varadarajulu so that the bureaucrats should tremble at their sight. This is all the recompense we can show to the doctor who toiled for us and entered the prison.

The manufacture of moderates.

50. The Dravidan, of the 18th January, reproduces in Tamil the views contained in the leader of Justice in its issue of the 16th idem.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

What India should do?

51. Dilating on the necessity for starting a public fund in aid of the families of patriots who are incarcerated in the course of their service to the country, the Desabhaktan, of the 18th January, observes:—We should take the necessary steps to make the British interest themselves much about India in the Peace Conference. Mr. Tilak, the representative elected by the Congress, has not yet been invited to the Conference. This shows that the Government have not recognised the resolution passed by the Congress which represents the thirty-three crores of people of this country. It is certain that the good we anticipate for India cannot be obtained at a Conference, where no popular representative to espouse our cause is present. No benefit will accrue by our people professing to belong to this party or that party and remaining idle. We should be always doing our duty. Are the bureaucrats ever idle? Can we forget the act of the bureaucrats who were instrumental in getting Varadarajulu Nayudu sentenced to 15 months' rigorous imprisonment for preaching liberty at a time when the whole world is surfeit with the joy of peace. We would speak of those who think that, because of the close of the war, the bureaucrats will carry on the administration peacefully, as being ignorant of details of Indian administration. It is very rare for the bureaucrats to feel compassion for the Indians. Brethren! do not get deceived. Heroes who are bold to agitate are required at present. One of such heroes has gone into prison. Many others should now come forward. The public should get enthusiastic and firm in affording the required facilities for them. This is the best opportunity for starting a fund for the benefit of patriots, for acquainting England with the cruel deeds of the bureaucrats and for making constitutional agitation therefor.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

Titles of honour.

52. The Jananukulan, of the 11th January, observes:—It is not easy to forget the statement commonly made that there are many who are prepared to sacrifice their conscience and self-respect in quest of titles. We invite the attention of the authorities and the people in this country to the observation once made by Lord Selbourne in the House of Lords that when titles are given to private persons the reasons justifying such grant should be publicly assigned by the Government and that, at the time of making recommendations for the grant of such titles, an assurance should be given to His Majesty that no contribution in the shape of money has been made by or is expected from the recipients.

PANDYANESAN, Madura, 11th Jan. 1919.

Probationary Deputy Tahsildars.

53. Referring to the recent selection by the Government of certain persons for the post of Probationary Deputy Tahsildars, the Pandyanesan, of the 11th January, observes:—Instead of first selecting a number of suitable persons from among the applicants and then rejecting such of them as are not physically fit, it is preferable to get all the applicants examined by the Medical Board first and then choose the required number of men from among those that are found to be fit by the Board. This method will save some of those selected from getting disappointed. We request the Government to see that, when appointments of probationary Deputy Tahsildars and Revenue Inspectors are made, different communities are properly represented and that those who have gained experience in posts such as those of Revenue Inspectors are soon promoted to higher positions.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The Indian Reform Scheme.

54. Remarking that the appointment of Mr. Montagu again as the Secretary of State for India indicates that the Prime Minister and the new Cabinet are in accord with his views to reform the Indian administration, the Hindu Nesan, of the 16th January, observes:—Distinguished political associations and leaders have come forward with their views in this respect, which are at once rare and important. It is, therefore, necessary for Mr. Montagu to calmly discuss these views with the representatives of the Indian people. Moreover, opportunities should be afforded to the Chief Ministers and Members of Parliament to consider the opinions and criticisms of the Indians. It should be clearly pointed out that the Indian National Congress, the Moslem League, the Home Rule League and the Indian leaders have not rejected the Montagu-Chelmsford report but only suggest some important alterations therein. We wish that the Government will afford the necessary facilities to the representatives of Indian Political Associations for proceeding to England and discussing with Mr. Montagu on several items relating to the Reform Scheme.

Labourers' strike in Bombay.

55. Observing that the sympathy shown by the Governor of Bombay towards the labourers is highly praiseworthy, the Desabhaktan, of the 20th January, remarks:—What did Lord Pentland do when the labourers struck work in Madras? He was here without going to the Nilgiris! That is all.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

A warning.

56. Referring to the speech delivered by the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hassan when he presided at a big Muslim meeting in Madras on the 17th January, the Desabhaktan, of the 20th idem, observes:—The British Government should note every word in the speech of Mr. Yakub Hassan. Islamic faith is prevalent not only in India but in all parts of the world. One-fourth of the 30 crores of the Muslims in the world are in India. The rights which the other Muslims have in the sacred places outside India are held by the Indian Muslims as well. For this very reason they are interested in the decisions to be arrived at in the Peace Conference regarding the Muslim countries. When the war broke out, the Muslims in India cared more for loyalty and did not keep back from fighting against the Muslims. It is, therefore, the duty of the Government to satisfy the demands of these people when peace prevails. The British Government are bound to settle Turkey's affairs in such a manner as not to wound the feelings of seven crores of the highly loyal Indian Muslims, as their grief will be felt by all the Indians alike. We warn that mother India cannot tolerate the Indian Muslims shedding a tear in consequence of any resolution in the Peace Conference.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 20th Jan. 1919.

Contradictory statements.

57. Referring to the statement of Lord Pentland on the occasion of opening the University Students' Club, that it is a proper place for fostering union among the different classes of students, the Desabhaktan, of the 20th January, observes:—Lord Pentland, the Governor of Madras, has within a few hours made two different statements which are inconsistent with each other. What may be the reason for his being anxious to establish a Rajkumar College? What benefit and efficiency can be secured by the young zamindars if they do not mingle with ordinary students at least when receiving general education? Probably, as stated in the Madras Administration Report, Lord Pentland thinks that the qualifications of the zamindars in the Madras Presidency should be such as would make them release themselves from the Home Rule movement.

62. Exhorting Indians to have self-reliance, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th January, observes in its leader under this heading:—. . . It is a well-known fact that the Indian Civil Service is the most highly-paid service in the whole world, and it wields absolute powers. The members of this service are sorry that they may have to give up all their power and become responsible to the people. This sorrow is prompted by selfishness and love of arbitrary power. The big salaries and the arbitrary power given to the Civil Service is detrimental not only to the national progress but also to the cause of natural science, as has been observed by Sir Leonard Rogers in the Science Congress held at Bombay. . . There is not the least doubt that the Indian Civil Servants who have been so long enjoying royal luxuries will throw every obstacle in their power to prevent the carrying out of reforms. It is very regrettable that Mr. Montagu should leave the carrying out of his reforms to the hands of such men. . .

Self-reliance.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

65. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 16th January, writes:—. . . The Anglo-Indians are trying their utmost to increase the number of repressive measures and to render the reforms ineffectual. We learn from the telegrams received to-day that Mr. Varadarajulu Nayudu was convicted and sentenced to fifteen months' rigorous imprisonment. At a time when Indians are asking for a general amnesty to all political prisoners in honour of the new era, not only is their request refused; but new repressive punishments are being awarded and new repressive measures are about to come into force. . . Still, the people of India should not give up their determination, till their birth-rights are secured. We request the elected members of the Imperial Legislative Council to express the opinion of the people in unequivocal language at the next session of the council. If they fail to discharge their duty now, they are sure to forego the confidence of the people. We request the Government to withdraw such repressive legislation which gives room for unnecessary agitation in the country to the detriment of order, and to earn, thereby, the gratitude of the people.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

Who are Panchamas?

66. Advocating the uplifting of the depressed classes, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 15th January, writes under this heading :—. . . Under the rule of the over-ambitious western people, the Kshatriyas have lost their warlike instinct and become weak and disunited. Can those Vaisyas who have left all the commerce of the country in the hands of the western nations and the agriculture to their own brethren and who are now groaning under the foreign oppression, be called true Vaisyas? Even the Sudras are suffering abject poverty, being unable to cope with the foreign Government, allowing their industries to be usurped by the western nations and themselves clinging to small crafts. . . The people of India became helpless creatures and handed over their holy motherland to foreigners, as a result of the contemptible way in which the four castes constantly treated the Panchamas, leaving them to the tender mercies of foreigners. . . Indians! Has the over-ambitious and partial attitude of foreigners made you draw such a distinction between the Christian-convert Panchamas and the Hindu Panchamas? Will even the maddest of you drive out his own children, because they turn out to be stupids, drunkards and impure wretches? . . . You can be deemed equal to the other nations of the world, only when you recognize the equality of those whom you now consider as low, and treat them with respect. Then only will you have emancipation from the slavery of foreign dependence.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The difference.

67. Contrasting the treatment that may be accorded to India with that which may be shown to British Colonies the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th January, writes under this heading :— . . . . India has sacrificed her life and money for the sake of war a thousand times more than the Colonies. She fought on all the important theatres and has protected the British Empire from all injury. Besides, she conquered the German Colonies and parts of the Turkish Empire and handed them over to her Emperor. It is but just in these circumstances that she should be placed on a footing of equality with the Colonies at the Peace Conference and in the settlement of imperial affairs. But there are no signs to show that India will have such a fortune in the near future These rights are being accorded only to self-governing Colonies. . . It becomes, therefore, self-evident that India must soon secure self-government in order to occupy an honorable place. . . The Montagu reforms cannot enable the country to reach its goal rapidly. . . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

The message of Rabindranath.

68. Referring to the message of Sir Rabindranath Tagore expressed at Bangalore, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th January, observes :— . . . The spirit of universal love has been cultivated by Aryans to an extent to which others have never cultivated it. They have been kind even to worms and insects. . . But differences, competition and ill-will mar modern life. . . Rabindranath exhorts his countrymen to preach once more to the world the gospel of oneness of the spirit pervading the whole universe, to put an end to the struggle for life which is now growing keener and to establish peace in its place. As the glamour of western civilisation is being dispelled, the need for the spiritual message of India to the world becomes stronger. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

Censorship.

69. Referring to the abolition of censorship in respect of the British correspondents' messages from Paris during the Peace Conference, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th January, urges that this concession should be extended to India also.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Jan. 1919.

Opinion of Mr. Pal about Sir S. P. Sinha.

70. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th January, writes :— . . . This system of giving high offices to Indians followed by the British Government will have a very demoralising effect on those serving the country's cause. . . Since these offices are conferred by bureaucrats as a matter of grace, and are not the result of popular election, and since they carry with them all the privileges enjoyed by the bureaucracy, their recipients will side with the bureaucracy, whenever an opportunity presents itself. . .

71. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 17th January, writes about the grievances of zamindari ryots in the Gannavaram taluk :— . . . In the remaining 70 wet villages in our taluk, the area under cultivation for fasli 1328 is only 63,700 acres as against 74,400 acres for fasli 1327, as shown by the cultivation account. The crop even in these 63,000 acres is said to have suffered much loss on account of drought or on account of the greedy nature of the Delta officers. Under the existing system of administration, the ryots are obliged to bribe the delta and other officers. So, there must be a change in the system of administration. . .

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 17th Jan. 1919.

Zamindari ryots and their grievances.

72. In the course of an appeal for the formation of a permanent Ryots' Association, two correspondents to the Andhraprakasika, of the 18th January, observe :—. . . To add to our helplessness, the A, B divisions, the rejection of water applications, the transfers of lands from the wet head to the dry, the enhancement of water-rate, the prohibition of exports, the reduction in the price of paddy, the unsteady nature of settlement, the failure of crops, exorbitant assessments and useless inquiry committees are driving us to contract heavy debts. . .

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

A meeting of the Kistna District Ryots' Association.

73. Reviewing Sir John Woodroffe's book, "Is India civilised ?" a correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 11th January, observes :— . . . The western nations are proud of their greatness in amassing money in all possible ways, in furthering industries, in inventing wonderful instruments of human destruction, and in devising all sorts of appliances for the enjoyment of material comforts. Devoid of the faculty of discrimination between Dharma and Adharma, they have as their ultimate ideal the enjoyment of worldly pleasures to their hearts' content somehow or other before life expires. They think that the goal of their duty will be naturally attained if worldly enjoyments are secured. The great European war, says Sir John, has dispelled this illusion, and what he says is true. . . Mr. George Peel has, therefore, written in his book, 'the Future of England' that national history in Europe is a synonym for destruction of life, and that Christian culture with worldly triumph as its aim has manifested itself as war and homicide. Bearing testimony to the truth of this statement, Mr. Benjamin Kid writes that the present condition of European countries is no better than 'glorified savagery'. Perhaps it was for want of such a condition among them that Indians were abused by Mr. Archer. . . The Bhagavad Gita preaches that man will not get into sin, if he performs his prescribed duties. Let our English brethren drink deep of the nectar of this teaching, give up their petty national spirit, and form high ideals the absence of which has made the west a home for the sins of oppressing and robbing others, and a land of 'glorified sanagery' as has been remarked by Mr. Kid.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 11th Jan. 1919.

Is India civilized ?

74. Referring to the prohibition of the manufacture, sale, exportation and importation of alcoholic beverages in the United States, the Andhrapatrika, of the 20th January, says :—. . . There are any number of speeches in our country to check drinking; but the evil habit is gradually on the increase. However earnest may be the efforts of our popular leaders in this direction, there will not be much use, unless the Government take interest in the matter. . . That in America the Government itself should try to check drinking without grudging to sacrifice its revenue for the sake of the well-being of the country and the moral development of the people, is really very commendable. . . The policy of our Government has not been satisfactory so far. Such a radical reform does not seem possible here except in the event of the grant of self-government.

A commendable act of United States.

Sale of cloths.

75. Referring to the arrangement made by Mr. Crawford, the Deputy Commissioner of Maubhum in the Bengal Presidency, for the sale of cloths to the poor at reduced prices in the compound of the Purulea court, the Andhrapatrika, weekly of the 8th January, writes:—. . . The Government have passed a law about the sale of cloths. But their efforts have not been of any practical use so far to the people. We request that the Madras Government will at once adopt the plan of Mr. Crawford in their Presidency also and earn the gratitude to the poor.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 11th Jan. 1919.

The Rowlatt Committee Report.

76. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 11th January, writes:—The London Spectator and other papers write that the Rowlatt Committee Report led to the enactment of the Defence of India Act of 1914 and that, in its turn, put an end to all conspiracies, dacoities, murders and such other iniquities aiming at the downfall of British Rule in India. . . The British are a highly democratic people in their own land. But as soon as they come into positions of power in this country, many of them behave like Nawabs. The British Government should put an end to this; otherwise this evil of autocracy will, like a poison tree, do harm to the British Empire without fail. The downfall of monarchs and emperors in Europe at present, like the withered leaves of a tree, is an apt illustration of this. Countries which disregard truth and justice are, in course of time, bound to share the fate of Germany, and no Defence of India Act or crores of such other enactments will be able to prevent it. It is only truth and justice that will effectually protect kings and Governments. But this is hardly noted by the athiests. When the evil result manifests itself in the form of a revolution, rulers fall into the miserable position in which the Emperor of Germany has now fallen. The British authorities will have greatly sinned if they do not pay due attention to matters of such prime importance.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 16th Jan. 1919.

Political reforms for Coorg.

77. Referring to the agitation going on in Coorg for the amalgamation of that province with the Madras Presidency, in contravention of the proposals contained in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report to continue the present system of administration with the addition of an advisory board to the Chief Commissioner, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 16th January, writes:—In these days of self-determination, let alone the Coorgs, no one would be satisfied with a bureaucratic form of administration. The leading citizens of Coorg, therefore, assembled in conference at Mercara, asked for their amalgamation with Madras and submitted a memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy through the Chief Commissioner of Coorg. The Chief Commissioner, however, instead of forwarding the same went out of his way and returned it to the memorialists asking them to withdraw certain statements contained therein as being improper. The people began to protest against such behaviour on the part of the Chief Commissioner, and, in spite of fear that official anger might bring about the increase of taxation, cancellation of the right to carry arms and similar other evils, stood resolute. It is now reported that the Chief Commissioner has forwarded the memorial to the higher authorities and is about to go to Coorg to give effect to the advisory board proposed in the Montagu scheme. But it does not look as if this dummy board would satisfy the Coorgs.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 18th Jan. 1919.

Writing on the same subject Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th January, remarks:—The British Parliament and the British people have promised to grant responsible government to India. The Anglo-Indian officials in India, however, are anxious to preserve their autocratic powers as long as they can, by giving just a few reforms from time to time, and are doing all they can to put forward some Indians themselves to oppose the grant of real responsible government at an early date. This is undoubtedly the genisis of the recent conference of the Moderates. It is to be regretted that some of our own people are proving themselves to be traitors to their country, having fallen victims to the vile machinations of the officials. The province of Coorg is no exception to this. It is stated that certain Coorgs have, induced thereto by the officials, sent a counter-memorial to Government protesting against the demand for responsible government made by the real leaders of the people there. It is undoubtedly wrong on the part of these people to have done so, nor is it right that the Government should wish to exercise autocratic powers perpetually. All the world over there is now a demand for a democratic form of Government, and we feel sure that even Providence cannot prevent us from getting it for our mother land. Will the Government of Coorg alone be able to thwart the wishes of the popular leaders there? Certainly not. What will be granted to India as a whole will certainly come to Coorg as well, and those who work against the principles of British justice as also those of our people who have become tools in their hands will not fail to be punished by the higher powers.

78. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 17th January, writes:—When the National Congress expressed dissatisfaction at the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of reforms as falling far too short of the popular expectations, some people felt annoyed for the reason that it was not proper to find fault with a scheme inaugurated by Government. The members of the Indian Civil Service, however, have started some associations with the object of safeguarding their own interests, and expressed their dissatisfaction at the proposed reforms. We are at a loss to know, then, whether the scheme of reforms is to be treated as official or unofficial. The Madras Members of the I.C.S. service have also formed themselves into an association and expressed the opinion that the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of reforms gives much too large an instalment of self-government to the people with the result that it will be prejudicial to the interests of their service, and that not one of them is in favour of the scheme. We do not know how we should characterise the behaviour of these people. That matter apart, we would ask whether Government officials are permitted to start such political organizations at all.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 17th Jan. 1919.

The Reforms Scheme and the I.C.S. Association.

79. Under the heading "The future Emperor" the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 17th January, refers to the discussion that took place in the Delhi Congress regarding the proposed visit to India of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and remarks:—Mrs. Besant and others expressed the opinion that the present times were not opportune for the proposed visit as the prices of articles were still very high and people were finding it difficult even to earn a bare living, the injuries caused by the war were yet to be repaired and the reform proposals had not as yet taken a definite shape, and the people would not therefore be able to extend a hearty and loyal welcome to the august visitor. Really speaking, all the honours due to the Emperor should be extended to His Royal Highness as well, and even the people and Rulers of Native States should take part in doing him honour. But when rice is selling at two or three seers a rupee, how will the people be able to contribute liberally? Further, if one future Emperor should visit India after the grant of responsible government, he would not fail to be received with divine honours. The suggestion of Mrs. Besant and others, therefore, appears to us to be very reasonable and proper.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 17th Jan. 1919.

Proposed visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to India.

80. In Pamphlet No. 6 of the Malayalam Home Rule Series, Mr. K. C. Sri Manavedan Raja, while discussing in detail the Montagu-Chelmsford report, refers to the remark contained therein that "as the rulers are foreigners Indians will not like their rule and all their efforts will therefore be directed towards the weakening of the Government," and says:—It is impossible to exceed such mistrust of Indians. We may similarly contend, on the other hand, that the new Reform Scheme is a trick devised for perpetuating the power of Englishmen. For it must be supposed that (when the new Government under the reforms proves a failure) the charge will be hurled against us that the Indian Ministers and the Legislative Councils are the cause of the failure of the new reformed Government.

PAMPHLET No. 6 OF THE MALAYALAM HOME RULE SERIES, Kottakkal.

Indian administrative reforms.

(Cf. Original section 177, Chapter vii.—The Congress League Scheme):—

"They could not remain content with an alien executive and therefore their policy . . . . must be to weaken and discredit it."

He thinks that an undue increase in the powers of the Provincial Government, without any increase in the power of the people, will result only in injury to the people and that therefore the authority of the people should be increased at the same time and in the same proportion as the power of the Government is increased. Regarding Legislative Councils, the opinion is expressed that the proposed new reforms attempt to rob the Legislative Councils of whatever little freedom they may have enjoyed under the Minto-Morley Reforms, and Indians are asked to judge for themselves whether this will be the beginning or end of self-government. After paying the Provincial contribution to the Imperial Government and meeting the expenditure on reserved subjects, we can imagine what balance will be left for the transferred subjects. The Ministers will be forced to suggest to the Legislative Council the necessity for new taxation and the Legislative Council, which is well aware of the poverty of India, will negative the proposal. The net result will be that the transferred subjects will suffer and Anglo-Indians will proclaim that India is not fit for self-government, and in future revisions even subjects that are now 'Transferred' may be taken to the 'Reserved' list.

Turning to the Government of India, he thinks that the scheme not only does not help in making the Government of India responsible to the people, but makes it all powerful, and that there can never be co-operation between the Provincial Governments, which are democratic in character, and the autocratic Imperial Government.

III.—Legislation.

Andhraprakasika, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The Village Officers Act.

81. With reference to the Village Officers Act Amendment Bill, a correspondent to the Andhrapraaksika, of the 16th January, writes:—. . . Sudden outbursts of love and anger are natural to officers. It is, therefore, bad that the matter of punishing their subordinates should entirely lie in their hands. . . The present powers of Tahsildars are quite ample. Their authority goes unquestioned. To further increase their powers will be unjust and unnecessary. . . Of insolvents, why should not those, honorably discharged by a Court of Law, be made eligible for these offices? As for the disqualification relating to those deemed dangerous to public tranquility, it is very difficult to define it. It will be a strong weapon likely to be greatly abused in the hands of Revenue officers. . . Will not one who is unable to spend his money freely to win the favour of officers be deemed poor? If this amendment were to become law, there would be no limit to the corruption it will create. Is poverty permanent? . . . The object of these amendments is to do away with the law of primogeniture, hitherto followed in the matter of succession, to these offices. It is a right which has been coming from time immemorial and is looked upon as a property like an estate. To put an end to it now is like resuming all estates at one stroke. . . By and by, village offices will lose their respect. Incompetent and unreliable men will happen to hold them and the administration will be brought into discredit. The destruction of a hereditary right enjoyed by many families from time immemorial is opposed to statesmanship and will certainly produce discontent instead of any good, and even the object of the Government will not be attained thereby.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 13th Jan. 1919.

Village officers.

A correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 13th January, complains that the village officers, who are directly affected by the Bill of the Madras Government, recently published for criticism, making some changes in the rules regulating succession to village offices, have not had sufficient opportunity to express their opinions about it, inasmuch as all of them are not able to subscribe for the District Gazette, in which a translation of the Bill is published, on account of its annual subscription having been uniformly fixed at Rs. 3-8-0 from the 1st instant and the village sheet thereof coming to them through the taluk reaches them only two or three months after the publication of the Gazette. He wants that these officers should be specially asked to communicate their opinions on the Bill at least hereafter and makes the following observations among others:—The object of this Bill is said to be to secure capable men as village officers. But, even, without this Bill, it is now insisted that persons succeeding to village offices should have passed some tests and so there is no necessity for abolishing the rule of primogeniture. The transfer of the powers of Divisional officers to Tahsildars and Deputy Tahsildars will remove even the little fear the latter now have of the possibility of their orders being overruled. Then again, as some of them are young and inexperienced, they may frequently pass orders of suspension or dismissal (here the correspondent quotes the instance of one Mr. V. S. Sambasiva Ayyar, a Tahsildar in the Tanjore district in 1900, who is reported to have recommended several village officers for suspension or dismissal, on which the Deputy Collector concerned is said to have always issued a warning or levied a small fine on each village officer concerned). Succession by heredity attaches a prestige to the village office and is also an inducement to the incumbents to do their work with enthusiasm. If this is to be taken away, it will be well to replace it at least by a pension. Appeals in criminal cases go up even to the Privy Council and so the village officers should be allowed to have the right of appeal at least the Revenue Board. Village officers should not be transferred without their consent and even this should apply only to the village karnam and not to the monigar. The term 'village officers' includes only the monigar and the karnam and talaiyaris and vettis are only the servants of the former. So the power of appointing and punishing these servants can be given to Tahsildars and Deputy Tahsildars, as was done in some places in 1909, and the position of the karnam and the monigar continued as it is.

'The Rowlatt Bill'.

82. Referring to a statement in the Pioneer that a Bill embodying the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee will be published ere long, the Swadesamitran, of the 16th January, observes:—In spite of the strong opposition and protests made by National assemblies, Provincial Conferences and District Conferences and by eminent leaders against the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee and the framing of a Bill based on these recommendations, it is not known which person of moderate views will support this Bill as observed by the Pioneer. We will again point out to the bureaucracy that no one will support it except those who err in their judgment and share the views of the Pioneer.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 16th Jan. 1919.

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

83. Referring to the amendment made by the Select Committee defining the term 'Corporation' in this Bill to indicate only the Municipal Council, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th January, observes:—The Select Committee that has thus recognised the prestige of the Municipal Council has, however, shown hesitation to give the Council its powers. That is, it is stated in the Bill that the three authorities, namely, the Council, the Standing Committees and the Commissioner are bound to carry out the provisions of this Act. So, it is not the Council alone that is responsible for the local administration of the Madras City. Standing Committees are only sub-committees formed among the members of the Council. To facilitate the work of the Council, certain duties may be delegated to these committees, but it is not fair to entrust any duties to them independently of the Council. Similarly, the Commissioner is an executive officer of the Council, and if, as in the case of secretaries in mufassal municipalities, the powers of the Commissioner emanate from the Council, the Commissioner will be responsible to the Council. According to the Bill the Council has no power to appoint him; but it is provided that, if 33 out of the 50 councillors resolve to remove him from office, the Government are bound to remove him accordingly. Out of the 50 councillors only 30 will be the representatives of divisions, while the rest will be those nominated by the Government and by various associations. In a body thus constituted, it is not likely that 33 persons will vote conjointly for a thing. So, the Commissioner need not care to act with due regard to the Council. Apart from curtailing the prestige of the Council in this way, it is also stated in the Bill that the Council shall not discharge the duties entrusted to the Commissioner and the Standing Committees. This makes it clear that the Council is only one of the three authorities and is not solely responsible for the local administration of the city. It is not known, how, at this time, this can be styled local self-government. While it is stated in the Montagu-Chelmsford report that local self-government should mostly be entrusted to the Indians, we cannot see how such self-government can advance if even the present powers of the Madras Municipal Corporation are curtailed and entrusted to those who are not responsible to the people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

New repressive measures.

84. Referring to the message of the Associated Press regarding the publication by the Government of India of new bills drafted in accordance with the recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission, the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th January, observes:—

. . . The Madras Mail is abusing all Home Rulers as seditionists. Anglo-Indian papers are aware that, however, strongly they may write, repressive laws do not touch them. If the new Bills were to become law, it may be said that even the nominal individual freedom now enjoyed will totally disappear in future. It is very regrettable that at the present time when the bond of mutual good-will between the rulers and the ruled should become stronger, new repressive measures should be under preparation. What the authorities want to do cannot but come to pass. Still, it is the duty of the Government to foresee the future condition of India under such laws and withdraw them now at least.

IV.—NATIVE STATES.

SREE VAZHUMCODE, Trivandrum, Vrischikom, 1094 M.E. (Nov.-Dec. 1918.)

Alleged corruption in Travancore.

85. In an article under the heading 'Government service and public welfare, the Sree Vazhumcode for Vrischikom 1094 M.E. (November-Dember 1918), observes that though there are a few Government servants in Travancore, who are honest, just, conscientious and devoted to public welfare, their number is negligible in comparison with that of the opposite kind. It remarks further that in the various parts of Travancore, the iniquities of Government servants are increasing. The sufferings which people have to endure on account of the demon of bribery pass all bounds. The trade of the company at head-quarters, which has fixed a price for every appointment and promotion, is steadily progressing. Naturally, it never happens that one who pays for his appointment cares to lose by it. He makes use of the same policy towards his inferiors and this policy, in short, serves as a machine to squeeze the people. . . The most insufferable hardship arises from the administration of 'justice' by the police. . . It is impossible to say how great is the misery suffered by our people on account of the various iniquities perpetrated in the several departments of the State. . . The best way to maintain public welfare is to make Government servants responsible to the people.

Justice, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

Sanitary conditions in Madras.

1. The Justice, of the 27th January, remarks:—"The health of the city of Madras has, for several months past, been highly unsatisfactory. . Elaborate reports and other printed stuff of the kind daily or occasionally sent to the newspapers cannot afford public satisfaction, and we may state at once that throughout the city, and almost among all classes of the population, dissatisfaction is felt at the way in which the sanitation of the city is managed. . . We want to know why the health of the city is so highly unsatisfactory, and why the rate of mortality is so abnormally high. . . In Mr. Ranga Achariyar's opinion if the Health Officer is relieved of his ordinary routine duties for a period of twelve months so that he may devote his whole time to carrying out minor sanitary improvements and dealing effectively with plague, cholera, influenza and such other epidemics, marvellous results would be achieved. Well, this is a large order. . . In the first place the present Health Officer, who is an Assistant Surgeon, is not a specially qualified sanitary expert, nor had he any experience of matters sanitary connected with any other large city. And during the time that he has been Health Officer he has not shown that he possesses any special intuitive faculty for dealing with complex sanitary problems. What is the object then of deputing such a man for dealing effectively, among other subjects, with plague, influenza, cholera and such other epidemics? . . . We are of those who think that something ought to be done and done immediately to improve the sanitation of the city and to reduce the death rate. There is hardly an inhabitant of Madras who is not of this opinion. For months past this city of magnificent distances and open areas has almost been a death trap, and it is the duty of its most intelligent and responsible citizens to do everything needful to resuscitate its good name by restoring normal conditions. . . We hope that the Madras Government will take up this question in all seriousness They have a solemn responsibility in the matter. And we sincerely hope that regardless of the feelings and interests of the individuals concerned, Lord Pentland will not fail before he leaves us to take effective steps, in consultation with his expert advisers and with such others whose counsel and co-operation will be of help to his Government, to do all that is necessary to improve the health and sanitary conditions of the city of Madras."

(k) General.

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 23rd Jan. 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hasan and Turkey.

2. The West Coast Spectator, for the 23rd January, says:—"It was a very regrettable speech that Mr. Yakub Hasan made the other day at Madras, regrettable that a Mussalman leader of his position should have spoken nonsense and went out of his way in supporting a power which has forfeited all claims for respect. The fact seems to us to be that our leaders have not fully realised their position, what the duties and responsibilities of leadership are. A leader has to measure his words, weigh his sentences and take note of the mentality of his audience. The average Indian leader, however, ignores these conditions.

"He plays to the gallery, he shouts with the mob; instead of correcting it, he appeals to its passions and very often we have sad results. . . We are told that there is a proposal to translate Mr. Yakub Hasan's speech in Malayalam and circulate it broadcast. We hope that nothing of the sort will be done, for the Malabar Moplah is inflammable material, and it is better sleeping dogs were let alone. Mr. Yakub Hasan's performance does not seem to us to be creditable."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 23rd Jan. 1919.

Mrs. Besant and the Indian National Congress.

3. The West Coast Spectator, of the 23rd January, observes:—"Mrs. Besant is slowly but steadily losing ground. We have always wondered why some of our countrymen have played themselves into her hands, dancing to her tune and regarding her as a veritable Avatar. Time was when she was a force in English politics, but she shined in borrowed light, the light being supplied by Charles Bradlaugh, but now we fear Mrs. Besant is a dead force whose leadership will not create any enthusiasm for our cause in England. The fact that we needs must look to a foreign lady for guidance is in itself sufficient to make the average Englishmen question our fitness for self-government."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 25th Jan. 1919.

Mrs. Besant's rumoured move to Bombay.

4. The West Coast Spectator, for the 25th January, observes:—"It is said in influential quarters that Mrs. Besant is going to shift her headquarters to Bombay. Whether there is truth in this statement or not, we think it high time the good old lady changed her venue to the Western Presidency. Shrewd and a woman of the world, she herself might have realised that Madras does no longer render her that homage she once used to receive. The growth of the 'Younger Party' is a formidable portent she must have realised. She is almost discredited by that party which she herself helped into the world, and it is likely that she might lose complete ground if she were to remain in Madras any longer."

Justice, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The Brahman vakils' revolt.

5. The following appears in Justice, of the 28th January:—"When the Brahman vakils revolt against the political position of the Brahman Home Rulers, one may safely presume that a critical stage has been reached in the Brahman political world. We were under the impression that the Brahman vakil reigned supreme in the Brahman political world. At all events, without the vakils and their clients the Home Rule party would be at a considerable disadvantage both as to political and numerical strength. If the news of the revolt of the Brahman vakils had proceeded from a less authoritative source than our Brahman contemporary, the Hindu, we should have hesitated in accepting the accuracy of the information. But now, there can be no doubt whatever that the Brahman vakils, or at all events the majority of them, have gone over bag and baggage to the Montford camp. . . The Hindu again wonders whether the leading Brahman vakils wanted the congenial audience composed of the junior members of the profession before which the leaders could ventilate their opinions. As a matter of fact, from the information we have received, the junior members of the legal profession constituted anything but a congenial audience for the seniors to ventilate their opinions. . . The seniors are ripe for high appointments; the juniors are only ripening. The juniors have to undergo a probationary period before they can step into the various high official places which Mr. Montagu considers it essential should be thrown open for Indians, and the juniors have learned from previous experience that the most satisfactory preparation for high offices is to attack the Government. . . The anxiety of the Indian Home Rulers at the action of the Brahman vakils is evident; for at a time when the Rowlatt Committee Bills have to be opposed tooth and nail by the Home Rulers, they find themselves left in the lurch by all their leading vakils."

New India, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

A citizen army.

6. New India, of the 31st January, says:—"We have more than once advocated in these columns the formation of a Territorial, or Citizen, Army, so that India might be able to defend herself. So long as there is here what Anglo-Indians and British writers call 'a garrison' of foreign troops, India cannot be a self-governing Nation; only a week or so ago there was a discussion in England about 'the English garrison' in India, and nothing more insulting, more humiliating, can be conceived than the idea which underlies this term. It implies that India is a conquered country, garrisoned by her conquerors, held down by force, and needing a foreign army to protect her against invasion. Even the army which is Indian in its composition is commanded by foreign officers, and could be turned by them against the people of its own blood. The whole thing is offensive and needs to be changed, for Home Rule and Home Defence must go together. . . The present

Police Service has been trained, quite properly, to obey its officers, and we have seen lately that it is quite ready to fire on its own countrymen at the word of command. . . India cannot afford to destroy this sense of discipline; what is needed is to train the police and the soldiers to obey Indian officers, as in every country these forces are trained to obey men of their own race. . . When an Indian army and navy are created, officered by Indians, then complete Home Rule becomes possible and inevitable. Then India will be a free and self governing nation in the Empire, and will no longer be a dependency as she is now. But a dependency she will remain until she can defend herself and maintain internal order. While she is disarmed, while her Police and her soldiers are officered by foreigners, she remains a subject race."

III.—Legislation.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bill.

7. Writing under the heading 'The Black Bills', New India, of the 30th January, says:—"The Coercion Bills, which will be introduced in the Indian Legislative Council in Delhi next week, mark the lowest point of administrative incompetence on the part of the bureaucracy in India. . . In India the administrative agents of the nation that entered into the war solely for the vindication of liberty and justice, are trying to forge the most unheard of weapons for shackling the fundamental liberties of British Indian citizens. The Indian Coercion Bills have beaten the record of hereditary hatred, which has resulted in the series of coercive laws which the British Parliament has had to pass for maintaining British bureaucratic authority against the efforts for Irish national existence. . . Can there be a sadder commentary on the bureaucratic administration of British India than that the present Bills seek to reduce the Indian governmental system after one hundred and fifty years of British rule to a state so redolent of autocratic Russia that is now no more."

New India, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

The Hindu, of the 31st January, writes:— "'People who arrange for meetings of 'protest' together with the shrieking newspapers they could control, lay themselves open to the obvious inference that they secretly sympathise with the rebel and the sedition-monger and that only a wholesome regard for their own skins keeps them from openly throwing in their lot with these enemies of Indian society".

Hindu, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

"The Anglo-Indian scribe who has indited the above sentence deserves to be horsewhipped for the scurrilous and slanderous imputation which he has made. . . The meeting was held last evening and the names of those present as given in the report of the proceedings published elsewhere, which contains by no means an exhaustive list, show that the cream of the Indian community in this city attended the meeting and is in absolute sympathy with, and supports the objects of the meeting. The volume of indignation in the country aroused by the proposed legislation cannot be stifled by the insulting insinuations which are made by Anglo-Indian journals of the baser kind. . . The extended scope of the definition given to sedition in the proposed legislation is a monstrous and perverse addition to the criminal law for which no parallel can be found in any civilised country. Statutory recognition is also sought to be given to the most absurd theory that association with a man once convicted of sedition is to be reprobated, and it is made a ground for establishing the guilt of an accused person. . . This new provision recalls to our mind the inveterate and unreasoning prejudice which a member of the bureaucracy cherishes for one convicted of a political offence, an instance of which is given by Lord Morley in his 'Recollections'. . . Whatever Anglo-Indians may say on the subject, there cannot be any doubt as to the best informed Indian opinion upon it. The legislation is one which is of the most reactionary and repressive character."

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

Archæology and the Peace Conference.

9. The Hindu Nesan, of the 25th January, observes among other things:—As Mesopotamia, Syria and Palestine are now under the control of the British, it may be possible to preserve the ancient monuments found therein, ascertain therefrom facts showing their antiquity, and embodying the same in the histories, publish them for the benefit of the country. It is certain that any archæological researches made by the people of Palestine, Turkey, Syria and other countries cannot compare well with those of the British. But though at this juncture experts from America, Japan and other countries might compete to do this work, still, in view of this matter being one which will be useful for ages, it is necessary that it should be discussed in detail in the Peace Conference.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

The future of Turkey.

10. Referring to the great anxiety felt by the Mussalmans in India as regards the future of Turkey, the Swadesamitran, of the 25th January, observes:—Some in the western countries are in favour of making the town of Constantinople a common property of all the nations. There is no doubt that these people make such statements regardless of the feelings of the Muhammadans and also of the evil consequences of their own words. As the bulk of the Muhammadan population is only in the British Empire, the British people should act with very great care in this matter. We would again urge that the Peace Conference and especially the British should pay due regard to the views of the Indian Muhammadans in this connexion.

Mysore Star, Mysore, 19th Jan. 1919.

The future of Turkey.

The Mysore Star, of the 19th January, writes:—The Moslem world appears to be very anxious about the future of Turkey. The Allies have suffered a great deal and the war was protracted considerably as a result of Turkey's siding with the enemy. It is only when the Allies were victorious and conquered the major portion of her territory that Turkey bowed her head. It is yet too early to say what her future will be. But we may be sure that the allies will take care that Turkey is no longer the source of danger that she proved in the past. The Moslems are using both threats and entreaties to make sure that Turkey is restored to her former independence. But we fail to understand whether these same advocates were unwilling or incapable of using their influence in preventing her from joining the enemy; perhaps they thought that the war was not likely to terminate as it did. But God willed otherwise. In a recent address to the leaders and political officers of Mesopotamia the Civil Commissioner said that they may be sure that the Turks will never again enter their territory. These words are fairly indicative of Turkey's future.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The speech of President Wilson: and liberal ideas.

11. Referring in its leader under this heading to President Wilson's speech opening the debate at the Peace Conference, the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th January, observes:—. . . The various Powers had been often proclaiming such ideals as that of truth, justice, freedom of the world and self-determination before the close of the war. But after the war, these ideals do not seem to be so much in evidence. President Wilson, however, has not taken up such an attitude and he is urging for the permanent establishment of these ideals in the world with greater persistence even after the end of the war. . . Doctor Wilson has emphasised that "the cause of justice and of liberty for men of every kind and place" is the primary object of America in entering the war. . . He says: ". . . Every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies, not as we wish, but as it wishes." Our readers can understand what noble ideas the above lines reflect. . . Those sentences may not appeal to lovers of power. . . Since Mr. Lloyd George was enthusiastic about the League of Nations, we trust that he would be equally keen on freedom based on self-determination. . .

12. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th January, observes:—. . . It will be understood from the question of German colonies, what difficulties are to be surmounted. If German South-West Africa were to be given over to South Africa, as has been claimed by General Smutts, we do not know what will become of the principle of self-determination. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

The Peace Conference: the principal resolutions.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 29th January, writes:—Some of the members of the Peace Conference are of opinion that it will prove a perfect Babel. The Conference has just begun an outline of the work before it, and already the differences among the members are coming to a high pitch. They are thinking of sending a large army into Russia to put down Bolshevism. Seeing the present state of things, even Lord Robert Cecil says that it is impossible to arrive at a peace which will be agreed to by all. But we do not think so. Selfishness is gaining ascendency in the world. Those in power are very eager that they should be autocrats and others should remain in their bondage. There can be no universal peace unless this idea of aggrandisement is warded off. Bolshevik methods are cropping up everywhere like carbuncles in a diabetic patient which defy all attempts to cure them. The Bolsheviks are merely bent on sharing the comforts of the rich and to this end they would even mercilessly murder the latter. It will be a mistake to think that Bolshevism can be put down by means of an army such as President Wilson and others are thinking of. It is impossible to conquer hatred by means of hatred. Christ taught that justice should be the weapon for putting down injustice. But the present-day Christians have forgotten that doctrine. The allies are showing their cleverness only in despising the Bolsheviks but not in bringing them under control. To our mind there is only one method of putting down Bolshevism. All revolutionary ideas arise from want and misery. It is only by providing ample food and clothing to those who are thus suffering that they can be tamed. It is only peace and good will that can wipe out Bolshevism. When a league of nations is under contemplation for establishing universal peace we think it scarcely just that a terrible war should be begun afresh to achieve that end.

The Peace Conference.

13. Referring to the split among the Irish Unionists, the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th January, remarks:— . . . When on one side the Extremists are crying that self-government should not be granted, on the other side, the Sinn Fieners who are not satisfied even with self-government within the Empire, have declared Ireland a Republic. . . The greater the delay in solving the problem, the more complex will the situation surely become.

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

(a) Police.

15. Under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 20th January, writes:— When a Non-Brahman Association applied to the Commissioner of Police for permission to erect arches on public roads in Madras in connexion with the reception of Doctor Nair on his return from England, he refused permission. . . But when Mr. S. Kasturi

Partiality.

Ranga Ayyangar came to Madras the other day, this permission was given. Look at the partiality of the Madras Police! Do the Police Regulations permit the erection of arches in honour of a Brahman? If not, what is the reason for this conduct of the Police? We should like to know what reply the Commissioner of Police has to give in the matter.

(b) Courts.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 22nd Jan. 1919.

Bench Courts.

16. A correspondent in the Kerala Sanchari, of the 22nd January, observes that if a Bench Court is not working satisfactorily there may be several reasons for it and suggests that a District Munsif may be placed on special duty to inspect Bench Courts.

(d) Education.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

The Benares Hindu University.

17. Referring to the first convocation of this University, which was recently held, the Swadesamitran, of the 23rd January, describes the circumstances which led to the establishment of this University and observes:—There are only half a dozen universities in the wide expanse of our country which can be spoken of as a continent, while in England, Germany and America, each of which in point of extent and population can only be equal to one of our provinces, there are many universities. In Belgium and Holland, each of which can only equal one of our larger districts, there are 40 and 24 universities respectively. Not only is the number of the universities so meagre here, but even the nature of instruction imparted is not quite satisfactory, as observed recently by His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore. The universities do not appear to act in accordance with the requirements of the times. Religious instruction has been given up altogether. The vernaculars are neglected and no opportunities are afforded for research to benefit the country. Further, most of the universities are nothing but mere examining bodies, the disadvantages of which have been very clearly pointed out by Sir P. S. Sivaswami Ayyar in his address. Most of the students passing the Matriculation or Secondary School-Leaving Certificate examination are not quite fit for collegiate study.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

Building grants for schools.

18. In expressing its thanks to the local Government for the sanction of a grant of Rs. 2,95,322 for the construction of buildings for elementrry schools in this Presidency, the Dravidan, of the 25th January, observes that the amout is very inadequate in consideration of the large number of elementary schools that are now being located on pials of houses and in temples and choultries in villages and that it is not sufficient to construct even the most ordinary type of buildings for these schools and hopes that the Government will sanction a larger sum for the purpose.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

Referring with appreciation to the above grant the Desabhaktan, of the 27th January, observes:—It is certain that even this year many elementary schools will be started in this Presidency. But no real advantage will be secured by simply flooding the country with schools. Arrangements should be made to see that the pupils attending these schools spend their life-time properly after they leave them. But in the Government schools, instruction is not now imparted with this object in view. We trust that the Government will attend to this matter and impart such instruction to Indian youths as is suited to Indian needs.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

Education in the Madras Presidency.

19. Referring to the Administration Report of the Educational Department for the year 1917-18, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th January, observes:—Though it is well known that the annual grant of 21 lakhs and odd by the Government of India is being spent in this Presidency on the purposes for which the grant is sanctioned, still there is in the minds of some a doubt that all the schools have not been benefited alike by this grant. To avoid such a misapprehension, if the distribution of the grant is made in consultation with some representatives of the people, it will give satisfaction to all. When the revenue of this Presidency alone amounted to 834 lakhs of rupees last year, the sum spent on education, the most important item of expenditure, is quite inadequate. The number of candidates for the B.A. Honours course shows a slight decrease from that in the previous year; but the reason for it has not been assigned. Though ten secondary schools were newly opened in the year, still, taking into consideration the extent of the country and its population, the present number of schools is not adequate. This applies to elementary schools also. Until there is at least one elementary school for every revenue village, all people cannot get elementary education. The Government should always remember that the complaint that only 6 per cent of the people are literate, is due to the want of the required number of elementary schools and also to the prohibitory cost of education even in the limited number of existing schools. If the recommendations of the Industries Commission to give all labourers elementary education are to be carried out, the present expenditure on elementary education should be increased many times over. Now that the war has come to a close, we trust that in the Budget which is to be shortly taken up for consideration, ample provision will be made for this purpose.

In commenting on this report, the Hindu Nesan, of the 27th January, remarks that it does not make mention of any remedial measures proposed to be taken to set right the defects noticed by the department in the matter of education, and observes among other things:—In the year under report there has been a decrease in the number of schools under private management, the reason for which has not been given. In a previous report published by the Government, it was stated that more schools should be opened. It therefore grieves one to see that even the institutions that were under private management have ceased to exist apparently for want of funds. It is only to encourage such institutions that Government are giving them grants every year. The present decrease in the number of private schools goes to show that the aid rendered by the Government in the shape of grants is insufficient. According to the quinquennial report published by the Local Government in 1916-17, the special grant sanctioned by the Government of India to this province exceeds 123 lakhs, and the report under review shows that very nearly the whole of this grant has been spent away. Have not the Government of India specified at the time of sanctioning the grant the exact items of expenditure for which it should be utilised? The people think that great benefit would have resulted if our Provincial Government had only properly distributed the grant made by the Government of India. Anyhow, their idea is that the grant has not been spent in a manner that would have been satisfactory to them. There is room to think that those who prepare the budget charges in Government offices have not paid proper attention to this matter. This grievance cannot be redressed until these charges are prepared in consultation with the leaders of the people.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

20. The Hindu Nesan, of the 22nd January, publishes in Tamil an article on this subject contributed by Mr. G. S. Arundale, characterising the present system of education in India as foreign and advocating the promotion of national education in this country.

National education in India.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

21. The Qaumi Report, of the 22nd January, in a leader on the marginally-noted subject, writes:—The University is also necessary for an oriental scholar—a fact which is ignored. We strongly urge the appointment of a Mussalman thereto, otherwise the reforms to be introduced will prove useless.

The University and Mussalmans.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

It is our desire that there should be a Mussalman Fellow acquainted with the ideas and aspirations conveyed through oriental literature. Madras has produced such a scholar in the person of Moulavi Muhammad Abdur Rahman Sahib Shatir. It is not known why he has not been appointed a Fellow. In addition to being an oriental scholar he is an excellent poet. Had he not been born in the unfortunate Madras community, he would have become more famous than Surendernath Thagore.

The editor hopes he will be made a Fellow.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

22. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 21st January, referring to the last clause of the fourth chapter of Scott's Quentin-Durward—a non-detailed text prescribed for the Intermediate course for 1919 in which an insult is offered to the prophet, writes:—We earnestly hope that Muhammadan members of the Senate of the Madras University will at once read the book and unhesitatingly move the Senate either to delete the clause or remove the book from the curriculum.

An insulting book in the Intermediate course.

(e) Local and Municipal.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

23. The Hindu Nesan, of the 22nd January, observes:—It is well for the district administrators to consult the opinions of leaders of people in the matter of repairing roads and affording the people other facilities. Reports relating to the localities where repairs are needed to a larger extent should be called for from time to time, i.e., at the meetings of municipal councils or union panchayats as the case may be, as this will ensure all matters receiving the attention of the Government. In view of the great traffic obtaining on roads consequent on the railway restrictions, it is necessary for the local boards to pay due attention to the repair or renewal of such roads.

ANDHRAPATRIKA Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

24. A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 24th January, writes:—. . . I learn from the Natural History Lecturer in the Purasawakam High School that there have been of late some rat-falls in the Sundaramurti Vinayakarkoil street in Triplicane, in which he is putting up and that the Corporation authorities have been disinfecting the infected parts. Another friend tells me that a Professor of the Engineering College who was to have returned to-day from his camp at Saidapet, with his staff, having come to know this, made up his mind to stop there for three days more. But the Health Officer reports that there have been no rat-falls in Triplicane for the last two or three days. The Corporation Commissioners in Triplicane are requested to state which of these conflicting statements is correct.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 14th Jan. 1919.

25. Adverting to the reference recently made by the Government of Madras to the presidents of district boards and non-official presidents of taluk boards, at the instance of the Government of India, to ascertain their opinion on the suggestion of the Government of India that an executive officer responsible to the Government be appointed to look after the administration of local boards which are presided over by non-official presidents, and to the Government Order publishing opinions received thereon, the leading article in the Manorama, of the 14th January, on 'Local self-government' expresses itself to be in complete agreement with Mr. F. B. Evans, Collector of Malabar, in thinking that the suggestion is undesirable and that instead of appointing a non-official president and a paid executive officer, it will advance the cause of local self-government much more to appoint the elected non-official president himself as the paid executive officer.

Local self-government.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 22nd Jan. 1919.

26. The Kerala Sanchari, of the 22nd January, remarks in its leading article on the Malabar District Board that all who know the affairs of the District Board will unanimously admit that several noteworthy benefits have accrued to the Board during three or four years during which it was administered by Mr. F. B. Evans, Collector of Malabar, and that this was due to his ability, sympathetic dealings with the Members of the Board and his attention in carrying out acceptable suggestions offered by them:—Adverting to the question of the appointment of a non-official president for the district board, the article refers to the good opinion expressed by Mr. Evans about the work now being done by non-official presidents of taluk boards in the district and observes that since it is evident that men of the right type are not wanting in Malabar there is every reason to believe that the appointment of a non-official president for the district board will be as satisfactory as in the case of the taluk boards and as in the case of the district board of the adjoining district of South Kanara, and that such an appointment will please the people. What the Collector will lose in that case, in respect of contact with representative leaders of the people, he can make good during his circuits.

The Malabar District Board.

(h) Railways.

27. Referring to the statement of the Pioneer that the question of Government taking over the direct management of railways will be considered only after normal conditions are restored, the Swadesamitran, of the 21st January, observes:—Messrs. Bonar Law, Churchill and Lloyd George have emphasised the fact that great benefits have resulted by the Government taking over the management of railways in their own hands. Further, it is well known that all of us are unanimously urging that the railways in India should be under the direct management of the Government. The necessity for postponing the consideration of this question still further is not apparent. The great war has well demonstrated the expediency of State management. Have our authorities alone not realized this lesson?

Indian railways.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

Remarking that the reservation of separate railway carriages for Europeans and Anglo-Indians has to be strongly condemned, the Desabhaktan, of the 23rd January, says:—All those who are dressed in the western fashion are allowed into these carriages. The authorities should understand that the Indians will no more brook this invidious distinction, which causes much inconvenience to the passengers.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

(j) Salt and Abkāri.

28. Referring to an order recently passed in the United States of America strictly prohibiting the manufacture, sale, import and export of all alcoholic spirits, the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd January, observes:—All the countries of the world can take a lesson from America. Though a resolution was moved last year in the Imperial Legislative Council by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma, that steps should be taken in this country to put an end to the consumption of liquor once for all, it fell through. Those that then opposed the resolution will now do well to note the present decision of America in this matter.

The drink evil.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras. 22nd Jan. 1919.

Observing that, in view of the baneful effects of drinking, the Government of the United States in America have prohibited the manufacture, sale and import or export of alcoholic spirits there, the Lokopakari, of the 27th January, remarks that, in India, drinking has not been prohibited because of the revenue it yields to the Government, and that it can be rooted out only if India gets swaraj.

The drink evil.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

29. Referring to the proposed prohibition of liquor in America, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 24th January, writes:—The United States is the home, as it were, of all types of bold enterprise. President Wilson who started with the object of laying the foundation of the world's peace seems now determined to put an end to the drink habit in America with a single stroke of his pen. Would it be a mere beggar's dream if we should ask that in India too our beloved Emperor should promulgate a similar measure?

Temperance reform in India.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 24th Jan. 1919.

(k) General.

30. The Desabhimani, of the 4th January, contains an English leader under this heading, from which the following is an extract:—" . . . 'The report of the Reform proposals ends with this pregnant observation, 'Far greater issues still hang in the balance on the battlefield of France—it is there and not in Delhi or Whitehall that the ultimate decision of India's future will be taken.' So far as the issue might be said to hang on the battlefields of France, the issue has been decided and decided in favour of liberty. . . Whatever might be our contribution, if the principle in the name of which this most terrible war has been fought out is put in force practically—apart from all solemn declarations, Royal and Parliamentary—India should be given a place in the gallery of Nations inferior to none—if not at once, at least at a near date and the way must be paved by giving substantial Reforms for training her up in ways of Government. How much of it shall be given and how carried out and what is adequate should not be weighed out in a niggardly spirit but the situation requires all the energy of constructive statesmanship and thorough sympathy. . . That for over a century and more we have been trained and educated and our aspirations stimulated by the most advanced Government, none can gainsay and it would be poorest compliment to England herself if she were to be taxed with incapacity to train us in the ways of self-government. Except for certain interested clique of persons—English Nation should admit that she has stood by the principle of Macaulay as regards her Mission in India and that Indians were not slow in catching her ideals and teachings. To say we are behind, we are unfit, western institutions can't grow in eastern soil and such catch phrases is to say an untruth and if said by an Englishman it is unpatriotic and un-British on his part. It would be an admission of a breach of trust, a falling off from principles set out by English Nation as a Nation—in fact it would be a proclamation from housetops as it were of 'Incapacity, breach of faith and every other vice of such nature' on the part of such individual. That we wish to continue subjects of the British Crown and hope for greater and greater opportunities to develop ourselves by connexion with her, none can deny. That we are grateful for what we have received hitherto (and we have received much) is an undeniable truth. Our only wish is that we should be given responsible government and in the words of the Pandit 'the measure thereof should be judged and determined in the light of the principle of self-determination which has emerged triumphant out of this devastating war.' Then might England boast that she has fulfilled her mission and India as a Nation, inspired with a grateful feeling for her who contributed to make her such, be a source at once of pride and power and then alone can she be called the brightest jewel of the British Crown. . ."

Improvement of the sugar manufacture.

31. The Swadesamitran, in its supplement to the issue of the 18th January, observes that, in spite of the existence of ample facilities in India for promoting the manufacture of sugar in this country, these facilities are not properly availed of and that large quantities of sugar are being annually imported from foreign countries especially from Java, and reproduces in support of this statement an article contributed by a correspondent to the Englishman advocating the increase of the import duty on sugar in this country which will give an impetus to the promotion of the manufacture of sugar.

The Civil Service and the Indian Patriot.

34. Referring to the comments of the Indian Patriot that the members of the Civil Service deem themselves to be the leaders of the public and not their servants, that they desire to continue to exercise authority as usual in all political matters and that they do not relish the interference of the people, in whom such powers should naturally vest, in the exercise of their authority, the Dravidan, of the 22nd January, observes:—Nobody is justified in preventing the civilians from safeguarding their position; nor can any one deny that they have every right to do so and look to their advancement in course of time by legitimate means. But the Indian Patriot denies them this privilege, because it apprehends that complete Home Rule which it advocates for the progress of the Brahmans might thereby be obstructed. We never say anything against real Home Rule. But what we object to, is to secure for the Brahmans all kinds of powers in the name of others. None of our party will accept the views of the Patriot which is interested in establishing the Brahman oligarchy in this country. The present administration by Civil Servants is undoubtedly better than that by Brahmans.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

Cattle in Tuticorin.

35. Referring to a petition recently submitted by the residents of Tuticorin to the Collector of Tinnevelly and to His Excellency the Governor of Madras regarding the shooting of cows which, by mistake, enter the limits of the reserved forest on their way from the grazing ground and remarking that a perusal of this petition makes one shudder, the Desabhaktan, of the 22nd January, observes:—The statement that cows are sometimes shot even when they do not enter the forest reserves, deserves notice. It is said that this iniquity is done at the instigation of the beef merchants in Tuticorin. We very much regret to learn that the Reserve Police and the Forest officials help these merchants in this matter. If this kind of shooting is permitted to continue, nobody can maintain a cow in Tuticorin. If it is true that cattle get into reserved forests, cannot action be taken under sections 57 and 58 of the Forest Act and the owners of such cattle fined, which will serve to give a warning to them besides adding to Government revenues? It will not then be possible for the Policemen or other officials to misappropriate the penalty levied. How can the Hindus, who consider it sinful even to touch the cow by their feet, brook to see it being shot dead in their very presence? How can officials who are supposed to know the subtleties of the law, act unjustly out of selfish motives? It is not edifying to the authorities to allow hard-hearted people to torture cows in this way seeking their gains. Hereafter at least the Government should take proper steps in this matter, as this kind of shooting will cause immense mental pain to the Indians. The authorities should understand that not only the residents of Tuticorin but all the Indians will be enraged at this and rise in agitation. Can such an atrocity be then permitted under the British rule? Now at least, the Government of Madras should get a little sober casting off their slumber. We request that those who have been the cause for the slaughter of over 100 cows in this manner should be brought to book.

Lord Sinha.

36. The Desabhaktan, of the 22nd January, expresses its pleasure at the exaltation of Sir S. P. Sinha to the peerage.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

While writing about the peerage of Sir S. P. Sinha, the Hindu Nesan, of the 23rd January, makes the following observations among others:—Apart from the support gained by the Government by his appointment, it will now be possible for Sir Sinha himself to do real service for India as a member of the House of Lords. Further, it is certain that ample opportunities will be afforded for an Indian holding office for the first time as a member of this House to give practical proof of the fact that he is in no way inferior to his English friends in his knowledge of politics, keenness of perception and capacity for the investigation of facts.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

Lord Sinha.

Expressing its satisfaction at his appointment as Under Secretary of State for India, the Desabhimani, of the 18th January, observes in English:—"While the appointment of an Indian to this great office is unique in itself, the choice is doubtless the happiest in the circumstances, foreshadowing, as it does, the future liberal policy of the British Government towards India."

DESABHIMANI, Cuddalore, 18th Jan. 1919.

Almost the same sentiments appear in the Tamil columns of this paper.

Lord Sinha.

Expressing its satisfaction at his appointment as the Under Secretary of State for India, the Vaisyamitran, of the 20th January, observes:—Every Indian is bound to be grateful to the British Government for the appointment of an Indian for the first time as a member of the British Cabinet. The Indians should take care not to get deceived by having secured one or two responsible offices just at a time when a beginning has been made for the introduction of reform measures.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 20th Jan. 1919.

Lord Sinha.

The Swadeshabhimani, of the 24th January, writes:—The elevation of Sir Sinha to the peerage is truly indicative of the high regard which British statesmen have for India.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 24th Jan. 1919.

On the same subject, the Vokkaligara Patrika, of the 22nd January, says:—The appointment of Sir Sinha to a place in the British Cabinet must be regarded as a landmark in the history of the British Administration in India. It is indeed very fortunate that the announcements made by His Majesty and his ministers from time to time that India is entitled to equal partnership in the affairs of the empire are now being carried into action. India will be truly grateful to Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Montagu for all time for appointing an Indian to so exalted an office as the membership of the British Cabinet. His elevation to the peerage is particularly welcome as Indian aspirations are apt to be stifled, if, when the Reform Scheme is introduced into the House of Lords, there is not even one in the House to meet the arguments of the opponents of reform.

VOKKALIGARA PATRIKA, Bangalore, 22nd Jan. 1919.

MYSORE STAR, Mysore, 19th Jan. 1919.

The Mysore Star, of the 19th January, writes:—Though the Home Rulers might be dissatisfied with the appointment of Sir Sinha, because a leader of their own party such as Tilak or Pal has not been chosen for that honour, there can be no doubt that all true well-wishers of the country will welcome the appointment, as we may be sure that with Mr. Montagu as Secretary of State and Sir Sinha as Under Secretary, the administration will progress steadily, without the remotest likelihood of precipitate action.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 24th Jan. 1919.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 24th January, remarks:—The population of the whole empire is four hundred millions, of which India represents three hundred and ten millions. The appointment of Sir Sinha as Under Secretary means that there will be 59 British members and one Indian in the ministry to guard the welfare of that vast population. Hitherto there was not even one to protect the interests of the 310 millions. Indians are, therefore, now in raptures that they have now at least one to represent them. The Indians are grateful even for small favours. We cannot say to what extent Sir Sinha's appointment will really benefit India. But it will give handle for the assertion that he represents India, that the reforms were carried out with his consent and that thus India has been given responsible Government. India has reason to regret that even her 310 millions have not been given the right of electing a representative of their own. If we learn to forget our differences and acquire the capacity to fight for our rights and liberties with perfect unity among us, our rights and liberties are likely to find some consideration at least a hundred years hence.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

37. The Swadesamitran, of the 22nd January, refers to a manifesto recently issued by the Hon'ble Mr. Surendranath Bannerji and certain other 'moderates' warning the nationalists as well as the officers of the Civil Service and the Sydenham party, and threatening that if the nationalists do not accept and give their support to the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals, some of the reforms contained even in this scheme might be dropped, and observes:—If what the moderates threaten could really happen, it appears that they have not understood the very purpose with which the British Government have resolved to bring about the reforms. We hold that the Government resolved on effecting the reforms only after recognising the necessity of modifying the system of administration. If so, how can that necessity mitigate by our declining to support the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals? From this manifesto it is apparent that the moderates have not rightly estimated the British Ministers. Shakespeare has in one of his plays made one of his characters utter in jest the following words:—"I am Sir oracle and when I ope my lips let no dogs bark." Are the British Ministers like that oracle? Are they such as to say "unless you accept what we propose, you cannot get anything?" The nationalist party have, on the other hand, every confidence in their rights. They make known their needs with due respect to the dictates of their conscience. It is only the future that will prove whose contention is right. We trust that the authorities will pay attention to the statement of the moderates themselves that care should be taken to see that the people of India do not get discontented.

The warning of the moderates.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

38. Remarking that many of the bureaucrats in the different provinces attempt to revolt against the introduction of reforms in the administration of this country, the Swadesamitran, of the 22nd January, observes:—The civilians in this country belong to the ruling class and are exercising autocratic powers holding positions from a member of the Government of India down to a District Collector. Lord Landsdowne and Sir John Hewett are contending that, for the British spirit to be maitained in the Indian administration, the British should necessarily continue in it. What is the object of their contention? It is nothing but the continuance of the present system of bureaucratic rule. But, according to the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme, the Indian trait should hereafter characterize the administration of the country; and popular leaders will thereupon strive to secure this. The future civilians should then be of a different mettle altogether. So it will suffice if recruitment to the Civil Service is made from India. If persons of the stamp of the present day civilians continue to be recruited from England, Home Rule will be long delayed.

The Indian Civil Service Associations.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

Referring to the formation of these associations for protesting against the reform proposals, the Hindu Nesan, of the 27th January, observes:—The Government are not bound to enact laws with reference to the approval or disapproval of the officers whom they have appointed to conduct the administration of this country on their behalf. The civil servants in India have only to carry out the laws framed by the Government. Their attempt to protest against the reform proposals is against Indian Civil Service rules and is improper. If they apprehend that their interests would be prejudicially affected by the proposals, they can individually represent their grievances to the Government who will act as they deem fit. The civil servants should not form a compact and do anything. If it is permissible for Mr. Justice Phillips to join such a compact and oppose the reform proposals, can there be any objection to the Indian Judges of the High Court joining the Home Rule Associations and working for India's cause?

The Indian Civil Service Association.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 22nd January, reproduces the leader of the Lokopakari of Madras of the 20th idem abstracted on page 115 of Report No. 4 of 1919.

The Indian Civil Service Association.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 24th Jan. 1919.

38. The Swadeshabhimani, of 24th January, writes:—There is a proverb which says that the man who drops his coconuts sometimes weeps even more bitterly than the man who spilt his oil. We are reminded of the proverb when we look at the doings of the officers of the Madras Civil Service. When all peoples in the world including even the uncivilized races of East and West Africa are chanting the hymn of 'self-determination' and India too has merely joined the chorus and a few of our leaders are struggling for a small measure of reform in her administration, in view of the steadfast loyalty which she displayed during the war, the civilians of Bihar and some time back also of Madras, whether with the object of ridiculing the Indians or of mocking at their cry for liberty have organized associations to bewail their fate in the event of the grant of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. We wonder what purpose is served by mocking at the Indians in this manner when they know for certain that the Indians will not be granted the reforms which they have demanded even in the proportion of four annas in the rupee.

The Central Publicity Board.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

39. Adverting to the dissolution of this Board in Bengal the Desabhaktan, of the 23rd January, observes:—The Central Publicity Board in Madras has not yet been abolished, though the war has ended and the journal War News which this Board was publishing has now been stopped. It is not known what further work this Board has got to do. It would be well if it is abolished and the money spent on it is utilized for better purposes. When would the Madras Government attend to this?

Need for Agricultural Associations.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

40. The Desabhaktan, of the 23rd January, observes:—Our people are well aware of the measures taken by the authorities to improve the fertility of the soil, and any discussion of it will therefore be a useless task. In past years the Agricultural Department was getting the requisite seeds and supplying them to the ryots through agricultural associations. Now the complaint is prevalent everywhere that, either on account of its carelessness or of other reasons, this department is not in a position to supply the required seeds to the ryots in time. The remedy for this is to start agricultural associations in villages with taluk associations at their head.

A call to the patriots.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

41. In the course of a lengthy article contributed to the Desabhaktan, of the 23rd January, by a correspondent exhorting the Indians to form an association of patriots to work in the cause of the country, the following observations find place among others:—Friends! Patriots! True sons of Mother Bharata! My brethren! Wake up, follow me and array yourselves for the war of liberty. Our mother is wailing. A beloved brother of ours is tired of having fought out a just fight with manliness and within constitutional limits. Seeing that another friend summons us. He is ready to train us as warriors and lead us. So start. Do not hesitate. Do not shrink from serving our mother Bharata. We shall all go to T. V. Kalyanasundaram, the editor of the Desabhaktan, who is a precious son of the mother, a good patriot working conscientiously and one daily infusing into us deep devotion, supreme wisdom and courage of conviction, and with his help organise an association called "The Samaj of the Patriots" We shall locate it in a secluded place and set up therein the image of our mother Bharata with the portraits of several patriots beside her. We shall request the editor of the Desabhaktan to be the President of the samaj. Every one who enlists himself in this samaj should prostrate before the image of the mother and swear that he has dedicated himself to the mother, that his sole duty will be to serve her, that he will strive for her until all her troubles are ended and she enjoys happiness, and that he will continue to work with undiminished enthusiasm and without any delay or hesitation regardless of all incidental troubles. We will tour through different places and take up the work left by our Varadan. We shall impress upon the people at large our political knowledge and the true condition of the mother and her boundless suffering. We shall explain to them that the sons of the mother should not be beguiled by the sweet words of the bureaucrats and that their supreme duty is to put an end to the suffering of their mother, and remind them that, for this, constitutional agitation is necessary. We shall wake up all, prepare them and induce them to agitate. . . Our leader exhorts us to come. Ever since he heard of our Varada's imprisonment, and ever since he returned after touring through several places to serve his country, he is crying out through the Bhaktan. Have you not read his leaders? Is it proper for us to be quiet even now? All of you assure him at once that you are resolved to serve the country. Seek his help. If he knows how many of us are ready, he will make the necessary arrangements for starting a samaj and attending to other things connected therewith.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

Condition of India.

42. Referring to the large population of India and extolling her ancient greatness in civilization, wealth, learning and industries a correspondent to the Desabhaktan, of the 24th January, writes :—O India! Is your heroism gone? What has become of your courage? Have your sons lost their manliness and self-respect? You, who owned riches in abundance, have been reduced to abject poverty. You, who were highly religious have become irreligious. You, with your vast population, have become subject to pestilence. Your sons, descended from Désing and other kings who were known for their valour and their skill in the use of arms, and who single extirpated 10,000 warriors and won the laurel of victory, have been rendered weaponless widows. Your raw products are being taken to foreign countries, and brought back to you as manufactured goods and sold to your sons for immense profit. Your vast resources are being robbed away by foreigners without any hope of their return, while your children suffer for want of food and raiment and die of hunger. What is your fate, alas! alas!! When the whole world is striving for liberty and every country is attempting to progress, you, with all your fertility and resources, have become extremely poor, have lost your freedom and have become helpless.

SWADESAMITRAN, & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Jan. 1919.

Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

43. The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 18th January, publish in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held in Tanjore on the 16th idem in connexion with the conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 23rd January, publishes in Tamil an extract from the comments of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika on this conviction to the following effect :—If the bureaucrats resort to such measures to stifle the Home Rule movement, there is no doubt that they will get disappointed. Such acts will only tend to strengthen this movement.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 20th Jan. 1919.

Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

Expressing its regret at the conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu, the Vaisyamitran, of the 20th January, observes among others :—In western countries, the Government, without curbing by repressive measures the patriots who are agitating for political reforms, leave them to the good sense of the people, whereas in India any patriot who comes forward to preach about political matters is at once charged with sedition, although the bureaucrats know very well that, for a country to attain progress, there should be patriots to explain to the people the affairs connected with it. On account of the misrepresentations made by some of his enemies, the authorities entertained wrong notions about Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu. It is their general belief that no one preaches politics in good faith. Whenever there is a charge for sedition, there always exists a difference of opinion between the authorities and the people. The main reason for this is their distrust in the patriots. The Government should clearly understand that, so long as administration is carried on without mutual confidence, the people will have to suffer very much.

The bail application of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

Referring to the grant of bail to Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu by the High Court, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st January, remarks:— . . . Those who argue that the present system of administration is not conducive to the advancement of the country and that it should, therefore, be replaced by a representative government cannot be disloyal in the least. They ask for this change, because they are prompted by loyalty to the British Empire and because they believe that it is important for the permanence and well-being of the Empire. No Indian politician can venture to condemn the system of the Government of India in stronger terms than Mr. Montagu. And yet, will any one attribute evil intentions to Mr. Montagu on that ground? . . . In Mr. Vaidya's case, the judge has set aside the conviction on the ground that the Home Rule movement is not opposed to loyalty. We look in vain for such a liberal spirit in the judgment of the Deputy Magistrate of Madura, which was based on antiquated notions. We trust that the High Court will consider well the pros and cons of the matter and do justice, taking into account the attitude which has newly grown in the country.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

An address to the students.

44. The Desabhaktan, of the 24th January, writes:—There is none ignorant of the fact that at present there are too many restrictions upon the Indian students. The rulers have understood where the responsibility of India rests. At present the students hear lectures, read newspapers and take part in scout movements. If they stop with this, it is certain that they will forget their country when they grow up. The elders must, therefore, seek the means for the labours of youth turning out to be useful when they grow up. They must strengthen the soul force of the present day students as otherwise these will not be able to bear the responsibility of India but will have to lead a life of slavery Repressive laws are daily increasing in India, and the use of physical force to oppose these laws will be both unconstutional and unwise. As Home Rule leagues have been established at present in several places, associations for inculcating passive resistance should also be started, where bachelors should practise truth, courage and swadeshism which have been preached by Gandhi and attempt at once to attain the soul force for doing good to others. Students! Don't direct your attention in other ways. Don't forget mother Bharata!

The same paper also contains a lecture entitled 'our duty' delivered on the 19th January 1919 by one S. Bhagavate Anandham under the auspices of the Saraswati Students' Association, Tuticorin, which contains an appeal to the students to realise their future responsibility in the matter of the advancement of India and befit themselves to bear that responsibility.

Government and industries.

46. Observing that in view of the welfare of their own country the British Government have decided to retain under their direct control certain indigenous industries in England, the Desabhakatan, of the 21st January, says:—Many of the Indian industries continue at present to be under Europeans, and the profits thereof go to foreign countries. Industrial experts come from foreign countries, get high salaries here and with the amount earned by them leave for their own countries a few years hence. Friends! have we neither capitalists nor experts in our country and have we not the raw products required for industries? We have all these; but what do we lack? We are lacking perseverance. Unless India attends to her own industries, it will be impossible for her to lift her head in the midst of other countries. So it is the duty of the Government to cheer her up in that branch. At the outset, the Government should start certain model factories and work them themselves for a time. Indian youths, besides being taught industrial sciences, should be sent to foreign countries to receive higher education. We request the Government would care more for the advancement of the Indians than for the interests of foreign traders. They should realise that, if India grows strong, it will add to the strength of England.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

A public meeting at Kumbakōnam.

47. The Desabhaktan, of the 22nd January, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of a public meeting held at Kumbakōnam on the 19th idem in which Mr. Subrahmanya Siva is said to have delivered an address on the needs of the Indian community containing the following observations:—In order that our country may obtain salvation, that is swaraj, we should develop fraternity, union, patriotism, love of language, nationality and other virtues. There should be no factions in our country. A number of our brethren are now confined in prison and are doing penance there and nobody now comes forward with a resolve to set them free. At present famine of a virulent type is prevailing here and none has come forward with any relief measures. Though our brethren have a strong desire to obtain swaraj, yet they do not adopt the required measures for obtaining it. We should only progress by our own perseverance, and it is certain that we cannot do so with the help of others. We can obtain liberty only by remaining passive. We should sacrifice our wealth, body and soul for the sake of Mother Bharata. All the youths of our country should carry out the dictates of Mother Bharata. If we do this, we can confidently assert that we can obtain swaraj ere long.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 24th January, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an account of another lecture delivered at Kumbakōnam by the same person at the close of a procession with Doctor Varadarajalu Nayudu's portrait on the 20th idem, in which the lecturer is said to have spoken to the following effect:—We should strengthen self-reliance, soul-force and fraternity in our people. Soul-force cannot be suppressed by anybody. We should without any cost adopt the ancient forms of physical exercise which will give us strength. The people in the north are growing stronger while those in the south are continuing to be weak. In the great war our Indian soldiers have crushed the Germans by their heroic deeds and have shown their valour in Mesopotamia. No kind of liberty can we attain by depending on the Labour Party. We should therefore be intent on our own purpose, improving union, fraternity and soul-force among ourselves.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

Repression as a remedy.

48. Observing that some of the authorities here think that repressive measures are a panacea for the present situation, and reproducing in Tamil a statement of Mr. Asquith to the effect that the best way of disposing of the Seinfein Party is to grant Home Rule to Ireland and that that party would disappear the moment Home Rule is granted, the Swadesamitran, of the 23rd January, observes:—Our authorities should deeply consider the statement of Mr. Asquith who was for many years Prime Minister. Though there may be a few persons in India who forget themselves and act in unconstitutional ways, they cannot be compared to the Seinfeiners. In spite of this, Mr. Asquith himself admits that swaraj is the surest panacea for doing away with the tactics of the Seinfeiners, whereas some of our authorities say that the Rowlatt Bills are the best remedy.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

The Madras Tramways.

49. The Desabhaktan, of the 21st January, repeats the arguments advanced by the Hindu Nesan of the 4th idem against the reservation of front seats for ladies, referred to in paragraph 24 of Report No. 2 of 1919, and detailing the several inconveniences which may be caused to them in those seats, suggests the desirability of reserving the last two rows of seats for their use.

50. Referring to an article contributed by a correspondent to the Times of India requesting the Government to consider the large quantities of foodstuffs supplied from India to allied countries during the war, and regulate the steamer freight and relieve the sufferings of the people here by getting them supplies of rice and other food-stuffs from Burma and other places, the Swadesamitran, of the 24th January, observes :— There is no doubt that the request of this correspondent is perfectly legitimate. During the last four years all the allied countries were supplied with plenty of agricultural products from India, while now she is hard pressed for want. The cry that the prices have become unbearable, has begun to rend the air everywhere. We will wait and see how far the Government pay heed to this request.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

The food situation.

51. Observing that it is understood, from Reuter's telegrams, that information has been received from Moscow to effect that the Bolsheviks have decided to send their men to China, India and Persia with money to spread their views there, the Dravidan, of the 24th January, observes :—We cannot definitely say that in case the Bolsheviks happen to enter our country they will not get suitable accomplices here. As it is, there are sufficient inflammable materials in our country, and to add to this, if the Bolsheviks also should join them with funds, then they will catch fire of their own accord. We regret that such injurious materials are spread all over our country. The grant of extensive privileges in regard to political propagandist work is the main cause for this anxiety. The Government should adopt immediate precautionary measures in this connexion. The rules, the brutal acts and other views of the Bolsheviks when combined with the unconstitutional agitations in our country will only add fuel to the fire.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

The Bolsheviks and India.

Speaking about the genesis of Bolsheviks in Russia and their creed of general devastation and of defiance and destruction of all authority and the danger of the spread of their satanic propaganda throughout the world, a note in the Samadarsi, of the 18th January, says that it is reported that at a recent meeting they have decided to send some of their party to India. If holy (mother) India, already saddened with the dissatisfaction and disquietude of her offsprings who are without arms and quite helpless, has to suffer the wicked and cruel onslaught of these terrorists, she can only bewail her fate as Pānchāli did in the midst of the Kauravas. What a terrible outlook ! When we peep into the future of the world everything looks so terribly dark. Are these the evil signs of the end of the world or good signs like the tempest, thunder and lightning before approaching showers of blessing ?

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 18th Jan. 1919.

The Bolshevik menace and India.

52. Remarking that almost all the Native States in India are far advanced in industries and education, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th January, observes :—Some years back, an Industries Commission was appointed in British India, and it has recently published its report. It is not known how many centuries will elapse before its recommendations are carried out. But, the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee, which was constituted after the Industries Commission, will become an Act next month. Ah! How sympathetic are the Government of India towards Indian industries? However, there is a separate member for Indian industries and trade in the Government of India ! Many wise people doubt whether that member is there simply for opposing any resolution on industries that may be brought before the Imperial Legislative Council by any non-official member. We trust that he will not be cross with us when we say that it will be advantageous in several ways if the Government of India follow at least the Native States.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

India and industries.

53. Referring to the comments of the Pioneer regarding the attitude of the Provincial Governments on the Reform Scheme, the Swadesamitran, of the 25th January, observes :— It is obvious from these comments that many of the

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

The Provincial Governments and reforms.

Provincial heads are against certain items in this scheme and that the attempts of His Excellency the Viceroy to effect a compromise, proved to be practically of no avail. It is quite patent that both the authorities and the people are against appointing two classes of administrators in the Provincial Governments. In these circumstances it will be seen that the resolution passed at the session of the Delhi Congress, as regards Provincial Governments, is very appropriate.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

The Legislative Councils.

54. Referring to the notification of the Government of India that no opportunity will be allowed to the representative members to move any resolutions other than those connected with the budget at the session of the Imperial Legislative Council which will be held shortly for the consideration of the budget, the Swadesamitran, of the 25th January, observes:—The rights of our representatives on Legislative Councils are already very limited. It is impossible to keep silent when attempts are being made to restrict these rights still further The Legislative Councils in our country meet only about three or four times in the year. Though our representatives are eager to get from the authorities particulars relating to matters of public interest, they have to wait till the Council meeting. As if this is not sufficient, the authorities say that, during budget discussions, other subjects should not be considered at all.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

Western civilization and new diseases.

55. Remarking that the greater the spread of the western civilization, the greater is the growth of new diseases in India, the Desabhaktan, of the 27th January, observes that the Government should not give room for the spread of infectious diseases which have several baneful effects on the people and invites the attention of the Government to the necessity for the establishment of a special sanitary department to attend to these diseases in India.

DESABHAKTAN Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

Mr. Lionel Davidson.

56. Referring to his appointment as a permanent member of the Council in place of the late Mr. Gillman, the Desabhaktan, of the 27th January, expresses the hope that, unlike Mr. Gillman, Mr. Davidson will become popular all over the Presidency and hold this office for a long time.

The Home Rule League, Trichinopoly.

57. The Desabhaktan, of the 18th January, publishes the presidential address delivered at the second anniversary of this league recently held at Trichinopoly, while the Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 16th idem, publish the proceedings of the anniversary, at the end of which Mr. Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar is said to have given an address in Tamil, wherein he makes mention of the industries and trade of India having been ruined and the country reduced to a slavish condition, the heavy burden of taxation and the policy of the Government in offering reforms on the one hand and resorting to repression on the other, and pointing to the fact that the European war would not have been brought to an end so soon but for the help and valour of the Indians, and to the necessity for India being granted liberty if the resultant principle of the war is to do away with the policy of one nation keeping another under subjection, calls upon the Indians to muster strong with courage and truth for securing not commercial superiority or conquest but liberty, fraternity and equality.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

The Government and the labourers.

59. Referring to the suggestion of the Pioneer that the Government of India should pay attention to the formation of Arbitration Boards to set right the differences that crop up between capitalists and labourers, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th January, observes:—While such boards are in existence in western countries and are producing good results, why cannot a similar arrangement be made by the authorities in India as well? As anticipated both by the Government and the people, industry is likely to make great progress in India in future, which will naturally effect an increase in the number of capitalists and labourers. As differences between these two classes in regard to wages and hours of work are inevitable, we would again urge on the authorities to do the needful even at present as a precautionary measure.

60. Reproducing in Tamil an extract from an English Journal to the effect that the Japanese are evincing great enthusiasm in the manufacture of sugar and are likely to increase their sugar trade in all Indian trade centres and that the Government should take proper steps to develop the Indian industry, the Desabhaktan, of the 27th January, suggests that, in consideration of the injuries likely to be caused to Indian trade and industries, import duty should be levied by Government on foreign sugar.

Indian sugar and Japanese competition.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

61. The Desabhaktan, of the 27th January, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article in which the following finds place among others:—The main question is, why are the Indians famishing without a living? The answer is not far to seek. It is nothing but the want of liberty for our Indian brethren which is the birth-right of every individual. They are at present in a condition of slavery. It is likely that a doubt may arise whether it is consistent with British justice to keep the Indians in this position Friends! The ideals of British justice are very ennobling, equitable and flawless; but the ways of the bureaucrats that carry out these ideals are not at all proper. Puffed up with the pride that they belong to the ruling race while the Indians only belong to the subject race, they exercise autocratic powers as if they were specially created by God to rule over Indians. They enjoy high salaries and pensions unknown in other countries. Their ignorance of the vernaculars, the short duration of their stay in India at the end of which they return to their country with plenty of money and their indifference to the interests of the Indians preclude them from associating themselves closely with the people. They make all the arrangements necessary to improve the outturn of products such as cotton and groundnut which are necessary for the working of the factories in their country and carry them away as raw products They are affording necessary facilities to the European merchants and spoiling our industries and trade; because they fear that, if these are allowed to flourish, their countrymen will lose their living and the inordinate profit they have been making till now. Brothers! You are eye witnesses to lakhs of people becoming victims to famine and pestilence. Do not be sleeping still. Come forward to work and completely replace the unlimited authority of the bureaucrats and keep India under the control of the people's representatives We cannot enjoy happiness unless India attains liberty.

The thirst for liberty.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

62. Dwelling at length upon the opulent condition of India in ancient days and quoting extracts from the Report of the Indian Industries Commission and the opinions of eminent men in support of the same, the Desabhaktan, of the 15th January, remarks that it was the wealth of India that attracted the European merchants to this country and describes how, when the Government of India was taken over by the East India Company, they utilized their powers to destroy Indian industries and made India a producing feeder for the manufacturer in England.

The present condition of India.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Jan. 1919.

The same paper, continuing this article in its issue of the 21st idem, refers to the theory of the 'selfish' Anglo-Indians that India is only an agricultural country and can never become an industrial one and, quoting extracts to prove how, if India had been able to pay England in the same coin, when the latter protected her industries by levying heavy import duties on Indian goods, she would have preserved her industries intact, observes:—The present condition of the people is so bad that, if it is not improved, famine is sure to afflict the poor, and the Government should note this. The future of the Indians is gloomy. It is the opinion of economical experts that the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, either with additions or omissions, will not relieve the distress of the poor. As carrying out of these reforms will entail greater expenditure, new taxes will have to be levied to raise the money required therefor and the people will therefore be put te greater hardships. The only party who can improve the condition of the people is the Government and the best way in which they can do it is by giving effect to the recommendations of the Indian Industries Commission. These are very useful to the advancement of Indian industries. The Government should convert India into both an agricultural and industrial country as it was in olden days. There are many things which the Government should do to improve the agriculture of the country and they should attend to these without delay. These measures by themselves will not do. Unless the Indians are given fiscal responsibility, India will not be benefited in the least.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

A call to patriots.

63. The Desabhaktan, of the 27th January, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article in which the following observations occur:—Dear children of mother Bharata! are you still asleep? Just realize in what condition your mother is at present. She is big with the child of liberty. The time for her confinement is close at hand. She is loath to see new ways and adopt the modern western civilization. Just as Sita, during her preganancy, evinced a desire to see the old forests, so our mother Bharata wishes to see her old heroic sons, her old fertile lands, her ancient wealth and ancient trade and industries. She desires that she should have the rights enjoyed by other countries, that her children should feel happy and that she should, like other women, grandly wear a crown and attend public conferences. The duty of enabling her to gratify her wishes devolves on us. Some carry away the cotton required for spinning the thread with which her cloth has to be woven. Some blind many of her sons so that they cannot see where the wealth of their country goes. Some act traitorously to our king and prejudicially to our mother. Some of the patriots knowing all these come forward to deliver public speeches to thwart the schemes of their enemies to gratify the wishes of their mother, to rouse a patriotic feeling and encourage loyalty. Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu is one of these; he is a great patriot and a loyal citizen. He has served his mother. Whose duty is it to see to the happiness of the mother? So wake up. Many should now come forward to agitate constitutionally with loyalty and patriotism.

SIRTIRUTTAM, Madura, 8th Jan. 1919.

Vēdavritti mānyams.

64. A correspondent to the Sirtiruttam, of the 8th January, points out that the Brahmans, to whom these mānyams were originally granted for the purpose of promoting a knowledge of the Vedas, have neglected their functions and even mortgaged or otherwise conveyed some of these and that the Government do not care to see that the manyamdars are properly discharging the duties for which these manyams were granted and suggests that the Government should issue a circular to the Tahsildars directing them to see that those mānyamdārs who are not versed in the Vedas take to a study of them, to issue a notice to such mānyamdārs that, if they do not do so within five years of the notice, their mānyams will be forfeited to Government and to report to Government the result of their action twice in the year.

Airships and the exodus of the Governors to the hills.

65. The Vartakamitran, of the 9th January, reproduces in Tamil an article from the Modern Review on this subject which contains the following observations among others:—As in the near future, ærial communication between India and England will be possible, and as mails can be carried from here to England in a less space of time than is required at present for their being carried from Bombay and Madras to Simla, it will be convenient to govern India direct from London. However, the statement of Mr. Goodley, the representative of New Zealand, that he would prefer his country being governed by a Nero on the spot to its being governed by an angelic board from London is of course against our suggestion. But his objection in a way applies to the 'tingods' who proceed to Simla, Darjeeling; Ootacamand and Mahabaleshwar.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 9th Jan. 1919.

Indian's help to England in the war.

66. Publishing in Tamil a summary of an article appearing in the London Times relating to the great help rendered by India during the recent war, the Vartakamitran, of the 9th January, remarks that it is evident from this that, if India had not rendered such help, this great war could not have ended victoriously.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 9th Jan. 1919.

India and self-determination.

67. Remarking that the word 'self-determination' implies the cutting off of all connexion with others, the Vartakamitran, of the 9th January, refers to the promises by Mr. Lloyd George and other statesmen, of granting liberty and the right of self-determination to the German colonies in Africa after the close of the war and observes:—We do not believe those promises will be kept; for it cannot be taken that all promises made by these in peril will be fulfilled by them when they are free. It is already known to the wise that self-determination will be denied to these colonies by the Allies on some plausible ground or other such as that they are incapable of governing themselves or that they prefer being governed by others like the English, the French, etc. So there is nothing strange in the British statesmen now contradicting their original statements or even in the Allies trying to divide the German colonies among themselves. The case of Ireland may be quoted as another instance of promises made at a critical moment not having been kept later when the danger was over. In the case of India, self-determination is quite indispensable. She has also been striving for it as hard as Ireland. Economic prosperity is impossible for a country, which lacks self-determination in matters of education, industries and trade. To expect these to be improved by the British traders and bureaucrats is an anomaly and this has been proved. For example, though efforts have been made for the last 50 years to make elementary education free and compulsory, nothing has yet been done in this matter. At the time of the war, the Government, just to satify the people, said that they themselves might, with the permission of the government, take steps in this direction, but that no pecuniary help could then be given by the Government. When funds were available, there was not the will and when there was the will, funds were wanting. Would there be so much delay in a country possessing self-determination? When any steps are taken here for the improvement of trade and industries, the question how they will affect England has to be taken into consideration. It is quite an untenable position for India. The condition of India is different from that of other countries. Though administration of India, as far as it pertains to the peace of the country, should continue under the supervision of England, education, industries and trade will not progress, unless India is granted self-determination in regard to them as also the necessary powers and funds.

The Vaisyamitran, of the 13th January, also refers to the statement of President Wilson that the greatest benefit derived from this war is the application of the principle of self-determination to all nations in the world and, remarking that the liberty obtained by a nation after attaining perfection in the several stages fixed for being granted responsible government, can never be considered an exercise of the right of self-determination, observes:—While the people of Mesopotamia and the German colonies in South Africa are to get freedom, are the Indians and their leaders less qualified than they to govern their country? The English statesmen should consider impartially whether the Indians have sacrificed their lives and wealth for securing democracy and freedom to countries which have lost their kings in the war, or for securing such right of self-determination in regard to the government of their own country as has been promised by President Wilson to other countries. It is not in the least justifiable to think that certain reforms granted by the bureaucrats at their pleasure will be sufficient for the Indians. The Indians should be permitted to determine the form of government that will suit them and to place it before the Peace Conference. If they cannot get even the right of electing their representatives to the Peace Conference, how can they acquire the privilege of self-determination? We trust that the words of the British statesmen that the war has been waged for securing freedom for the nations in the world will not go in vain. It is very necessary that Indian representatives should be sent to England to disabuse the mind of the British public of the wrong impressions created against the loyalty of the Indians and to apprise them of the actual condition of India under the guidance of the bureaucrats.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 13th Jan. 1919.

68. Remarking that the villages where the majority of the population live are at present being neglected, the Vartakamitran, of the 16th January, urges that the public should themselves seek the means of improving the villages instead of depending upon the authorities whose attention is directed more towards improving the economic condition of the Europeans than towards improving that of the Indians.

Improvement of villages.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 20th Jan. 1919.

A shooting incident at Poona.

69. Referring to an incident in Poona in which Lieutenant Stanley of the Military Accounts office is said to have shot at the driver of a hackney carriage for having demanded a high fare, the Vaisyamitran, of the 20th January, observes:—Doctor Nayar and other members of the non-Brahman party should note what has been the lot of the black man who is subject to the foreign rule. It is not known how those who do not require self-government, but would prefer a foreign rule, are going to account for the barbarous acts of the whites in shooting men like birds. Perhaps they may even justify the action of the Lieutenant. Let them realize at least hereafter that it is hard to put up with the cruelties of the foreigners until we are free from slavery and attain liberty and the right of self-determination.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

The Telegraph officials.

70. Referring to the order of the Government of India increasing the pay of these officials from January, the Lokopakari, of the 27th idem, observes:—As a majority of these employees are Eurasians, their pay has now been raised in order to relieve them from hardship on account of the high prices of foodstuffs. What about the Indians working in other departments?

DRAIVDAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

A provincial board of agriculture.

71. Adverting to the proposal of Sir Harcourt Butler to form a provincial agricultural board composed of officials and non-officials in the United Provinces, the Dravidan, of the 27th January, observes:—It appears that the object of this institution is to create a greater affinity between the Agricultural Department and the general public It has now become indispensable for this department and the Government to acquaint themselves with the views and grievances of the public who have vast experience in agricultural matters and take steps with due reference to the remedial measures suggested by them. We urge that similar reforms should be introduced in other provinces also.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

The real position.

72. Commenting on the speech of Mr. S. Kasturi Ranga Ayyangar about his visit to England and France, delivered at a public meeting held in the Gokhale Hall, the Andhraprakasika, of the 21st January, observes in its leader under this heading:— . . . We learn another fact from Mr. Ayyangar's lecture. He said that His Majesty George V, our Emperor was of opinion that the people of Madras were unfit to be soldiers. It is not known who created this notion in the Emperor's mind. Even admitting for the sake of argument that the people of Madras are wanting a little in manliness, we can say that it was the fault of Lord Roberts and not of the people. We remember that it was he who brought this charge. We have been connected with the army for generations. If the Madras sepoys had not fought with valour in the Bengal mutiny the situation would have been very dangerous. To say that the successors of the Madras Subedars who could uphold the British Flag by fighting with exemplary courage in the battles of Ava and Srirangapatam and elsewhere, are unfit to serve in the army is, we firmly believe, to call light darkness. When sepoys were treated worse than coolies, respectable persons refrained from joining the army. That is the reason why members of martial families are not seen in the army to-day. We venture to say that, given proper and respectable treatment, the Madras sepoys would make the best soldiers. We submit that the honour of Indian soldiers may, better, be kept up hereafter at least by duly encouraging the Madras sepoys.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

Co-operative Credit Societies.

73. Reviewing in its leader the Report of the Co-operative Credit Societies Department for 1917–18, the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd January, observes:— . . . Though co-operation and industries are closely related to each other, in India co-operation is not contributing so much to the improvement of industries. It is not so in the western countries. Many small industries therein are being successfully pursued through co-operative societies. . . The Provincial Bank should try to strengthen the mutual bond among the several central banks. Otherwise, those banks cannot have a permanent status. The report does not show any improvement in this respect. It is but proper that earnest attempts should be made in this direction hereafter at least. . . The co-operative movement has not yet so widely spread in the Andhra country. The Andhra leaders and Co-operative department will do well to work earnestly in the matter. On the whole, Indians are forward in this field, which is most eloquent testimony of their fitness for self-government.

74. With reference to the contradiction of the Pioneer of the message published by the Associated Press that the Government would grant passports to fifteen persons who proceed to England on behalf of the Congress, the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd January, remarks:—. . . It is not just that Indians should not be given an opportunity to represent their views freely to the English public, even after the war has come to an end.

Passports.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

75. Referring ta the declaration of Irish Independence by the Sinn Fein Constituent Assembly, the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd January, says:—. . . We pray that the British authorities may soon be blessed with the ability and farsightedness which are required for a satisfactory solution of the Irish problem so that internal trouble may be prevented while the Peace conference is going on

A Parliament in Dublin.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

76. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 24th January, observes:—. . . The reasons given by the Director of Agriculture and the Principal of the Madras Veterinary College why the thirteenth Ongole cattle-show was not popular are not worth believing. . . In these circumstances, that Mr. Stuart should think that the export of good breed of cattle and the consequent loss to the country could not be a cause for the failure of the show, cannot but appear strange. . . Since notices giving the dates of the show and the details of prizes were circulated along with the District Gazette of the 17th January, there is no reasen to suppose that information about the show did not reach the ryots in time. . . An examination of the circumstances will make it clear that the show is detrimental to the growth of cattle in the country. . . We suggest that the cattle-show committee should meet soon and discontinue the show, if they think that such shows do more harm than good to the country.

The Ongole cattle-show: should it be held in future?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

77. Referring to the resolutions of the Delhi Congress, the Andhrapatrika, of the 24th January, writes:—. . . Since the recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission will shortly be passed into law, it will be seen how necessary it is to have the departments of Law, Justice and Police in the hands of the people. . . The Congress Committees and the Home Rule Leagues should bestir themselves now and educate the people on the Congress resolutions. . . If Indians have faith in the uprightness of their cause and dedicate themselves to the attainment of its triumph, all obstacles will soon disappear, and they will be able to reach the goal easily.

The Congress resolutions.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

78. With reference to the Village Officers' Act Amendment Bill, a correspondent to the Avdhrapatrika, of the 24th January, writes:—. . . The hereditary right of village officers should be completely rooted out and their appointments should be made by the people by election. But to give the Tahsildars the power of appointing them is unjust and will be detrimental to the progress of the village. If this power is given to the people, their lives will be happy.

Village offices.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

79. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th January, observes:—. . . The problem of self-determination should be solved now. The International League cannot be of any use, unless self-government is granted to all nations and dependence is driven out of the world. . . The problems of India and Egypt should be solved at once. The Peace problems are not ordinary. But if the Allies rely on Dharma and follow just methods for the sake of the well-being of the world, the Peace conference will be a success. We wish for a speedy attainment of this object.

The peace problems.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

Administration in Goa.

80. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st January, writes:— Speaking on self-government Indian Political Reformers are apt to refer, for example, to the governments of such countries as the Philippine Islands. They do not seem to have thought about the Government in Goa which is at hand. The Amritra Bazaar Patrika has been able to gather some new facts from some inhabitants of Goa. It seems that the Goa people enjoy greater rights than the subjects of the British or the French-India. . . A citizen of Goa can become the Governor of Goa. and two have been Governors. . . Though the Goa people lag behind their brethren in British India in point of education, they are forward in the matter of bearing administrative responsibility. Those who think that danger will result, if Indians are granted self-government will be silenced, if they look at the condition of Goa a little.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

Public roads.

81. Referring to the grants of money to District Boards by the Government for the improvement of Local Fund roads, the Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd January, observes:— . . . It takes years for Local Fund engineers to repair the roads in their charge. We believe that lack of proper powers and freedom in the hands of our taluk and district boards, municipalities and unions is responsible for this miserable state of affairs. . . We regret very much to have to say that the Government cannot yet fully understand that our local boards, with leisure too scanty to carry on their correspondence with Collectors, District Medical Officers, Educational authorities, Sanitary department and the Government, are not in a position to do anything . . . We request the district boards to spend wisely the money granted to them by the Government for the improvement of public roads, by carefully checking and supervising the work done by their subordinate officers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

Village officers' conferences.

82. Referring to the Kistna District Village Officers' Conference held at Gudivada to protest against the amendments proposed by the Government to the existing law about village offices, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th January, says:—. . . Both the President of the Conference and the Chairman of the Reception Committee explained that the newly proposed amendments would not only interfere with the hereditary right attached to these offices, but would also disturb the village life by affording room to subordinate officers for the exercise of arbitrary power. . . We request the Government to note the public opinion on the enhancement of water-rate and on the Village Officers' Act Amendment Bill which are now strongly agitating the Andhras and to withdraw both of them.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 25th Jan. 1919.

Preparations for self-government.

if the disadvantages under which the Panchamas suffer, including the punishment of stocks, have not been removed, it is not the Brahman nor the non-Brahman representatives but the Government that must be held responsible for it and blamed. If social legislation has not been passed, it is the fault of non-Brahmans in not having introduced such Bills. To work and get rebukes in return for it, falls to the lot of the Brahman representatives. Be it as it may, what were the objects with which the non-Brahman movement was started on the eve of Mr. Montagu's visit? . . Each community like Panchamas, goldsmiths, etc., then asked for separate representation. But the leaders of the non-Brahman movement as well as the Madras Government which is backing them up from behind now require that the number of representatives of Brahmans should be first fixed, and then that of the non-Brahmans embracing Kammas, Kapus, Velamas, Reddis, etc, in a single community. One of their leaders, Mr. Tulsiram, writes from Madura that barbers and washermen should be excluded from the non-Brahman community and included in the Panchamas. When have all these various sects met, given up the separate representation they originally wanted, defined that they are all one community, and resolved that they are part and parcel of the non-Brahman community? If three or four self-constituted leaders agree to such an arrangement, does it mean that they carry with them the approval of the people . . The number of non-Brahmans among the non-official members of our taluk and district boards is already greater. . . On the whole, of the 3,204 voters in the Presidency 1,025, i.e., less than one-third are Brahmans. . . For the development of democratic government, therefore, popular representatives will have to be responsible to the whole body of the people. . . Any arrangement which is opposed to this principle is against reason, against worldly experience and against democratic ideals.

84. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th January, observes:— . . . Writing on 'the Rowlatt Bills,' the Indian Social Reformer says that the accumulation of all penal powers in the hands of one Government must be looked upon as bad as the multiplication of excessive armaments in any particular country. The popular mind is being agitated by the scheme of reforms on one side and by the 'Rowlatt' Bills on the other. It is the duty of the educated classes to see that the reforms are not rendered futile by the 'Rowlatt Bills'. There is no doubt that fearless expression of public opinion without mincing matters is an important means of achieving this object. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

Reforms: some strange views.

85. In the course of an appeal for the formation of the Andhra Ryots' Association, two correspondents to the Andhrapatrika, of the 24th January, remark:— . . . The Government have introduced the irrigation system, after considering well that rain water could not be a reliable source of supply and that sure and steady supply of water could be had by building anicuts across rivers. Instead of famines disappearing as a result of this arrangement made by the Government, circumstances have arisen which have made famine a permanent feature in our country, as has been shown by our revered leaders like the late Mr. Dadabhoi Naoroji and Mr. Gokhale. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

The agricultural movement.

86. Under this heading, the Kistnapatrika, of the 25th January, says:— Though the evidence given by our leaders before the Reform Committees at Madras was taken down in camera, we give below some details which have reached our ears by hearsay.

The Reforms Committees: questions and answers.

The Patrika then gives some details of the evidence taken from certain individuals.

87. With reference to the entertainment given to Mr. Srinivasa Raghava Achari, the Sarishtadar of the District Court, Masulipatam, in honour of the title of Rao Sahib accorded to him by the Government, a correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 25th January, writes:—. . . A doubt having arisen in our minds as to what Mr. Achari has done to deserve the title, we have naturally fallen into discussion, forgetting the real business at hand. There have been many demands on the country due to such causes as famine, pressure of war, recruitment and the war fund. But Mr. Achari does not seem to have fallen into the sin of showing any concern in any of them. He is a stranger to the people and the people are strangers to him. We asked within ourselves: how has he then got the title? The District Judge was not generally in the habit of going to camp without him. He is very fond of touring and does more touring than other District Judges. Perhaps, Mr. Achari used to see that there was nothing wanting in these camps for the District Judge, and was useful to him in court in all ways. We thought that the District Judge, very well pleased with him, might have recommended him to the Government. . .

An entertainment.

HITAKARNI, Ellore, 12th Jan. 1919.

Conflict.

88. In its leader under this heading, the Hitakarini, of the 12th January, writes:—There is now a conflict between hope and despair in the political world. . . The hopes of the Indians are blighted. Self-exertion is their only resort. . . As the conflict progresses, the flame of unrest will spring up, and this is not safe to the people nor to the Government.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore 24th Jan. 1919.

Excess profits tax.

89. Referring to the objection raised by the Indian Merchants' Association to the excess profits tax that the unsettled condition of the market, on account of the termination of the war, is likely to mar the war profits of a very large number of merchants, and to the suggestion that the Government may, instead, increase the import duty from 7½ per cent to 10 per cent, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 24th January, remarks:—The suggestion is by no means novel; but, do the mill-owners, particularly the owners of jute mills who have earned 250 to 300 per cent profits during the war also object to the tax? The Home Government have not refrained from imposing a tax on excess profits. If the Government should increase its financial resource by enhancing the duty on goods imported from Europe and at the same time encourage indigenous industries, we shall by no means object to such a policy. But if England should object to the enhancement of duty by the Government of India on their manufactured goods sent to this country and if at the same time the mill-owners and others who have earned enormous profits during the war should also object to the taxation of those profits, would it not be an injustice if, after all, the Government should order that the ryot, who may be likened to the village oil-monger who has hardly enough to eat, should supply the oil required for working the machinery of Government?

MALAYALI, Quilon, 25th Jan. 1919.

The conference of Ruling Princes and the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme.

90. Referring to the conference of Ruling Princes recently held at Delhi for considering the recommendations in the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme in respect of the Native States, the Malayali, of the 25th January, remarks:—'That Maharajas of States in alliance with His Majesty should assemble annualy in Council at Delhi under the permanent persidentship of the Viceroy and that the Viceroy should have full freedom to decide questions of succession and to deprive the Ruler of a State of his rulership—these will never be acceptable. If the British Government do not endeavour to introduce such reforms as will enable the subjects of Native States to determine their own affairs, to introduce the reforms in such a manner as not to allow even a particle of their present powers to be lost to the Ruling Princes, and in view of the love and concern for the Empire recently manifested by these Ruling Princes, to remove all the disabilities and embarrassments that lie hidden in old treaties and usages and to enhance their powers—if these things are not done, in our opinion, the future of Native States will not be bright.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 14th Jan. 1919.

Food grains.

91. The Manorama, of the 14th January, again urges the necessity of prohibiting the transport of rice from Malabar to the Cochin State or to any district outside Malabar and suggests that this is the first thing to be done to solve the problem of food shortage and high prices.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 21st Jan. 1919.

Vaccination.

92. Referring to the Vaccination Report for 1917–18 and the increased mortality under small-pox during the year in the Presidency, the Manorama, of 21st January, observes that at least 25 per cent may be added to the number of deaths recorded, to arrive at the real figure, because village officials do not report cases of small-pox if they can help it, and they report only about 50 per cent of the actual cases. Regarding the failure of vaccination, the article refers to the opinion of people in Malabar that the lymph supplied from the King's Institute is not so effective as the locally-prepared lymph, which was in use in Malabar before the present system was introduced.

Mr. F. B. Evans, M.A., I.C.S.

93. In a long article under the heading "Mr. F. B. Evans, M.A., I.C.S.," the Malayala Manorama, of the 28th January, says:— Mr. Evans is a very able man who, even before he was appointed as Collector of Malabar, had served in the district in various capacities and had acquired a thorough knowledge of the actual conditions of Malabar and its people. . . His administration was not only blameless in all respects, but also reflects special credit on him in some of its features. The Collectors of Malabar generally fall under two classes, the peoples' Collector, intensely solicitous about the welfare of the people irrespective of opinions held by Government, and the Government's man who pledges himself to give satisfaction to Government not minding the people very much. Mr. Dance and Mr. Pinhey may be quoted as examples. Each of these two classes may be subdivided again into two—able officers and inefficient. Mr. Evans is an able officer who combined solicitude for the welfare of the people with the execution of the will of the Government. There may have been a still different class of Collectors who did not care very much either to please the people or to please the Government but wanted only to assert their own authority. Mr. Evans had a special ability to direct the administration along paths of public welfare without prejudicing his own authority. The remaining portion of the long article refers to the tact shown by him in dealing with the food problem, the stimulus he gave to local self-government, the attention given to the inter-relation of janmis and tenants and his mastery of the way of moving with Indians of varying status from the Prince to the coolie, in which matter his knowledge of Malayalam helped him considerably. In short, within recent times Malabar has not had such an able Collector.

MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, 28th Jan. 1919.

The worship of liquor by westerners.

94. The Malayala Manorama, of the 25th January, points out that in the wake of Christian Missionaries carrying a humanising influence to barbarous races European merchants follow with intoxicating liquor. The harm done to the world in this way—even by Englishmen—is incalculable. Reference is made to the accusation brought by a Scottish Priest against his own nation, that they have destroyed the native peoples throughout the Empire by the introduction of the drinking habit among them. After noticing the great change that has now come over the westeners' devotion to drink and the action taken by Russia, France and America in respect of prohibition, the article concludes with the remark that if drink could be prohibited in Europe and America it can certainly be prohibited in our country also, and that if the Government of India, out of consideration for the welfare of the Chinese and by the pressure of English Missionaries, could give up opium trade with China worth twelve crores of rupees per annum, the Government should similarly be prepared to bear the loss that will result from the prohibition of liquor trade in India.

MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, 25th Jan. 1919.

An appeal for a crore of rupees to help Indians whose relatives have fallen in the war.

95. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 23rd January, in a leader on the marginally-noted subject, writes:—Although India has borne its share in the war according to its means, and already subscribed generously to the various funds. In view of the fact that the necessaries of life in India are fast getting beyond the reach of the poor and the middle class, the appeal is inopportune. At the same time, they cannot well ignore an appeal to assist the families of the wounded and killed. Response is indeed incumbent upon, and is a sacred duty of our compatriots.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

The Madras Mail and the Khalifate.

96. The Qaumi Report, of the 23rd January, criticises and endeavours to traverse the argument advanced in the leader on the Khalifate which appeared in the Madras Mail of the 22nd January.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

III.—Legislation.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

97. The Swadesamitran, of the 21st January, observes:—

The Rowlatt Bills.

The object of these Bills is to perpetuate the special powers granted to the Government by the Defence of India Act, which will cease to be in force six months after the end of the war. With the existing constitution of the Imperial Legislative Council, there will be nothing to prevent any Bill approved by the Government being passed into law. Public opinion is sought only as a matter of formality. So we are afraid that, unless there is some miracle, the important provisions of these Bills will soon become law. Coming to the provisions, we shall take the amendments in the Penal Code first. One amendment renders even the possession of a seditious document an offence. If a person in this country receives a seditious letter or book from the enemies of the King in foreign countries and is found in possession of it, or if such is received by his people and kept in his house, he becomes guilty. Another curious amendment is that any document containing matter likely to intimidate an official is also a seditious document. Let us suppose that one is provoked with a petty official and writes a letter to a friend to punish this official, one who is in possession of this letter becomes guilty. This provision will make it impossible to criticise any class of officials and the liberty of criticising any system of administration will therefore exist only in name. Evidence of previous conviction can now be let in only to determine the punishment after the offence against one is proved. But the present Bills permit the letting in of such evidence even to prove the guilt of an accused person. It is against all principles of British justice to let in any evidence that is likely to prejudice the mind of the judge against an accused, before the guilt of the latter is proved. But anything is perhaps proper in India! The amendments in the Criminal Procedure Code are still more curious. They take away even an existing power of the High Court and we do not see why. They also empower the judges trying a case to direct that any particular witness should be heard in comera. This may set a premium upon all those who are prepared to give false evidence.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 24th January, wonders whether the introduction of these Bills indicates the end of the Kaliyuga and, remarking that even a law passed for hunting animals cannot be so mean as these Bills, observes:—Is there such a law in any other part of the world? Is it in existence in Ireland, the birth place of sedition, or in England where charges are often brought against Government officials? No. We do not know what sin we have committed that such barbarous laws should be introduced in India, where truth and virtue reign supreme. Even an idiot will laugh at the principle enunciated in these Bills that the mere possession of a seditious document will render one liable to imprisonment for two years. One may scribble a few ideas about a Government official by way of pastime and may have no idea whatever of publishing it. All the same he will become a victim to this cruel law, which is incompatible with British principles. Alas! What offence has India committed to merit this law? Perhaps this is the reward for her having poured in her wealth and blood in this war, without expecting any return, or for her having helped England in various ways for the last 150 years! It was Sir James Stephen, who introduced section 124-A in the Indian Penal Code. But it contained a clear provision that one could be punished under this section only if there was an overt act committed. In 1898, this provision was cancelled and the mere publication of seditious matter was rendered punishable. Now in 1919, when the sun of liberty has dawned, a law is introduced rendering even possession of such matter punishable. The rising of the sun of liberty in the western countries synchronises with the introduction of an unjust and slavish law in India! As the Police cannot divine the possession of a seditious document by one, this law will surely lead to their searching all places they suspect. How can there be any protection for the property or rights of man then? We are afraid that this law may nullify the promise of Queen Victoria that, under her rule, no harm will be done to the property or rights of man. As civilisation advances, it looks as if India will be having new laws at every stage. Next year, a section 124-C may be introduced declaring even the harbouring of seditious ideas to be punishable. A new instrument may perhaps be inverted to find out the ideas of the people and used by the Police for the purpose! We heartily agree with the Amrita Bazaar Patrika when it expresses the fear whether, if these Bills are passed into law, the Police may not, to acquire fame and to convince the authorities that sedition exists in the country, throw some seditious documents in the house of an innocent man and accuse him later of sedition. This will only convert good men into bad men and loyal people into seditionists, leading eventually to unrest and chaos. This will be the only result of these Bills. A Government exercising autocratic powers may pass any laws they want. But, if they transgress the rules of truth and justice, they will surely reap the fruits of it. We give this warning to the Government of India.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 24th January, reverts to this subject and says:— The stringent provisions in the Bills are based on the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee Report, which is in turn based on the evidence of the Police. The report itself says that it is only a small community in Bombay that are connected with conspiracies in India and that such conspiracies have become rooted only in Bengal. Even in Bengal, according to a recent statement made at a meeting of the Legislative Council there, the Government need be anxious only about 226 detinues. Should permanent changes be introduced in the laws safeguarding the birthrights of the people throughout the country, for the sake of these 226 men? Even the Rowlatt Committee did not make their recommendations with reference to these men. Their proposals were intended only as the basis for the drafting of a new law in place of the Defence of India Act, if such is necessitated by the way in which the war comes to an end. Though the war has come to an end, has the nature of its termination necessitated the drafting of a new law? The conspirators might have thought it easy to do an injury to the Government during the period of the war seeing that the attention of the latter was directed to many points. But can they have such an idea now that the war has ended in a permanent victory to the British and the Allies? The exitement among the Muslims is attributed by the committee mainly to the instigation of foreign countries. Now that Turkey and other countries have surrendered helplessly, how can there be any room for trouble hereafter? No Mussalman kingdom lying between Turkey and India will ever be in a position to incite the Indian Muslims against the British Government. Then again the 'League of Nations' to be formed by the Peace Conference will prevent all war hereafter. All the conspirators being educated men, as described by the Rowlatt Committee, should be fully aware of these things and they will not make any vain attempts hereafter. The Government have released many of the detinues only on the conviction that there is no danger in their release. It is only an imaginary fear that the others can disturb this Government or the public peace. This cannot be a justification for an attempt to alter legal processes which had lustre to the English rule. It can, under no circumstances, be reasonable to alter the Penal and Procedure Codes and the Law of Evidence in such a manner as to make the people tremble at the sight of even an ordinary official. Will the excellent doctrines accepted by British statesmen and the high principles laid down by President Wilson after all lead India to this pass? Is this the time to deprive the people of their natural rights as subjects?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Remarking that obedience to uncivilized laws is tantamount to murdering righteousness and justice and pointing to the end of the despotic kings in Russia and Germany, who "oppressed their subjects by means of uncivilized laws," as proof of the fact that the wrath of the subjects does not go in vain, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th January, observes that it is only those that try to get rid of uncivilized laws, even suffering many hardships therefor, that can be called men and, calling upon all those who have the privilege of being called British subjects to come forward to frustrate any attempt of the bureaucrats to enact uncivilized laws, which are against British spirit and justice, declares that he who tries to do away with a law that oppresses crores of people should be worshipped as god. The same paper reproduces in Tamil the letter of Mr. C. Rajagopala Achariyar of Salem to the press on these Bills and adds:—We agree with the suggestions made in this letter. The introduction of these Bills is against law and justice. Leading lawyers in England should be consulted as to whether the Imperial Executive Council have the power of passing these Bills, inasmuch as the Rowlatt Committee themselves have expressed their doubts about it. Our question is how this Council, consisting of bureaucrats, can have the power of passing a law which aims at forfeiting the birthright of man. We take it that these Bills are to be passed only after the consent of the Secretary of State for India has been obtained. We cannot see how the latter agreed to their introduction. Our opinion is that they are against the rule laid down by Parliament. So what we should do now is to shake off our lethargy, set aside our differences and condemn these Bills throughout the country. Some are trying to fetter mother India who is already suffering much and who can be said to be in prison now. Is it fair on our part to see her fettered? In no land has the birthright of man been forfeited. Now, in India, the rights and property of man are endangered. As a result of the British having governed India for 150 years and as a sequel to the announcement of the 20th August 1917, we have these Bills! So they should not be passed into law. Wake up and relieve the distress of mother India, who seeks your help.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 25th January, reverts to this subject and observes:—The Indian Penal Code is one of the fundamental laws of the English administration in India protecting the rights of man. The bureaucrats, afraid of the political efforts of the people, began to curtail its glory twenty years back and to widen the scope of the section dealing with the offence of sedition. This process has been going on and they are now trying to strengthen the law of sedition. For this purpose, they propose to embody in the present Bills a provision from the Defence of India Act about the possession of a seditious document. But in doing so they omit the reservation in the Act that the possession should be coupled with the intention of publishing it, thereby making a law intended for the ordinary times more stringent than one intended for a period of war. Similarly an amendment in the Criminal Procedure Code exceeds even the recommendation of the Rowlatt Committee. The committee was of opinion that there was no harm in slightly amending section 343 of the code so as to render innocuous the making of a promise to an accused, by the Police or other officials, of protection from affliction by others and their argument was that, as it was their duty to protect people, there could be nothing wrong in their promising to discharge that duty. The framers of the Bills have gone a step further and worded this amendment in such a way as to make it innocuous even to offer any other promise which will be helpful to that mentioned above. These words are capable of any interpretation. A law of this kind, empowering the offering of any promise to an accused so as to induce him to confess his guilt and also betray others, does not seem to exist in any other country. The provision in the Bills permitting the lotting in of evidence of even the association of an accused with one convicted of sedition also exceeds the recommendation of the Rowlatt Committee. The result of this provision will be, to take a concrete example, that the court trying an accused under the new law can presume his guilt if evidence is let in to prove that he was associating with Mr. Tilak, who was convicted for sedition. Thus this law will make it impossible for any one to associate with another, if the latter had been punished for sedition, whether he committed the offence or not and however much he may deserve the love of the people. The British rule is said to be conducted on a legal basis. But the provisions of the new Bills are incompatible with this very basis.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 27th January, refers to the frequent mention of the names of Messrs. Tilak, Pal and Swami Vivekananda in the Rowlatt Committee Report, which forms the basis for the present Bills, and remarks:—The committee did not hear Messrs. Tilak and Pal, whom they consider to be agitators, to know the nature of the agitation that was carried on India. It is clear that, though the members of the committee were able lawyers, they had not sufficient experience in inquiring about such matters. We cannot again understand what logical connexion there is between the religious teachings of Swamis Ramakrishna Paramahamsa and Vivekananda and the seditious movement in Bengal, as pointed in the report. When Europeans and Americans deem the sayings of Swami Vivekananda to be divine ones, how can the Indian members of the committee, who are his own countrymen, be ignorant of his greatness? All these things only go to show that the committee took the words of the police to be gospel. The report does not contain any reply to the question how the members concluded that the religious teachings of Vivekananda, which were intended to wean the wicked from their ways, would incite to sedition. The present Bills, based on this report, aim only at tightening the bondage of the Indians, who are already suffering by repressive laws.

The same paper observes that it will not do to merely condemn the Bills in papers and, in making an appeal to the people to raise a constitutional agitation against the proposed legislation, even when it is in the form of a Bill and when there are papers and workers enough to carry on the agitation, remarks:—If we are careless now, the Bills will be passed into law and begin to oppress us and it will not be wise to agitate then. Oppressive laws are introduced only to intimidate and suppress those carrying on a constitutional agitation. Past experience in the case of the Press Act shows that there is every likelihood of these Bills becoming law, as the popular leaders are in the minority in the Imperial Legislative Council. It was because Mr. Gokhale and others believed in the assurances given by some officials at the time the Press Act was passed, which have since come to nothing, and refrained from agitating against it that this Act is now in force striking at liberty. At that time, the nationalists were kept down by the moderates and those who could agitate were sent into custody. But now nationalists are found everywhere and there are sufficient facilities to do away with the Rowlatt Bills. So protest meetings should be held everywhere and the resolutions communicated to the Secretary of State for India, the Prime Minister and the President of the Peace Conference. If this does not avail, we should resort to passive resistance. If these Bills are passed, nationalist papers cannot exist. It is these that are wanted now. If these papers and patriots become victims to this law, we cannot acquire Home Rule. So raise a mighty agitation against the Bills.

Remarking that, though India is a part of the British Empire, the Indians are not enjoying the rights of the British subjects and attributing this to the executive officials in India, the Lokopakari, of the 27th January, says that, in spite of India having been under the British Empire for 150 years, the authorities in India have been saying that the Indians are not yet capable of exercising the privileges of British subjects and passing barbarous laws like the Press Act, the Seditious Meetings Act, etc., to keep down the Indians and adds:—The last of this series of Acts was the Defence of India Act, the rigorus application of which is too well known. As a result of this Act, many papers and printing presses have ceased to be and many patriots have been suppressed. It is this horrible law that the present Bills are intended to replace. According to these Bills, even ordinary offenders may come to be regarded as seditionists and punished therefor and their condition, after release from prison, will be worse than that of people convicted for theft or robbery. When the thirst for liberty is spreading throughout the world as a result of the war and when the aim of the British Empire has been declared to be the grant of Home Rule to the Indians, it is not sound statesmanship to introduce laws which tend to oppress the people here. History shows that the more the oppression the greater will be the unrest in a country. If the people are always distrusted and repressive laws introduced to curb them, it will only create a mutual hatred between them and the Government. If the authorities in India realize that the Government exists for the people and vice versa, they will never think of introducing such laws as these.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Swadesamitran, of the 23rd January, and the Lokopakari, of the 27th idem, reproduce in Tamil the comments of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika and the Punjabi, respectively, about these Bills.

The Sedition Bills: who has power to pass them into law?

98. Adverting to the letter of Mr. C. Rajagopala Achariyar of Salem urging the necessity of collecting expert legal opinion as to the power of the Imperial Legislative Council to pass the newly proposed Criminal Law Amendment Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th January, writes:—The letter of Mr. C. Rajagopala Achariyar about these bills, which was published in the Hindu makes new suggestions. The people will do well to give immediate effect to those suggestions. . . The opinions of lawyers like Doctor Sir Rash Bihari Ghosh and Mr. B. Chakrabarty should be ascertained first. Expert legal opinion in England also should be at once consulted. Proper action should be taken in English Law courts and in the Parliament. The members of Parliament should be convinced that this matter should be considered by the Parliament alone along with the Scheme of Reforms. A lawyer should be sent to the Viceregal Council to urge before it how it is not empowered to pass these bills. There is no doubt that Mr. Achariyar's suggestions are very important. The new bills are no ordinary bills. They are opposed to the fundamental principles of law. They upset personal freedom. They would violate the birth-rights of man defined in the permanent statute book of the Parliament. In these circumstances, it is of paramount importance to examine whether the Viceroy's Council has power to legislate in contravention of Parliamentary enactments and legal procedure. It has been till now an important principle of criminal law that the accused should be presumed to be innocent till his guilt is established. . . But this time-honoured principle is reversed by these new bills. . . Instead of the prosecutor proving the guilt of the accused, the accused himself will have to prove his innocence. Such a provision is opposed to the traditions of law. The bills contain many provisions like this which interfere with personal freedom. . . It is the duty of Indians to try in all possible constitutional ways to prevent these bills from being passed into law and thereby to uphold the honour of British law.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Jan. 1919.

The Sedition Bills.

Referring to the Criminal Law Amendment Bill and the Emergent Criminal Powers Bill published by the Government of India, the Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd January, observes:— . . . The disapproval of these Bills by the moderates is to be found nowhere in their manifesto or in the resolutions passed at their conference. On the other hand, they say that repression will increase in case the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme is not accepted. . . The Anglo-Indian journals are sure to find additional support for the passing of these Bills in the news cabled by Reuter and received to-day, that Russian Bolsheviks are making arrangements to send their representatives to China and India with necessary funds to spread the revolutionary movement in those countries. Germany has not been able to shake the loyalty of Indians in the least, and nobody can think that the attempts of Bolsheviks will meet with greater success. . . Be it as it may, it is by granting soon self-government to India that peace and permanent good can be promoted. The adoption of repressive measures by the Government will only increase unrest among the people and will have no other useful effect. The people should now express their disapproval of these Bills in every village and communicate it to the Government. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 23rd Jan 1919.

Sedition Bills.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 23rd January, publishes in Telugu an extract from the Punjabee regarding the Sedition Bills, which contains:—. . . We request that no criminal should be punished, whatever be his offence, unless it is established in the ordinary courts of law. No Government which calls itself civilised can approve of such Bills as have now been published.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

The Village Officers' Act Amendment Bill.

99. Adverting to the prolongation of the period during which public representations on the Village Officers Act Amendment Bill will be received, the Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd January, remarks:—Meetings in the Guntūr and the Kistna districts declare its evils . . . May not this Bill become law, on account of the determination of the people of Madras! May the Government respect public opinion!

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

100. Referring to the constitution of the Select Committees in connexion with the Sedition Bills which will be introduced at the session of the Imperial Legislative Council commencing from the 6th February, the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th January, remarks:—. . . It is worth noting that none of Messrs.

Jinnah, Sarma, Rangaswami Ayyangar and Kamini Kumar Chanda has been appointed to these committees. Be it as it may, it is sure and certain that the Council will pass these Bills. The people should boldly urge that the Viceroy's Council has no power to pass these Bills, and that the British Parliament alone is authorized to make such enactments, and they should at once represent to the English nation how these Bills are a menace to the established principles of law.

Prohibition of drinking.

101. Referring to the request of the Muhammadans in the Punjab that the British Government should prohibit drinking in this country as has been done in the United States, the Andhrapatrika, of the 28th January, says:—. . . The Government will deserve the everlasting gratitude of the people, if they boldly adopt the action of the United States Government in the matter, without caring for loss of revenue.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. Patel's Hindu Inter-marriage Bill.

102. In a leading article discussing the possible effect of the Hon'ble Mr. Patel's Bill on the future of Hindu society, the Swadesh-abhimani, of the 24th January, observes:—The Bill which the Hon'ble Mr. Patel has introduced for the benefit of a few will undoubtedly mean great trouble and inconvenience to by far the larger section of Hindu society. The Bill, instead of upholding the principle of self-determination only tramples it down. We shall not discuss at present the clever sophisms of the reformers who tell us that Hindu society being divided into too many small sects, the Bill will afford a wider scope for choice in marriage and that the Civil Marriage Act compels us to ignore our conscience inasmuch as it requires the parties to marriage to declare that they are not Hindus.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 24th Jan. 1919.

The Moslem Marriage Registration Bill.

103. Referring to three public meetings of Mussalmans held recently in Cochin, at which resolutions were passed in favour of adopting the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hassan's Moslem Marriages and Divorces Registration Bill, the Malabar Islam, of the 17th January, meets arguments raised against the Bill, viz., (i) that the Bill drags the Government into religious matters, (2) that the fee imposed by the Bill for registration of marriages is too high for the majority of the Mussalmans of this Presidency and (3) that the option allowed by the Bill destroys all its virtue. The article observes that the introduction of a register recognised by Government for the registration of marriages, which, however, are conducted purely in accordance with religion, is certainly not dragging the Government into religious matters, (2) the argument about the fee is quite lame as the fee is only Re. 1-4-0, and (3) that the option allowed is necessary as it is not wise to jump from current loose practice at once to compulsory registration, and that the advantages of the system to be introduced by the Act may make compulsion unnecessary.

MALABAR ISLAM, Cochin, 17th Jan. 1919.

IV.—NATIVE STATES.

Cochin Administration.

104. Reviewing the report on the Administration of the Cochin State for the year 1093 M.E. and referring to the satisfactoriness of the financial position of the State as indicated by the increased closing balance left at the end of the year in spite of increased expenditure, the Lokaprakasam, of the 20th January, observes that it is "a creditable record, indeed, for which Mr Bhore may rightly claim to be congratulated."

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, 20th Jan. 1919.

The Samudra Theeram, of the 16th January, expresses the same opinion.

SAMUDRA THEERAM, Trivandrum, 16th Jan. 1919.

Cochin Diwanship.

105. The Lokaprakasam, of the 20th January, reproduces an article from New India of 17th January, which protests against the idea of appointing a European Diwan for the Cochin State.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, 20th Jan. 1919.

The kind of Executive Council wanted for Travancore.

106. In the course of an article suggesting the desirability of establishing an Executive Council in Travancore, which will be responsible to the people and not to the Government, a correspondent of the Malayali, of the 18th January, remarks:—"If an Executive Council which is under the control of the

MALAYALI, Quilon, 18th Jan. 1919.

Government should be established in Travancore, the irregularities of British India will have free play here also. It will only be like disturbing a nest of hornets. It will only add to the power of Government to wrong the people. The people will derive no benefit from it.

Malayali, Quilon, 22nd Jan. 1919.

The much spoilt public servants of Travancore.

107. The Malayali, of the 22nd January, in its article on "Newspapers and highhandedness (of public servants)", expresses regret that signs are evident to show that fear as a motive for good conduct on the part of public servants, has altogether disappeared under the present administration and sounds the warning that overkindness to public servants is productive of much harm to the people.

Samadarsi, Trivandram, 25th Jan. 1919.

Adverting to the same subject, the Samadarsi, of the 25th January, remarks that it is only when the evil doings of public servants increase and pass beyond all bounds, that some of them come to the light. If the Government loses the rare opportunities thus afforded them to take disciplinary action on the evil doers, will not the latter embolden themselves to openly wrong the people? To speak quite openly, highhandedness and evil-doing have increased beyond measure amidst the present-day public servants of Travancore.

Malayala Manorama, Kottayam, 28th Jan. 1919.

The leading article in the Malayala Manorama of the 28th January, dealing with the same subject, points out that though the Government of Travancore and the High Court seem to have quietly passed over several cases of alleged corruption on the part of Judicial officers who were known to the people as corrupt, the Government seem to have taken very serious notice of mischievous allegation on some public servants much esteemed by the people. And most of these were Christians. The remaining portion of the article points out specific instances.

II.—Home Administration.

(d) Education.

1. The Hindu, of the 6th February, states:—"The Government order on the proposals of the Educational Conference held in Madras in March 1916, which appeared in these columns yesterday, should have caused surprise and keen dissatisfaction in the public mind. . . The reasons for delay adduced in the order would not stand a minute's scrutiny. It is stated that as some of the recommendations affected local bodies, a reference to the latter had become necessary in order to ascertain whether they were willing to bear their share of the increased burden. In the first place, we are by no means satisfied that the process of making this reference and obtaining replies should have taken such an unconscionably long time. In the second place, if the Government had been animated by the same zeal to remove certain disabilities under which education laboured as those who have been asking for them, then the question as to the means need not have deterred them from providing the necessary relief as early as possible. . . The absurdly long time given to the matter and the mouse which the mountain in labour has brought forth are illustrative of the obstacles which the most urgent reforms have to face under a system of Government which owes no responsibility to the people and whose power is not derived from them. . . All this circumlocution could well have taken place during the long incubatory period which has elapsed, and the dilatory procedure adopted proves how the impulse for progress has become almost deadened in the authorities. We now come to the really reactionary decisions of the Government. . . But we are astonished that at a time when the introduction of a scheme for free and compulsory primary education is long overdue, the Government should exhibit such unwillingness and timidity in approving of the proposal of the Conference and seek to save Provincial finance from the insignificant inroads made on it on behalf of a serious responsibility. . . We regard the attitude of Government in respect of the proposal to permit managers of secondary schools to incur an expenditure up to 10 per cent of the fee income for the purpose of granting scholarships to indigent pupils as thoroughly unjustifiable. . . Even such attenuated reforms are apparently too much for the Local Government to swallow, and we are faced with the spectacle of their rejecting proposals which by themselves were inadequate three years ago and are now absolutely insufficient and out of date".

The Government order on the Madras Educational Conference.

(k) General.

2. The following appears in the Hindu of the 1st February:—"'There was no revolutionary crime to speak of in other Provinces' except Bengal. In the face of the foregoing facts, admitted in an important public record, where is the necessity, we ask, for the proposed legislation, under the Rowlatt report, for all India? . . . In these circumstances it is inconceivable why the character of all India for loyalty and devotion to the throne should be smirched, and the country menaced and disgraced with an unconstitutional measure. . . Granting for the sake of argument that a special repressive law, similar to the law under the Indian Defence Act, is necessary, or rather desirable, for Bengal, why should the fair fame of provinces in which there has been and is, no revolutionary crime, be tarnished and made subject to the application of such a drastic, unconstitutional and menacing measure? . . . The marvel is that revolutionary crime is confined to one province. The surest method of creating such crime in other provinces is to make them subject to repressive measures, which unscrupulous officials would welcome and not hesitate to find reasons to apply, for no sufficient reason, to persons innocent of sedition, but who may be constitutional agitators and politicians."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

British Censorship on Indian papers.

3. New India, of the 3rd February, writes:—"India informs us that it has received a notification to the effect that it has been decided to relax the Censorship regulations which have hitherto been in force against some courageous Indian papers like the Bombay Chronicle, Patrika, the Hindu and ourselves. The un-British act of the Censor was a disgrace to the whole British people, for it was a dishonest and political move on his part, no doubt engineered by vested interests, to stifle the voice of real India, thus preventing it from making itself heard in the British Isles."

HINDU, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

In a leader on this subject, the Hindu, of the 4th February, remarks:—"It may be remembered that the journals which were subjected to this abuse of Censorship for political purposes were the Hindu, the Bombay Chronicle, the Amrita Bazar Patrika and New India, although, as our London correspondent points out, it was the fact of the non-delivery of the Hindu in England that gave occasion to the subject being brought to the notice of the Secretary of State. It is important to know under what circumstances the abovenamed journals were kept out of Great Britain, while Anglo-Indian papers, and Indian papers such as the Bengalee, the Leader, the Servant of India, and the Indian Social Reformer had free admittance. . . Our contemporary India states plainly enough that the prohibition was an unwarranted abuse of Censorship for political purposes. The expression 'Censorship' is not rightly used in this connexion. Particular articles or particular portions of the newspapers concerned were not cut out, but there was a wholesale stoppage of the papers for weeks and months together. There was no provision of law under which it was done, and the newspapers concerned were not given any notice of it. The prohibition was an absolutely highhanded and unscruplous exercise of arbitrary power."

HINDU, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The Hindu, of the 7th February, says:—"We cannot accept the accuracy of the statements contained in the reply given by Sir William Vincent in regard to the prohibition of Indian newspapers. . . We have no hesitation in saying that, whether the act of prohibition was by the Military or Civil authorities, it was an unwarranted abuse of power. The plea that the prohibition of the papers was in view of their exploitation by German authorities for their own purposes is a futile and absurd one. . . Even the Military authorities are not above the law, nor are they relieved from the obligation of discharging their duties in accordance with the dictates of justice and commonsense. It is one of the first duties of Government to see that its agents do not commit abuses of power in its name. Government of India have, in our view, failed in its duty in this respect."

HINDU, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

Mrs. Besant and the Hindu.

4. The following appears in the Hindu of the 5th February:—"That high authority Sir Valentine Chirol has explained away the significance of certain inter-racial incidents in this country as being due to a temporary aberration caused by the inconveniences of railway travel in a tropical climate. With so confirmed a traveller as Mrs. Besant the excuse loses much of its force, albeit it is difficult otherwise to account for the sub-acid note in her references to this journal which we find in yesterday's New India. With our remarks on centrifugal political activities, as instanced in the Madras Vakils' meetings, as a text, Mrs. Besant with more acerbity than point, implies that the offices of the Hindu have been employed to harbour gatherings of conspirators against accepted leaders. . . Loyalty to the President of the Congress for 1918 is one thing; loyalty to the Indian National Congress is entirely another. If we plead guilty to counsels which savoured occasionally of lése majesté in the former behalf, we are not put out of court if we deprecate centrifugal activities which might have the effect of discounting the decisions of the Congress. That in the present case Mrs. Besant happens to be against us rather than with us does not mitigate the force of our argument, which indeed we remember to have been urged by her with her usual eloquence more than once in dealing with schisms which had not her high sanction behind them. For the rest, her bitterness against a stiff-necked generation that refuses to maintain an attitude of constant genuflection, aggravated by the amenities of railway travel, may surely be received by the public with the tolerance that the circumstances justify."

In a leader under the heading 'Conspirators v. Leaders', Justice, of the 6th February, remarks:—"Generally, what passes between 'My dear Kasturiranga' and Mrs. Besant does not interest us. We knew not how and by what process, for instance, the Hindu that did not see to eye with the Adyar heroine a few years ago in connexion with a certain litigation suddenly became a follower or comrade-in-arms of Mrs. Besant in her new character as Home Rule agitator, champion-in-chief and authorised interpreter of political Brahmanism." JUSTICE, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar and the Madras Legislative Council.

5. In an 'In the line' note headed 'Well done!' New India, of the 5th February, says:—"The high-handed conduct of the President of the Local Legislative Council led the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar to leave the Chamber as a protest. We congratulate the Honourable Member whose example, we hope, will be taken to heart by his colleagues. The official world must be made to realise that non-official members are not going to put up with superior airs or autocratic conduct." NEW INDIA, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

Justice, of the 6th February, says:—"The budget session of the Legislative Council is usually a field day for the non-official members of it. Year after year they prove more exciting than the previous one, but the excitenent did not precede the presentation of the financial statement. This year, however, they went one better, thanks to the genius of the Hon'ble Mr. Narasimha Ayyar who, taking his cue from the Irish Nationalists of old in the House of Commons, moved for an adjournment of the House, at least for four hours, before the budget was introduced, and when he was ruled out of order he left the Council Chamber to demonstrate his 'protest,' but happily for the Government of Madras and the good government of the people of this Presidency, he did not 'demonstrate' for a long time but returned to the council after lunch. We congratulate him on his uncommon courage and good sense—courage in making the exhibition and good sense in returning to sanity without tarrying for long." JUSTICE, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

III.—LEGISLATION.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

6. The Commonweal, of the 31st January, observes:—"That the bureaucracy has no imagination is illustrated by its proposal to bring in two pieces of repressive legislation on the 9th February. We refer to the Rowlatt Bills, or what are properly called the Black Bills, which apart from their menacing nature to Indian freedom, seem to be subversive of even the elementary principles of jurisprudence. . . It is a pity that these Black measures should have been brought forward when the country is on the eve of a political advance, and responsible statesmen engaged in the task are anxious that their aims should be appreciated and their efforts strengthened. How can Indians enthusiastically support any scheme of reform when their elementary rights of liberty are thus threatened?" COMMONWEAL, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Hindu, of the 6th February, has the following:—"The motion of which notice has been given by Mr. Surendranath Bannerjee that the Rowlatt Bills be deferred till six weeks after the passing in Parliament of the Bill containing the Reform Scheme, is a direct negative to the proposal of the Government. . . If the Government should oppose the motion for postponement and defeat the same, by reason of the official majority, the only course which should commend itself to the non-official members is to withdraw from the Council. . . The impression in England will, in our opinion, be that the non-official members are men of self-respect, of manliness, and of such genuine patriotism as to fearlessly act upon their convictions. There can be no more pernicious piece of legislation in regard to the fundamental rights of citizenship than the Rowlatt Bills. They are unjust, uncalled for and inopportune. . . A Bill, however, which is passed by the Government into law in the absence of the whole body of non-official members loses all the moral weight due to a measure which is passed into law by a duly HINDU, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

constituted Legislative assembly. The withdrawal of the non-official members would also have a striking influence on the opinion of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain. A Bill passed into law under such circumstances would stand a sure chance of being vetoed. . . We hope the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council will rise to the occasion and act in accordance with the universal popular expectation."

KARNATAKA, Bangalore City, 5th Feb. 1919.

The food situation in Mysore State.

7. The Karnataka, of the 5th February, observes:—"It is, as we have so often said, an unmistakable testimony to the obsolete character of the system of administration now in vogue in Mysore that, with all the large changes in the offices for the direction and control of food-grains, in the rules for regulating the traffic and sale of food-grains, and also in the personnel of the Government, the situation continues to be one of great hardship to the mercantile and the general public. . . If measures of food control have succeeded in England and elsewhere, that was because the officers in charge of those measures were persons drawn from among business men. We in Mysore have copied those phrases and those forms without having men of that quality, and the result could not have been anything else than what it is now seen to be—Failure. Our officers are accustomed to live in a spilendid isolation of their own, far from the unattractive scenes of the bazaar and the common life; and it must be a novel and by no means agreeable experience to them to have to deal with what is, after all, the earthy and vulgar and prosaic side of domestic polities—namely, the question of foodstuffs."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

India and the Peace Conference.

8. Observing that it is clear from the words of President Wilson that the delegates to this Conference have gone to it only as the representatives of the people and not of the governments of the countries which have sent them, the Desabhaktan, of the 29th January, makes the following observations among others:—The members of the Conference may perhaps think that Lord Sinha and the Maharaja of Bikanir are there as the representatives of the Indians. The Indians have elected Mr. Tilak as their representative and sent to the British Government many telegrams to that effect, and they have all been discarded. It is to be regretted that, while other countries have sent only people's representatives to the Conference, India alone has not been permitted to do so. How is the Peace Conference to be apprised of this? Only two persons nominated by the Government have gone to the Conference as the representatives of the 35 crores of people in India. Alas! In what condition is India now? We would boldly declare that India has rendered greater assistance than other countries of the world in the cruel war that was recently raged. While so, what is the reason for the aspirations of India alone not being represented in the Conference? All impartial men will say that meet recompense has not yet been made to India for the help she has rendered in the war. We are afraid whether it will be declared in the Peace Conference that the British have done to India what all they should do by appointing an Indian as Under Secretary and by approving in a way the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals. But we have great faith in British justice and we hope the Britishers will not say so. The statement that the Government of India act in accordance with the wishes of the Indian public will indeed become manifest in the Peace Conference!

Desabhaktan, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

The future of Turkey.

9. Referring to the decision of the British Government, as reported by Reuter, to leave the case of Palestine, Mesopotamia and other countries to be settled by the League of Nations, the Swadesamitran, of the 30th January, observes:—This is clear proof that England does not covet to possess the territories of others. But it is the wish of the Mussalmans that the territories of Turkey should not be subjected to the control of non-Mussalmans. This the British are well aware of. The constitution of the League of Nations should be unobjectionable, if the future of these territories is to be decided by it. President Wilson has said that the League should have sufficient powers to do such acts as will create satisfaction to all the countries and the people of the world. If the League is so constituted, and this question left for its disposal, then we can hope that nothing unsatisfactory to the Mussalmans will be done in this matter.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

Turkey and the Mussalmans.

10. Referring to a telegraphic intimation about the future of Palastine and Mesopotamia, the Desabhaktan, of the 30th January, observes:—The Anglo-Indian papers state that these countries will not be restored to Turkey. The Mussalmans were under the impression that, if the matter was to be settled at the Peace Conference, it would be advantageous to them. They now feel sorry that their last ray of hope has gone since they come to know that it is the League of Nations that has to settle this matter. Who form this League? Is there any Mussalman or Indian representative in it? The Christian powers in Europe have seized every country of the Muslims, such as Morocco, Algeria and Tunis and there is room to think that the allied powers will attempt to retain for themselves Mesopotamia, Palestine and other territories and that the League of Nations will decide only in their favour. Are not the British Government aware of the fact that, according to the tenets of the Moslem religion, Mesopotamia, Hedjaz and other territories should be under the sway of the Sultan of Turkey? It is only to allude to this belief of the Moslems that the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the recent

Desabhaktan, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

Congress said that the poorest of the Moslems will not consent to make obeisance to a new Caliph even if all the great powers of the world should compel him to do so. We again urge that it is not desirable for the great powers to slight the religious sentiments of the Moslems. The sole object of our writing on this subject at length is that the Peace Conference and the League of Nations should so decide the question as not to give room for record being made in the world's history that all the Christian countries joined together and crushed the only remaining Moslem country.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

"Republic" in Ireland.

11. The Desabhaktan, of the 4th February, reproduces in Tamil from New India a message said to have been sent by some Irishmen to America on the formation of a "Republic" in Ireland.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

The Peace Conference and the German Colonies.

12. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st February, writes:—. . . It appears that Japan and Australia are both claiming the German Pacific Colonies and that the British Colonies are not in favour of the internationalisation or the disposal by self-determination of the German Colonies as proposed by President Wilson. . . It is self-evident that the opinions of these countries are not in accordance with the objects of the war. It is but proper that the Imperial Cabinet should accept the view of President Wilson. Desire for conquest will overlook the progress of the people concerned, will set at nought the principle of self-determination and will encourage ambition. It is only after considering all these aspects that President Wilson has advanced his theory. . . There is no doubt that Doctor Wilson's method of internationalizing the German Colonies is better than leaving them to the mercy of some despotic power. If every people is allowed to develop freely on its own lines in accordance with the principle of self-determination, many difficulties will disappear. Government by foreigners who call themselves guardians and trustees will not only create complications at some time or other but will violate the principle of self-determination. . . The objects of the war cannot be attained, unless all the Allies completely give up the spirit of self-aggrandisement and work for the establishment of peace, prosperity and freedom in the world.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

The peace conference.

Under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 30th January, writes:— . . . For the protection of the peace of the world, we think that the enactment of an International Labour law is also of the same paramount importance as the formation of the League of Nations.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Feb. 1919.

The German Colonies.

Referring to the question of the German Colonies, the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st February, remarks:—Proclaiming from the beginning that it was not for the acquisition of territory that Great Britain had entered the war, can it be anything other than self-contradiction to place the German Colonies now under the British Government? Some were very anxious that the British should also swallow Mesopotamia which has been set free from Turkish domination. All these attempts have been shown to be unjust at the Peace Conference. . . It has been resolved at the Peace Conference that none but the League of Nations to be formed shortly will have power to decide the fate of these Colonies. Already Newzealand and South Africa are chafing at this resolution. This is, forsooth, their love of freedom!

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 6th Feb. 1919.

The peace proposals.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 6th February, writes:—The state of affairs at the Peace Conference and the condition of things in the world go to show that eventually all nations are likely to resort to conscription and try to grind down one another. An uproar is being raised that which the Peace Conference is talking of its arrangements to protect the smaller nations of Europe, the bigger nations have begun to act in a highhanded manner.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The Peace Conference and the question on the League of Nations.

The Qaumi Report, of the 28th January, referring to President Wilson's speech at the Peace Conference in which he stated "we are not representatives of Governments, but representatives of peoples. It will not suffice to satisfy Governmental circles anywhere, it is necessary that we should satisfy the opinion of mankind", writes:—This is indeed a political point which, if observed, can bring about peace throughout the kingdoms of the world. Every question should be decided not from the Governmental point of view but from the people's angle of vision. The authorities or the leaders, who incur the displeasuse of the people in order to please the Government, or the Government which, in order to gain its own ends, frustrates the requirements of the people, are not true and independent ones.

In the same connexion President Wilson has mentioned another political principle that every nation in the world has the right of electing its own King and controlling its own destinies not as we wish but as it wishes.

If this is the principle of the Peace Conference the world may rest assured that the question of National Government will be disposed of freely, and in an straightforward manner. No nation will be forced to yield to another's desire, and it will be a political blunder to compel an independent nation to change its form of government according to the proposals of other nations.

We consider this principle will prove quite true with regard to the Turkish territories and we are sure that our British Government which possesses far more enlightened views than the United States of America in understanding political philosophy will take this point into consideration.

The resolution of the Peace Conference.

The Qaumi Report, of the 28th January, referring to the last resolution submitted at the Peace Conference "that a commission composed of two representatives each from the five Great Powers and five representatives, elected from other Powers, be appointed to inquire into, and report upon, the international requirements of ports, water-ways and railways, etc., observes:—It is evident that the last proposal is a very involved and perplexing one. It will be a difficult matter, should per chance persons, who have already given proofs of their shortsightedness, be nominated. Muhammadans requested their British Government not to place Constantinople, etc., under international Government and Mr. Balfour replied that this question would be decided at the Peace Conference. Now the question has been referred to the commission and the satisfaction of Muhammadans will depend on its report. Even now we should appeal to the sympathetic British Government.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

India and the arrangements of the Peace Conference.

13. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd February, writes:— . . . The Daily Mail understands that India may have the mandate for Mesopotamia and for a large portion of German East Africa as a field of emigration. Even supposing that this information is correct, India will not have much advantage. Before assuming the responsibility of administering other countries, Indians should enjoy self-government in their own country. The condition of Indians in German East Africa cannot admit of improvement, unless the Government of India becomes responsible to the people. It was for this reason that the proposal of Sir Theodore Morrison failed to rouse sufficient enthusiasm among the Indian people. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

II.—HOME ADMINISTRATION.

(b) Courts.

An Imperial Court of Appeal.

14. In an article urging the establishment of an Imperial Court of Appeal, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 30th January, writes:—At present, the decisions of the Privy Council are unsatisfactory. Even the points urged by the appellants are seldom taken into consideration. Althoug the British are a democratic race, instances come to the notice of the House of Lords and the Privy Council from time to time showing how the British authorities, blinded by passion, behave like Nabobs here and there. Unless they are properly curbed in the course of the appeals, they are apt to undermine British prestige. Further, European members of the Privy Council get £5,000 per annum, while Indian members get only £400. This comes to Rs. 50 per mensen for which even coolies would not go to England from here. It is easy to rouse caste and religious hatred by saying that the Brahmins are bad. The resigned nature of the Brahmins becomes evident when we see the sense of British justice revealed by the fact that the Europeans get £5,000 while the Indians get only £400. Let that pass. The European population of the Empire numbers only 90 millions in all and these people are urging the establishment of an Imperial Court of Appeal. If these get the privilege, the remaining 310 millions in the empire which consist of Indians will also get the privilege. If we understand how to fight for our rights, we should be able to get equal privileges for Indians.

(c) Jails.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Management of the jails.

15. Observing that the jails in India are not properly managed in spite of repeated references to this fact in the press and on the platform, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st February, remarks:—In 1914, the Government accepted a resolution brought on this subject in the Imperial Legislative Council and promised to appoint a committee to inquire into the administration of the jails. But the matter then stopped with mere promise. Now, the Punjabi states that the Government have resolved to appoint such a committee very soon. It is not known how far this is true. It is regrettable that the Government should delay this important matter as they like.

(d) Education.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

Education in the Madras Presidency.

16. The Desabhaktan, of the 28th January, observes:—It is rather unfortunate that the people of the Madras Presidency alone have not progressed in educational matters while the other provinces have effected many reforms in this connexion. The authorities here invariably oppose the proposals of the non-officials to adopt the system of compulsory education even to a small extent. It was stated in the last year's administration report of the Educational Department in this Presidency that, unless elementary education was made compulsory, no facilities could be afforded for the improvement of efficiency and for the growth of education. But the present Director of Public Instruction holds solemn silence on this matter and his report is dull and uninteresting. The provincial Government sent Mr. Duncan himself to the Reform Committees for opposing the proposed change in the educational system. While the bureaucrats are not agreed as to the spread of education among the public, it is by no means meet to say that Indian ministers will spoil the efficiency and growth of education. It is only the efforts of the patriotic and enthusiastic representatives of the people that will prove highly beneficial in this matter. As regards higher education, the authorities say that, if it is left under Indian ministers, the efficiency of and the need for education will decrease. This is only ridiculous. The ability of the Educational Department is manifest in one thing, and it is so particularly in the case of this Presidency. The art of making students appearing for examinations fail in them seems to be a great feat of the Educational authorities in India. The greater the number of candidates an examiner mercilessly plucks in an examination, the more efficient is he considered to be. Before giving the question papers, the examiners fix a percentage of passes. How can they then foresee that only so many will get through? The chief examiner gives instructions to his assistants that only so many students should get through and these assistants adjust the number of passes accordingly. Both the University and the Educational Department have been developing this system year after year. If such defects are noticed in Indian ministers, they would be removed in one moment. Sometimes a cry is raised for the improvement of efficiency in education solely with the object of hindering its progress. The number of high schools should be further increased. It is regrettable that even the suggestions made by the conference in 1916 still remain unattended to. The public are under the impression that, on account of the great stringency of the rules regarding the sanctioning of grants, schools managed by Christian missionaries get more grants than private institutions managed by Indians, however efficient they may be. The fate of an Indian private school competing with a missionary institution can well be imagined by the refusal of the Director to recognize the Kannan Chettiyar's school at Tiruvallur. Progress in education will be attained only if the control of the Educational Department is delegated to the representatives of the people.

Education in the Madras Presidency.

The Manorama, of the 28th January, in its leading article notes that the report on Public Instruction for 1917-1918 shows some progress in all directions. Adverting to the statement in the report that from the Imperial grant received during the year the pay of trained teachers of elementary schools has been raised to Rs. 11 per mensem, the paper observes:—The Government themselves are aware that the price of food and clothes has risen to five or six times the old rates. . . How are these poor teachers to pass their days with an allowance insufficient even for their food? Can it be the intention of Government that these teachers should do their work starving and lifeless? This is a matter deserving of the special attention of Government.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 28th Jan. 1919.

The article further notes that no country is more backward than India in point of literacy, that no good can come until this state of affairs is changed and that this ought to be the object to be striven for by Indian leaders and the first duty of the Government.

The Kerala Sanchari, of the 29th January, also observes that the pay of elementary school teachers is quite insufficient and that although elementary education has received some stimulus during recent years its progress is still slow.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 29th Jan. 1919.

The Kannan Chettiyar's Secondary School, Tiruvallur.

17. Referring to the attempt of Rao Bahadur C. Kannan Chettiyar to raise the standard of the middle school in Tiruvallur to that of a high school, the Hindu Nesan, of the 30th January, observes:—The Director of Public Instruction of this Presidency thwarted this attempt by advancing many arguments against it, the chief being the apprehension that the students of the existing missionary school in that place will join this, and that there is no need for two high schools there. Were not the two high schools there before? Neither of the reasons advanced by him is convincing. The people consider that he prevents the growth of this school only to safeguard the interests of the missionary institution. The sympathy of the Government with the missionaries can be guaged very well from their words that, in the case of pupils who are unwilling to learn lessons on Christian religion, the missionaries will arrange not to urge such lessons on them. It is only with the main object of spreading their religion that the missionaries are maintaining schools at such a heavy cost. It is said that Mr. Kannan Chettiyar is even prepared to give a promise not to admit into his school students of the IV form of the missionary school, realizing the anxiety of the authorities not to weaken the strength of the missionary institution. Authority and justice are far removed from each other. The existence of two schools in a locality will only promote healthy competition between them and lead to efficiency in both. We trust the present Director will without delay accord the required sanction.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

Continuing its comments on this subject, the Hindu Nesan, in its issue of the 1st February, observes among other things:—The Director of Public Instruction has manifested that he has the power in his hands and can use it as he likes. Perhaps he thinks that the Indians are still lacking knowledge and experience to distinguish between good and evil. We are highly disappointed at his order declining to reconsider his original decision against raising the Hindu School at Tiruvallur to a High School. The inclination of the Educational Department is too well known. Instances were now and again forthcoming to justify the impression of the people that the department is foremost in favouring missionary institutions regardless of the consequences to the Indians. It appears that the missionary school sent up more than twelve candidates last year for the Secondary School-Leaving Certificate examination and none came out successful. In no way has any case been made out to show that no other high school except the missionary institution is needed at Tiruvallur. Without considering this, the Director has passed orders, which every one is bound to characterize as wrong. He has thus given room for the opinion that he has belittled the rights of the Hindus giving undue weight to the words of the missionaries. This is very much to be regretted, especially when the need to encourage secondary education in this country is increasing.

The Tamil lexicon.

18. Referring to the public opinion that the expenditure incurred by the Government in connexion with the preparation of this lexicon is excessive and that the progress is very slow, the Hindu Nesan, of the 30th January, observes:—The absence of proportion will upset everything. It is but fair to give the pandits engaged in this work adequate rewards and salaries. If the Committee had worked recognizing the truth of this, the lexicon might have been published long ago. The work done with a proper remuneration will also be satisfactory.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Pial schools.

19. Referring to the recognition by the Government of Bihar of instruction being given to the public in pial schools, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st February, observes that the main purpose should be the spread of education among the public and not keeping schools in decent buildings and opines that, undoubtedly, much good will be derived from this system if the Government of Madras too adopt it.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

The system of education.

20. Adverting to the address of Sir Harcourt Butler at the recent convocation of the Allahabad University, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st February, observes:—The education that is now being given to Indian students is of such a nature as to denationalise them and make them violate their social observances. Like Sir Harcourt Butler many Provincial Governors, statesmen and educationists have referred to this defect. What has been the result after all? Indian students like to become efficient clerks as soon as they finish their collegiate career. Is this not due to the system of education now given to them?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Indian students in England.

21. Referring to the work of the advisory committees formed in the Provinces to give advice to the Indian students proceeding to England for receiving higher education, the Hindu Nesan, of the 1st February, observes that, for the information of the villagers who happen to send their sons to England for the purpose of higher education and for avoiding their anxiety in the matter, it is highly desirable that wide publicity should be given in the villages by means of notices in the vernaculars of the constitution of these committees and the ways in which they would be serviceable to the Indian students.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 29th Jan. and DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The present system of education.

22. The Swadesamitran, of the 29th January, and the Desabhaktan, of the 3rd February, publish in Tamil extracts from the views expressed by Sir John Woodroffe of the Calcutta High Court about the present system of education in his reply to the Universities Commission, and the latter paper comments thereon as follows in its issue of the 4th February 1919:—We have often remarked that the present system of education in India is such as to ruin her very nationality. It is highly creditable to Sir John Woodroffe that he has so clearly expressed this opinion which is shared by many Indians in general. We can state with certainty that the present moral degeneracy of India is due to the system of education now in vogue. When the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme comes into effect, education should be one of the "Transferred" subjects. If this department is to continue in the hands of a class who are quite ignorant of the religion, language, habits and customs of the people, how can they impart instruction suited to the conditions of the country?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

American Universities and the examination system.

23. Comparing the Examination System of the Madras University with that in vogue in American Universities, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th January, writes:—

. . . In our country, examinations are dreaded as fatal ordeals. . . Though it is a convenient method to throw the blame on the heads of students for the high percentage of failures in the Madras University a little consideration will show that it is the fault of the system of education and not of students. The like of our system of education cannot be seen anywhere else. My present subject is the system of examination and not the system of education. . . Sixty or 70 per cent of our students fail in examinations, on account of the system of education and on account of the stupidity of our teachers. How can students be responsible for this? . . .

National education.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

24. With reference to the answers given by Sir John Woodroffe before the Calcutta University Commission, the Andhra-patrika, of the 4th February, writes under this heading:— . . . He (Sir John Woodroffe) has said that the present system of education is detrimental to the national spirit of Indians, that it is acting as a canker to their self-expression and that it is producing anglicised men, and has suggested the establishment of national education as the best remedy for all these defects. He has urged the complete handing over, to Indians, of the department of education, the imparting of instruction through vernaculars, the necessity of giving prominence to Indian culture and Indian wants, and the improvement of agricultural education. It remains to be seen from the report of the Commission what weight has been attached to his opinions.

Mission schools and compulsory religious instruction.

KERALA KESARI, Ernakulam, Chingom-Kanni, 1094 M.E. Aug. to Oct. 1918.

25. * The Kerala Kesari, of Chingom-Kanni 1094 M.E. (August to October 1918), argues that if the "fam (notori?) ous" G.O. No. 559, passed for curbing the thoughtless zeal of inexperienced youths in matters political, is justifiable, then at least in one other matter also such an order is necessary, i.e., in the matter of religion. The article contains a criticism of foreign Missionaries praising their own religion and crying down those of India befere inexperienced boys in their schools thereby undermining the faith of these boys in their own religion and creating endless mischief. If the non-interference of Government in the matter is due to their confidence that the activities of the Missionaries will not in any way prejudice the authority of Government, this attitude taken up by the Government seems to be quite undesirable. The article advocates agitation to secure the issue of a circular by Government prohibiting compulsory religious instruction in schools and colleges conducted by the Missionaries.

The Ayurvedic system of medicine.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

26. Referring to the opinion expressed by the authorities that it is not desirable that the Corporation of Madras should help the Kannikaparameswari Ayurvedic Hospital in Madras, with a grant from its funds, the Swadesa-mitran, of the 29th January, remarks:—Those that speak with disgust and disregard about the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine will certainly be not in favour of this grant. But we appreciate the action of the Corporation in having decided to continue it. Though the authorities might not be inclined to come forward to render financial help themselves, still if they attempt to prevent others from rendering such help, we trust the local self-governing institutions will not tolerate it. If the authorities attempt to prevent financial help being given, these institutions should come forward to assert their rights.

The plague in Madras.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

27. Pointing out the urgency and necessity for preventing the spread of plague in Madras for fear of its extending throughout Southern India, the Dravidan, of the 3rd February, observes:—The city of Madras is very much congested. To relieve this congestion it is necessary to extend its limits and provide the extension with facilities for tram communications. This extension should include, within the municipal limits of the town, Saidapet on the south, Perambur and Konnur on the west and Tiruvothiyur on the north. In consideration of the present insanitary condition of the city, prompt steps should be taken in this matter.

Plague.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

Regarding the prevention of overcrowding in streets and lanes in the city which creates a favourable atmosphere for the spread of plague, a correspondent to the Andhra-prakasika, of the 29th January, writes:—. . . The Government must now come to the relief of the Corporation. An Improvement Trust Board as in Bangalore and Mysore will have to be established. With the financial help of that Board, lanes may be broadened and tramways laid to distant corners in the city. . . If there is the convenience of tramways, people would live in distant localities. It is better to form the above Trust Board soon.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Plague in Madras.

Under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 1st February, writes:— . . . They say that there have been rat-falls and rat-deaths in Triplicane. We do not know how far the Corporation authorities are taking trouble to examine those rats and find out whether they contain the plague bacilli. . . Our Health officer Mr. D. Raghavendra Rao has not passed the hygiene test. . . It is hygiene that teaches about the measures to be adopted for the prevention of epidemics and other diseases. We suggest to the Corporation that it is their duty to appoint experts in hygiene at least on such occasions as the present. Should the Corporation decide out of favour or for some reason to get on with the present Health officer only, we submit to the Government that they should interfere and do this great service to the people. . . As has been remarked by the Governor of Bengal, much money is required for the prevention of plague. But our Corporation is short of funds. In that case it is highly necessary that the Government should come forward with help in the matter. . . Should they also plead lack of funds, we request them to apply for fund to the Government of India to which they are contributing more meney than the other provincial Goverments and to spend it for this purpose.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

What sort of interest is this?

28. Referring to the proposal of the Hon'ble Mr. T. Rangachari to train up the present corporation Health officer in hygiene, the Andhraprakasika, of the 31st January, writes:— . . . We cannot understand what patriotism it is to propose the training of Mr. D. Raghavendra Rao, the Acting Health officer of the corporation, in the elementary principles of hygiene at a cost of one lakh of rupees from the corporation fund. . . To appoint as the Health officer a man who has not passed examinations in hygiene is the first mistake of the authorities, and then to try to rectify that mistake at the cost of one lakh of rupees is the second. We are glad to hear that the corporation has not consented to commit the second mistake which is the graver of the two. Are there none available in the world who have passed the hygiene test? Or is it that our corporation does not want them? Are the Government taking notice of this matter? How long is the city of Madras to be in charge of one who is ignorant of the laws of hygiene?

(h) Railways.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The South Indian Railway Company Agent.

29. Under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 28th January, writes:— Mr. Murhead, the Agent of this company, is going to Mesopotamia on camp duty. Regarding the appointment of Mr. Scott in his place, a correspondent to the Railways has observed that it has caused disappointment to those who have a claim to it. Mr. Scott is the brother-in-law of Mr. Priestley, the Managing Director of "the Humboard Railway Executive Committee" in England. For him, Mr. Priestley created the post of an additional Traffic Manager and appointed him to it, overlooking the claims of about twenty District Traffic officers who have got greater merit, experience and service. By this unnecessary appointment, he has caused loss of money to the share-holders of the company and the Government. . . A nephew of Mr. Priestley who is a subordinate officer, having taken casual leave for some days, went to England without informing the superior officers. He returned and rejoined his duty. Had it been any other man, what would have been his fate? Because he is Mr. Priestley's nephew, all departmental rules were suspended for him. . . When the above irregularities alone were quite enough to cause dissatisfaction to better qualified and more experienced officers, Mr. Priestley appointed his brother-in-law as the Company's Agent. . .

The drink evil.

30. Referring to the proposal of the American Government to introduce a legislation to prohibit the manufacture, sale, export and import of any kind of liquor, the Dravidan, of the 28th January, dwells at length on the evils resulting from drink and observes:—It is the duty of the Government to root out this evil in India while it is in its infant stage. To our rulers who have routed the Germans, this is not a difficult task. That day augurs good to India, on which the Government enact a law similar to the one to be enacted in America.

The drink evil.

Observing that communities, which consider drinking to be a sign of civilization, are adopting measures to discourage it on the ground that it is prejudicial to the progress of the country and regretting that there are many facilities for encouraging this evil in India which views drinking as one of the most heinous sins, the Lokopakari, of the 3rd February, says:—Drinking would have been completely prohibited in India, if, as in America, legislators here had been Indians. That day when India begins to be governed for the Indians will be the day on which she will shine like a jewel in the crown of the British Empire.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The prohibition of liquor.

31. Referring to the news of the prohibition of liquor in the United States, the Mysore Star, of the 2nd February, writes:— It is a standing criticism that though India forbade the use of liquor from time immemorial, the drink habit has been steadily spreading among the people, ever since the country came under the suzerainty of the west which has no objection to liquor. The Government have organised an Abkāri department; and being reluctant to give up the immense revenue which the department yields, wholly overlook the degradation to which the people are driven in consequence of the drink vice, and though they profess to be mindful of the evil, do not take adequate steps to ward it off. When the Imperial Government itself is so apathetic, how can we expect the Native States under them to be different? Who is free from the greed of wealth and what is there which money cannot do? In order to escape public criticism, the Government proclaim that they have taken steps to put down the drink evil. The enhancement of duty, the decrease of the number of shops, the limiting of the hours of sale, and the establishment of tea and coffee shops close to the public houses are some of the tricks which they resort to and which they point out in proof of their efforts. But these have failed to produce the desired effect. They are as ridiculous as the attempt to catch a crane by placing some butter on its head in the hope that the butter would melt and run into eyes and help to catch the bird. A Government which feels that its true source of revenue lies in helping the people to abandon vice and extravagance and live a life of virtue, health and moderation would certainly regard the revenue derived from the Abkāri department as the very blood wrung from the necks of its subjects. Russia and the United States have both prohibited liquor, despite the enormous revenue from that source. What excellent statesmanship! When will India have that good fortune? Can we expect it in case India gets self-government? If that were possible, why have not the Native States which are practically enjoying self-government now begun the reform?

The Congress and the Prince of Wales.

32. The Kaliyugavartamani, of the 11th January, observes:—The new party in the last session of the Congress, for some reason or other, postponed the consideration of the question of presenting an address of welcome to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales during his proposed visit to India. This action will be viewed with much displeasure by the Indian public. Can any loophole be allowed for the Anglo-Indians to question the loyalty of the Indians and find fault with them?

KALIYUGA-VARTAMANI, Madras, 11th Jan. 1919.

The value-payable system with foreign countries.

33. Referring to the fact that at present this system is obtaining only in places where the Indian coin is current and to the proposal of the Government to make it applicable even to the British Isles and other countries, the Kaliyugavartamani, of the 11th January, observes:—The Trades' Association object to this proposal, and it is but natural that they should do so. It should be seen, however, whether this objection is made in the interests of the public. We trust that the Government will not give up this great convenience for the sake of a few merchants.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

A call to the Indians.

35. The Desabhaktan, of the 28th January, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article under the heading "prison house, a house of penance" in which the following finds place:—Prisons were in ancient times intended for sheltering liars, thieves, etc., and rectifying them. But at the present time good signs are seen for the conversion of these into places for patriots to do penance. One of such places of penance was constructed in Mandalay in 1908 for Tilak, another at Coimbatore for Mr. Pillai, and now one at Trichinopoly for our patriot Varadarajulu Nayudu. We are specially grateful to the authorities concerned for the selection of one such place for Mr. Varadarajulu on the banks of the sacred Cauveri. Just as gold gets more and more refined the oftener it is heated in a furnace, a patriot gets purer the oftener his body is subjected to the fire of the house of penance. Messrs. Tilak and Gandhi are purified patriots of this type and every son of Mother Bharata should come forward to undergo this process of purification. Friends, prepare your minds to perform a penance in the manner of our hero Rajulu, the Champion of Justice in the Tamil Country. Prison house is the house of penance for patriots, the prison rations their food, the prison dress their ascetic garb and the prison work their service of penance. Mother Bharata is the deity worshipped by them. Vande Mataram their basic mantra, and Home Rule their salvation. Those that do such penance will be deemed to be sons of Mother Bharata. It is a rarity of rarities to get an opportunity to do service to the country in this precious human life. Avail yourselves of this opportunity and come forward to fight out the battle within constitutional limits. Providence, equity and justice are in our favour. Come. It is certain that justice will win.

The same paper publishes, from the pen of another correspondent, an article referring to the patriotic work of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu who is described as an incarnation of goodness in which the following finds place among others:—The rumour, that after the close of the war there would be an incarnation of God, spread like wild fire. According to the belief of the Vaishnava sect, 12 saints should be the precursors of such an incarnation. So get up at once The inauspicious month of Marqali is past. The song of the dawn to awake the Lord has been sung. With the advent of the month of Tai liberty has dawned in the western countries. One saint has already made his appearance. Only eleven more are wanting among the 33 crores of people. Come forward at once! Saints are wanted!

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The Madras Times and the Hon'ble Mr. Fazlul Huq.

36. Referring to the comment of the Madras Times about the statement of the Hon'ble Mr. Fazlul Huq, the President of the All-India Moslem League at Delhi, that Great Britain cannot efficiently rule a country conquered by it, the Desabhaktan, of the 28th January, observes:—It is needless for us to point out that the comment of the Times is false. We would affirm that, as observed by Mr. Huq, the bureaucrats do not know how to rule India properly. India has been under the British sway for the last 150 years, and the number of educated persons in British India is still small. Whose fault is this? Similar defects exist in other departments as well. It is the opinion of the wise that the failure of the bureaucrats to understand the right way to govern India is only due to the differences that exist between them and the Indians in point of religion, language, habits and customs. It is not known why the Times doubts Mr. Huq's statement. We ask the Times in what way India has progressed since the advent of the British rule. The industries of India have perished and the heroism of the Indians has waned. Who is responsible for all this? We cannot understand the observations of the Times that the Government should not fail to note the false statements made by vernacular papers, and curb them properly. If so, we wish that the Government should at once take repressive measures against this paper which is uttering lies. These Anglo-Indian papers find fault with the Indians in many ways. Why are the Government inattentive in regard to this? By the statement of the Times that vernacular papers contain mostly untruths, will not their reputation suffer?

37. Referring to the statement in New India that there is a strong rumour that the security furnished by the Desabhaktan will be forfeited, the latter paper, in its issue of the 28th January, observes:—New India has many times forfeited its security. Many papers in Bengal have shared a similar fate. Forfeiture of security has thus become a very common affair in India. Generally all that New India refers to as rumours prove to be facts. We trust that the security of the Desabhaktan will not be forfeited as, from the very beginning, it has not written anything disloyal. It is well known throughout the Tamil world that this paper has taken upon itself the duty of condemning the bureaucratic system of administration and that it greatly reveres the British rule. It is not known whether the Executive Council of the Madras Government is aware of this. Wisdom consists only in understanding aright the views of a paper thoroughly but not in getting confused, without noticing the true significance, taking into consideration only a statement which is found in a corner of the paper. We firmly believe that Lord Pentland will not on the eve of his departure be hard on the Desabhaktan which is toiling in the service of God. If by chance it should so happen that he should be cruel towards the Desabhaktan, we wish he will be pleased to note the following:—Your Excellency Lord Pentland: Do you love liberty or hate it? Does India enjoy the liberty enjoyed by England? Is a constitutional agitation for liberty necessary or not? Is it just or unjust to punish those that seek liberty? How do you make out the true significance of newspapers written in the vernacular? Are extracts from these papers translated into English in consonance with the views of the editors?

The Desabhaktan and the Government.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

38. Referring to the present scarcity of kerosene oil in the country, the Desabhaktan, of the 30th January, observes:—From the reports of our correspondents in various places it is seen that the price of a bottle of kerosene oil varies from six to eight annas in important places such as Chingleput, Chidambaram, Tanjore, Trichinopoly, Madura and Tuticorin. The companies dealing in this oil do not take notice of the inordinate gain obtained by the sub-agents. The sufferings of the people are indescribable. Why should not the Government come to their rescue? Though it is about two months since the war came to an end, railway facilities have not been properly afforded as yet. It is understood that the companies have sufficient stock of oil with them. It is only want of railway transport facilities that is the cause for the high price of this oil in mufassal stations. Mr. Wood, the Controller of Civil Supplies, should attend to this suffering of the people and avert the kerosene famine. The Government should issue strict orders to the district authorities, until transport facilities are restored, to see that the price of kerosene oil does not increase. They will be considered to have failed in their duty to the people if they keep quiet under the impression that everything is going on properly.

Kerosene oil.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

A note in the news columns of the Manorama of the 28th January says that the price of kerosene-oil now varies from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 annas a bottle. The abuses in connexion with the sale of kerosene do not seem to have decreased. It trusts that the authorities will soon do the needful to get the rate reduced.

Rising price of kerosene-oil.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 28th Jan. 1919.

The Manorama, of the 31st January, reports that the price of kerosene-oil has risen to the unprecedented rate of As. 10 a bottle, and trusts the Emergency Committee and the Collector will specially attend to this matter.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 31st Jan. 1919.

39. The Desabhaktan, of the 29th January, points out that while in England the labourers work only for eight hours a day, in India they are required to work for twelve hours, and, observing that the labourers in India have other kinds of grievances as well and that the bureaucrats themselves even threaten the few persons who come forward to work in their cause, remarks that the people concerned should note that it is a great sin to consider those that volunteer to work for the advancement of the labourers to be seditionists.

Indian labourers.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

Adverting to the fact that, in the case of European labourers, the Governments in their respective countries also take trouble for ameliorating their condition and that, though the prices of articles have at present doubled themselves here, the capitalists complain of the injustice of the demand of the labourers for an increase of 30 to 35 per cent in their wages, the Swadesamitran, of the 30th January, observes:—Even if the demand of the labourers for an increase of 35 to 40 per cent in their wages is granted, still it cannot be said to be exorbitant in view of the present situation and their past condition. It is essential that both the capitalists and the Government should evince sympathy with the movement to ameliorate the condition of the labourers in India. This is perceptibly lacking.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

Epiphany and the Muslims.

40. Observing that the Mussalman of Calcutta has condemned a piece of writing in the Epiphany which is said to wound the religious feelings of the Muhammadans, the Desabhaktan, of the 29th January, remarks that the Anglo-Indian papers are often creating religious and class differences between the Hindus and the Muhammadans and that it is not right for the Government not to put a stop to their evil deeds.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Epiphany and the Muhammadans.

With reference to the publication in the Epiphany of a letter wounding the religious susceptibilities of Muhammadans, the Andhrapatrika, of the 31st January, remarks:—. . Room was afforded by a Christian paper called the Epiphany to wound the feelings of the Muhammadans and rouse their indignation for a second time. We do not know why the Government should not apply the Press Act to such papers. . . The Muhammadans will not be satisfied, unless proper punishment is meted out to such papers.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

Crimes in India and in England.

41. Adverting to a telegram recently received that two culprits who were imprisoned in February 1917 for having conspired to murder Mr. Lloyd George, have now been released under licence, the Desabhaktan, of the 29th January, says:—The Anglo-Indian papers used to blab that it is very rare to find seditionists in England and that they are found in large numbers only in India. What are these papers going to say now? None in India would venture to put an end to the life of high Government officials. While murderers are now being set free in England, innocent young students in India are being kept in prison without any trial. While the Defence of India Act, under which these youths and several other innocent persons have been kept in custody, has not yet been repealed, Rowlatt Bills are to be introduced in addition. What more does India want? We need not describe what kind of agitation would have been started in England if such measures had been introduced there at present. When murder, robbery and treason are very low in India, new laws are being enacted here, while in England such laws are decreasing as the evil deeds increase.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

Increase of telegraph rates.

42. The Swadesamitram, of the 30th January, observes:—These rates have, of late, been increased considerably. When the rate for an ordinary telegram was raised to As. 12, the authorities said that the increase was made only to reduce the press of work during the war time in telegraph offices. Now that the war has ended and the income to Government from both the Postal and Telegraph Departments goes on increasing, why should not the rates be reduced as before? There is no justification whatever for continuing the increased rates.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The telegraph rates.

The Lokopakari, of the 3rd February, also advocates a reduction in these rates on the ground that there has been a steady increase of receipts and decrease of expenditure during the past three years in the Telegraph Department.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

Co-operative Societies.

43. Referring with satisfaction to the increase in the number of Co-operative Societies during the year 1917–18 as shown in the administration report concerned, the Swadesamitran, of the 30th January, observes:—Only if, in every village, one credit society and one agricultural or other industrial society are started, the object of the co-operative movement can be considered to have been accomplished. It is because the people are still ignorant of the benefits of co-operation that a larger number of societies have not yet been formed. If a credit society is opened in each village, the poor can very well afford to avoid the professional money-lender and get loans on easy terms which they are often in need of. We learn that in certain places the subordinate Government officials, being under obligations to the village headmen, have discouraged people working in Co-operative societies. It will be good if the Government should point out that it is the duty of the Government officials to help these societies as much as possible and improve them. Madras, the headquarters of the Co-operative Credit Department, has not derived even a tenth portion of the advantages it is possible to obtain from co-operation. There are only 34 societies in this big city, whereas every street here can afford to have two societies. The absence of a larger number of societies has enabled thousands of usurers from other provinces to come and thrive here. If one society is started in each street, a greater portion of the stress of the people of the city will disappear. We trust that the head of this department as well as those interested in the co-operative movement will pay attention to this suggestion.

Students and politics.

44. Referring to the advice said to have been given by Mr. Surendranath Bannerji in a lecture recently delivered by him in Bombay suggesting the desirability of students taking part in political movements, the Dravidan, of the 30th January, remarks: —This advice will in the long-run prove to be disastrous. Home Rulers argue that in Oxford and Cambridge Students' Societies give the students a training in politics and that eminent statesmen spring up only from those quarters. It is true. But wise men will never forget the difference between the students in England and those in India. English students are never excited by unnecessary agitations. The spirit of mixing in political agitations and dancing to the tune of the agitators even at the sacrifice of their own studies, prevails in a very high degree in the Indian students and it has become deep-rooted in them through the improper actions of the Home Rulers The way in which students behaved when Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal came for the first time to Madras heralding Home Rule, is proof enough to show that the Indian students are not fit for taking part in these movements. We wish, therefore, that there should be some definite restrictions in this matter. If students freely enter into political matters, their studies will surely be hindred and through them harm will certainly to be done to others. We urge upon the Government to take proper steps for preventing the students being thus ill-advised.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

A protest meeting.

45. Referring to a notice recently issued in connexion with a public meeting in Madras for protesting against the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee, the Dravidan, of the 30th January, observes:—The signatories to this notice are mostly Ayyars and Ayyangars and a few non-Brahmans who dance to their tunes. Nothing serious will result from this, as our Brahman and quasi non-Brahman friends are accustomed to convene meetings and pass resolutions of protest for anything and everything.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

Appointments welcomed by India.

46. Expressing its satisfaction at the appointment of Mr. Montagu and Sir S. P. Sinha as the Secretary and the Under Secretary of State for India, respectively, the Yatharthavachani, of the 18th January, observes:—This augurs well for the future of India. Mr. Lloyd George, who appointed Mr. Montagu, did so with the object of getting the reform scheme sanctioned easily. Mr. Montagu is capable of carrying through his point in the teeth of the strongest opposition. Besides doing so out of consideration for the welfare of India, he is in duty bound to see that the report prepared by the Viceroy and himself at the instance of the Parliament is passed and not discarded.

YATHARTHAVACHANI, Kumbakōnam, 18th Jan. 1919.

Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu.

47. Remarking that the conviction of Doctor Varadarajulu Nayudu for sedition is unexpected, the Yatharthavachani, of the 18th January, observes:—Our doubt is whether Doctor Nayudu is aware of the constitutional ways of working to overthrow the English Government. There is not the slightest justification for England to grow suspicious of India. India has no army, navy, arms, wealth or steamers to sail overseas. She is famishing, giving away for State expenditure the little gain she gets by sending to foreign countries the grains grown by the sweat of her brows and the few articles made by her. It is really inconceivable that under such circumstances the Indians can be disloyal. By this, however, we do not mean to say that India is perfectly flawless. At the outset of the war, when Germany was in the ascendant, there might have been here and there some talk about the future of India, in case Germany should become victorious. All this is mere empty talk. It is not usual to mete out punishment for mere talk. We regret very much the mishap that befell Doctor Nayudu. It would be well if the authorities should show pity and order his release before he prefers an appeal to the High Court. Lord Pentland is on the eve of his departure from our country. We wish that he would do this as a last act of goodness to make the people bless him for ever.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

The ignorance of the Englishmen about India.

48. The Desabhaktan, of the 21st January, reproduces an article from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, which, referring to the statement of the Englishman that those in England have not a correct idea of India and, the Indians, remarks that the Anglo-Indians in India are no better and, pointing to their impression that India is prosperous even when famine and disease have made an abode of this country, their 'false' idea that dacoits have been hovering about Bengal for the last ten years and their 'foolish' view that they are the representatives of the Indians, as instances of this, condemns their advocacy of the application of the principle of communal representation in India. The article refers also to the theory of the Anglo-Indians that Home Rule in India will mean the Brahman rule and observes that, judged from this light, even England has not a true representative government, inasmuch as the labourers there have never had a large number of representatives in the House of Commons and the position has not improved even in the case of the new Parliament.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

The Chiefs' Conference at Delhi.

49. The Desabhaktan, of the 22nd January, reproduces an extract from the Servant of India which, while expressing its regret at this Conference not being held publicly, points to the fact that the clause in the report, that only Chiefs, who have complete liberty in administering their States, can become members of this council, will deny this privilege to nearly 87 per cent of the existing Chiefs, who have not this qualification, and urges that this point should be considered by the Conference, inasmuch as the objects with which the Council of Princes is brought into existence apply equally to all the Native States generally and the smaller States have also occasionally rendered assistance to the Government. The article refers to the ruin of many kingdoms in Europe after the beginning of this war, which it takes to be an indication of the end of absolute monarchy in the world, and wants the Chiefs to be informed that only such of them as co-operate with their people in granting responsible government to the latter can have a seat on this Council. It is also contended in the article that Indian Chiefs who have a permanent army should be given the privilege of organizing it so as to be conducive to the progress of their States and a fiscal responsibility so as to promote the industries of their territories.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

Indians and the army.

50. The Swadesamitran, of the 22nd January, publishes an extract from a letter sent to the Leader of Allahabad by an Indian soldier about a conversation between him and an Australian Military official, while he was an inpatient in a hospital in London, in which the Australian, being apprised by the Indian that his countryman occupied a very low status in the army and that even the best Indian could not rise to a high position therein, is said to have remarked that, under such conditions, not even one Australian would come forward to enter the army and that he would care for self-respect first and then only for loyalty.

SIRTHURUTTAM, Madura, 22nd Jan. 1919.

The labourers.

51. Adverting to the recent strike among the labourers in the mills at Bombay, the Sirturuttam, of the 22nd January, advocates the cause of the labourers, and observes:—It is the foremost duty of the Government to suitably amend the 'Indian Factories Act' so as to bring about harmony and mutual love between the labourers and the capitalists. We suggest that it would be well for the Government to have some control over the capitalists. Further, the capitalists are generally not in favour of forming labour unions, the existence of which will prevent strikes. If they themselves come forward to start such unions, then both the parties will be benefited, the progress of Indian industry which is desired by the Viceroy will be achieved and the country will become prosperous.

Labour unrest.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

Referring to the Labour unrest in Scotland, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd February, remarks:—. . . The unrest is increasing day after day, as the employers treat their workmen as machines. There were never such troubles in ancient India about industries. . . The development of Indian industries is necessary, but it behoves Indians to work out their industrial advancement on lines suited to their country.

Labour strikes.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 15th & 22nd Jan. 1919.

Under this heading, the Desamata, of the 15th and 22nd January, writes:—. . . It cannot but be admitted that the condition of labourers is becoming more and more intolerable, as modern civilization is increasing. Under the conditions created by the modern civilization in the West, the highhandedness of capitalists is increasing. This is the reason why we hear of labour strikes both in the East and West so often. . .

Rice trade in the Madras Presidency.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 23rd Jan. 1919.

52. Adverting to the recent orders of the Director of Civil Supplies that export licences will be issued only to owners of mills and that rice merchants other than mill owners should carry on their trade only through them, the Vartakamitran, of the 23rd January, observes:—This only places the merchants under the mill owners and hampers independent trade. Though there may be harmony between the mill owners and these merchants, still it is not easy to sell rice at the prices fixed by the authorities. Without the regulation of the price of paddy it is impossible to fix the price of rice, and regulating the price of paddy means controlling the mirasidars. The paddy harvest in Tanjore has not been satisfactory owing to the failure of the monsoon last year. At this famine time some prefer to stock the required paddy for the year at any cost, and the mirasidars will not agree to sell paddy at reduced prices. Their grievances also are not without reason. They have to pay kists and buy several other necessaries only by the sale-proceeds of the surplus paddy, after reserving the quantity required for their own consumption. They ask whether the Government will remit a portion of their land revenue in the same way as they sanction special allowances to their employees for dearness of food. If the authorities, viewing the situation quite impartially, represent clearly to the Government the grievances of both the mirasidars and the people, then the Government will not hesitate to provide for the necessary facilities. This difficulty has been caused, because the bureaucrats have failed to realise their responsibility and represent to the Government the real state of affairs.

Aid to soldiers.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 23rd Jan. 1919.

53. Referring to the request of the Viceroy for a contribution of another 100 lakhs of rupees from India for the support of the soldiers crippled in the war and of the families of deceased soldiers, the Vartakamitran, of the 23rd January, expresses its sympathy with the object of the appeal, and observes:—Since the commencement of the war India has contributed towards the military expenditure both as loans and gifts plenty of money which, though small when compared with the huge expenditure in the war, is certainly considerable in her present condition. It is not proper to ask India for a gift of 100 lakhs of rupees at a time when she is afflicted by famine and her poverty has increased. The war has now ended and the military expenditure will be much less than before. Cannot the required aid be rendered to those affected by the war from the collections of the proposed Excess Profits Duty, which is also Indian money?

The tanning industry.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 23rd Jan. 1919.

54. Referring to the attempts made by the Tanning Committee since 1916 to get all the untanned skins from India tanned in the Empire itself, and to the recent lecture of a member of this committee before the Royal Arts Society in England that it is the desire of the committee to improve the tanning industry in India and to send skins for tanning to England, Canada, Australia, South Africa and other colonies, the Vartakamitran, of the 23rd January, observes:—With the exception of England, all the colonies treat the Indians as untouchables. They say that their countries will be ruined if the Indians set foot on them. Why should the Indian skins be sent to them as if the required facilities for tanning them are not available here alone?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

Effect of the war.

55. Remarking that it is not in the nature of India to be false to her thoughts in word and deed, the Desabhakatan, of the 30th January, observes:—What benefits has India obtained in return for her services? She got the Defence of India Act at the very outset of the war. This Act is feasting on the patriots and newspapers that work hard for Mother Bharata and is belching. This makes even the fœtus in the womb tremble. The bureaucrats are going on with their repressive mission ten times more vigorously than before in the case of those that plead for liberty. The greater the progress of this mission of repression, the larger the chances of redress for the grievances of Mother India! The bureaucratic deity seeing that the time for the expiry of Defence of India Act is close at hand and desirous of extending this mission in a thousand ways, is attempting to crown Mother India with Rowlatt Bills. The coronation is fast approaching. Mr. Srinivasa Sastriyar is to officiate as priest. Perhaps the (Legislative Council) sages and celestials will heartily witness the coronation ceremony! The day on which the Rowlatt Bills become an Act will be a gala day with the bureaucrats. India felt slightly anxious that, on account of the close of the war, the paroxysm of the bureaucratic deity might wane. Mother Bharata is immensely delighted to find that the zeal has now been quickened. Thus was decreed the fate of Mother Bharata. The Peace Conference has met there, while here a meeting is held to pass the Sedition Bills into law. Friends! Look at the benefits derived by India from the war! Consider well!! The God of Authority holds (the Rowlatt Bill) repression in one hand and (Montagu-Chelmsford) reforms in the other. Is there any one in the world who can take nectar and poison together? Lo, Mother Bharata is going to do it. It is not known what good will be in store for her in consequence. The holy persons that sing her praises will reach the hermitage (prison) and become ascetics. Wives bereft of their husbands, sisters of their brothers, and mothers of their sons will, with delight, spend their days worshipping the bureaucratic diety! O, Mother Bharata! We witnessed the services you rendered in the war and witness also the return you are now getting therefor. Has the God who created you no eyes? Will the sages and ascetics born of you appear again?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

The Indian Moslems.

56. The Desabhaktan, of the 30th January, observes:—It is shocking to describe the present pitiable condition of the Indian Moslems. While their wealth is being crippled on one side, their privileges are being forfeited on the other. Moslems have been kept in custody. Many Moslems have been deported. Many Moslem papers have been forfeited and it is known to every one that the Moslems were recently deprived of even the right to call a public meeting. Because the Government did not take any action on the Indian Daily News when it spoke disparagingly of the Islamic faith, the Epiphany of Calcutta has recently made disparaging remarks about Muhammad and the Islamic faith. It is our desire that the British Government, who are administering justice blended with mercy, should not be subject to the remark that they have remained quiet, while the Christian newspapers and Christian missionaries speak low of the Islamic faith and its tenets, because they are themselves Christians. The Moslems are eager to know whether the Government are going to punish these Missionaries and papers for their mean actions.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan and a correspondent to the Dravidan.

57. The Desabhaktan, of the 31st January, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article in which the following finds place among others:—In the letter written to the Dravidan, of the 18th ultimo, Mr. T. V. Subrahmanyam, a correspondent, while quoting a passage from the Desabhaktan has given only extracts of sentences here and there and placed some dots in the intervening spaces. It is stated in that issue of the Desabhaktan "that those who govern us are not giants but the Britishers who are the embodiment of righteousness. British justice and liberty should be established." What to say of the correspondent who omitted all this and put dots instead? Further, he has remarked "Will not the benign Government note this?" "Have they no eyes?" It is regretable that the correspondent to the Dravidan, who seeks the favour of the bureaucrats, having failed in his attempt to defend the bureaucratic cause, began to cry out whether the benign British Government that fought for the maintenance of liberty in the world and came out victorious, had neither eyes nor ears.

Officials in India and England.

58. Comparing the salaries drawn by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State and the Under Secretary of State in England with those of a Lieutenant-Governor, a Division Commissioner and a Collector in India, the Desabhaktan, of the 31st January, observes:—From this it is clear that for the salary paid to a Lieutenant-Governor in India, one with the qualification of the Prime Minister of England and for the salary paid to a District Collector one as capable as the Under Secretary of State can be secured. While so, why should the Government of India pay such high salaries to ordinary Indian Civil Service officers? Some may say that the high salaries are paid in consideration of the difficulty of the Europeans living in India. While Sir S. P. Sinha goes to England to serve on such a paltry pay, why not those that come from England accept lower salaries?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

Juvenile smoking.

59. Referring, with appreciation, to the proposal of the Travancore Darbar to enact a law to prohibit students from smoking and using tobacco, and pointing out the evil effects of smoking by students, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st February, remarks that it will be a great boon to the student population if the British Government also enact a law like the one proposed in Travancore.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Students and smoking.

Referring to the prohibition of all forms of tobacco-smoking by boys under eighteen years in the Travancore State, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st February, remarks:—. . This one example will do to show how the Native States are forward in matters which promote the well-being of their subjects.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Students and tobacco.

Referring to the proposed legislation in Travancore for prohibiting the use of tobacco by students under 18 years of age, a note in the Manorama, of the 31st January, emphasises the advantages that will accrue from the prohibition and advocates the adoption of a similar measure by the Government of Madras.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 31st Jan. 1919.

Administration report of the Government of India.

60. Remarking that no reason for the delay in the publication of this report for the year 1916–1917 has been given in it, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st February, observes:—Besides decrying the political propogandist work done in India, the report states that the Home Rule League was agitating with the object of securing complete self-government for India at once. Perhaps the compiler of this report has not noted the objects of the Home Rule League. If he gives out what is true, none would find fault with him or his report, but we say that his incorporating untruths into the administration report does not become the Government.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

The Indian Administration Report.

Reviewing the Indian Administration Report for 1916–17, the Andhrapatrika, of the 31st January, observes in its leader:—. . . Since the report has been published so late, the matters dealt with therein cannot be read with much interest. . . The Government themselves admit that India has shown her loyalty during the war by rendering invaluable help. In these circumstances, one cannot but refrain from asking in wonder: is the enactment of the Rowlatt Bills the reward to India for having shown all this loyalty? We do not know what reasons have led the Government to think that India which has shown such unswerving loyalty in a great crisis like the war would be otherwise on the eve of the new era when she is about to enjoy self-government. . . The report shows that all the provinces except Bengal have been free from political crime. In that case, the people are at a loss to understand what necessity there is for the Government to enact repressive laws for the whole of India. . . A perusal of the

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

Government report will clearly show that the country is quite free from any sort of unrest which may lead to the commission of political crimes and that the Rowlatt Bills are uncalled for.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Export of cattle.

61. Referring to the contention of the Director of Agriculture that cattle have not deteriorated in India as alleged by the people by their export to foreign countries, and that on the other hand this export gives an impetus for the breeding of good cattle here, the Hindu Nesan, of the 1st February, remarks:—It is not worthy of a Director of Agriculture to argue like this. He knows by experience that, with the Indians, profit is not the sole concern. He has exerted himself to a great extent in furthering the cultivation in this country of the varieties of cotton that are in great demand in foreign countries. He is himself aware of the results of his advice to the cultivators in this respect. Is it proper for him to advocate now the export of cattle forgetting his past experience? We request that the Government will, hereafter at least, institute searching inquiries into the hardships and losses caused to us by the export of cattle from India.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

Repressive measures.

62. Dwelling at length on the loyalty and the self-sacrificing spirit of the Indians and the services rendered by them to the British Government during the Indian Mutiny sixty years ago and during the great European war recently, the Lokopakari, of the 3rd February, observes:—It is only with the conviction that the British Government, who are bent on securing liberty to the minor powers, will not fail to grant liberty to India also, that the Indians have sacrificed and are still sacrificing their life and property on behalf of the rulers. The Government of India, getting suspicious of the Indians, have come forward to make permanent repressive measures, and the Indian Civil Service party have begun to complain that granting liberty to India will endanger their powers and privileges. Is it in consonance with the British spirit for these Anglo-Indians to agitate against the Indians obtaining liberty, fraternity and equality which are the ideals of the British? One of the speakers at a recent public meeting held in Madras pointed out that the introduction of repressive measures was likely to cause unrest in the country. We hope that the Government will pay due regard to this warning.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

High prices.

63. Referring to the high prices of all articles, chiefly that of kerosene oil, the Lokopakari, of the 3rd February, observes:—If railway transport facilities are afforded, it appears these difficulties may be obviated. The Government should not be indifferent but should adopt all possible measures to mitigate the sufferings of the people. Mighty efforts should be made to regulate the prices of all articles indispensable for living.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

Public meeting in Madura.

64. The Swadesamitran, of the 28th January, publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held in Madura on the 25th idem to protest against the work of the Indian Civil Service Association in Madras.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

"Our zeal".

65. In a leader under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st February, complains that some "Fools", who are injuring this country in collusion with Anglo-Indians, are daily finding fault with it, and characterising this class of people as traitors to the country and a mean lot, indulging in vituperation and ignorant of a feeling of brotherhood, adds:—These people are adopting several devices to injure the Desabhaktan; and we learn that a few, who hold a peculiar view in politics, are also trying, owing to their jealousy of this paper, to suppress it. Some are afraid of us, as we are often condemning the actions of the bureaucrats. But we do not condemn all their actions, but only such of them as are against the British spirit and justice, and this only shows our devotion to the British rule. Nationalist papers and patriots should work with zeal hereafter. If the Rowlatt Bills are passed, mother Bharata will have to live in an eternal hell. To avoid this, numerous people should be prepared to undergo misery and nationalist papers should spring up in every corner. . . The just war to be begun by the Desabhaktan hereafter will be a mighty one, which requires the help of many, devoted to God, the king and the country. . .

66. In its leader under this heading the Desabhaktan, of the 3rd February, observes:—The bureaucrats are ruling India as they like and have begun to oppress the Indians who want a responsible form of government. On this account differences crop up between them and the people. The popular leaders wage a constitutional war with words, while the bureaucrats, without putting an end to this war by just means, resort to cruel repressive laws such as the Arms Act, the Press Act and the Defence of India Act. While repressive measures press the people on one side, the soul force of patriotism will be emanating on the other. The war now wages between the repressive force of the bureaucrats and the soul-force of the patriots. We do not know which of these will triumph in the end. The patriots should develop their soul-force to put down the actions of the bureaucrats supporting the Rowlatt Bills. Unceasing constitutional war should continue until the mischief of the bureaucratic administration goes down and responsible Government grows strong in India. Patriots! The bureaucrats are supporting the Rowlatt Bills. What are you going to do? Are you going to stop with mere words, or are you going to agitate within constitutional limits? The latter course will get you victory.

Unceasing war.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

67. Referring to the observation of the Madras Mail that, if there were no sedition in India during the last two or three years, there would have been no need to pass the Defence of India Act, the Desabhaktan, of the 3rd February, remarks:—As a rule all innocent acts appear to be guilty ones to the Government of India. Whose fault is this? The Defence of India Act was enacted solely with the object of preventing the Germans and other enemies from coming to India and from any of their movements spreading here. But the bureaucrats have applied the Act as they liked. Who is responsible for this?

The Madras Mail and repressive measures.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

68. The Desabhaktan, of the 4th February, contains the following observations among others:—It is not our point to speak ill of the foreigners who do not care for the interests of India. What to call those Indians who work with them to the detriment of their own country? They should be classed only as traitors to the country. That traitorous party has originated only in this Presidency, having for its main duty service at the feet of the bureaucracy. When we are told that that party has come forward to support the Rowlatt Bills, how are we to describe its treachery? Is there any sin worse than that of betraying the country for the sake of titles and wealth?

A traitorous party.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

69. Referring to the benefits that are likely to result from the enquiries of this Committee, the Desabhaktan, of the 4th February, observes:—From a perusal of the list of members, some appear to be new names and we have reason to doubt if these will be experienced in Indian matters. The views of H.H. the Agha Khan are antiquated ones. Lord Inchcape, a big railway capitalist, who has tasted the privileges of the India Office, is not likely to be in favour of effecting great changes. Professor Kaith is the only member who can make known his individual opinion easily We need not say much about the views of Babu Bupendra Nath Basu. It is, however, a matter for satisfaction that the Marquis of Crew, who, while Secretary of State for India, has had a good knowledge of the condition of India, has been chosen to be the President of the Committee Though he is in favour of Home Rule being granted to India, what can he do singly?

The India Council Committee.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

70. Referring to the news that the power of supervising the administration of Mesopotamia and other countries will be given to India and questioning whether by 'India' is meant the people of India or the Government of India which, unlike as in other countries, is not identical with the people but is a body representative of the British Government, the Swadesamitran, of the 4th February, remarks that giving India power of supervision over the administration of other countries after first recognizing her status and granting her self-government will be in conformity with her condition, the assurance of the British Government and the object of the war, that unless self-determination is granted to India simultaneously with other countries in the world and India is thereby made inattractive to other nations, any number of Leagues of Nations will not secure peace in the world and that what India wants is not the power of supervision over Mesopotamia but the status of controlling Mesopotamia and other countries.

India's position in the world.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

A secret meeting.

71. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 29th January, gives a brief summary of the proceedings of a secret meeting for discussing the reforms said to have been held at the houseof Mr. K. Srinivasa Ayyangar, in which the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma is reported to have, in contravention to the view expressed by him in the Delhi Congress and the Andhra Conference, proposed that the reforms of Mr. Montagu must be accepted as they stand as otherwise his scheme may fall through and we may be deprived of even what has been promised to us.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 25th Jan. 1919.

The Indian Civil Service officers.

72. The Andhrapatrika, of the 25th January, publishes in Telugu the letter of Mr. Galletti, the Collector of Chittoor, criticising the memorial of the Indian Civil Service Association.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 8th Jan. 1919.

The National Congress.

73. With reference to the Delhi Congress, the Desamata, of the 8th January, received on the 24th, observes:— . . . It appears that the Government issued an order prohibiting the procession of the President. Such a wonderful order has never been issued in the last thirty-three years since the beginning of the Congress. . . We do not know what strong reasons there were in the view of the Government for prohibiting at Delhi a procession which they had permitted till then? Could it be that they regarded Pandit Malavya as a seditionist? It is no exaggeration to say that a more respected and loyal citizen it is not possible to find in the whole of India. The Government also know it. . . Nothing can be more foolish than to think even in a dream that in a procession conducted by such gentlemen there would be any room for apprehending danger. The prohibition of the procession by the Government in this manner will only raise the value of the Congress a thousandfold in the opinion of the public instead of lowering it. . . A resolution has been brought forward, asking for complete autonomy in the Governments of provinces such as Calcutta, Madras and Bombay. It has been accepted by the majority. . . The grounds advanced by the movers of this resolution, that it has been necessitated by the changes which have come over the country during the last three months, and that those changes show the expediency of making such claims, are sound. . .

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 15th & 22nd Jan. 1919.

The thirty-third Indian National Congress.

The Desamata, of the 15th and 22nd January, publishes fully in Telugu the speech of the President of the Delhi Congress, part of which appeared in its last issue.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 8th Jan. 1919.

The Delhi Congress.

74. The Desamata, of the 8th January, publishes in Telugu a portion of the speech of the President of the Delhi Congress.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

Last week.

75. The Andhrapatrika weekly of the 22nd January, writes under this heading:—. . . People want at heart peace and happiness, but in practice they are naturally engulfed in competition. The great European war has shown that the selfishness of big nations is chiefly responsible for this state of affairs. All politicians have unanimously declared the destruction of this selfishness of big nations and the protection of the rights of all nations as the objects of the war. . . When we consider the constitution and members of the Peace Conference, the prominence of white races will be evident. . . In thirty years Japan could become a first-rate power. But the vast continent of India, the home of infinite resources, with her 330 millions of people could not get the status of even small States. . . The Indian representatives at the Peace Conference appointed by the Government have not the necessary ability and courage to urge there the claims of the Indians. . . Physical force and financial power have been the two main causes for the oppression of people in the world. Statesmen are glad that the war which has come to an end has destroyed militarism and established democracy. But what the war has destroyed is German militarism and not the principle of brute force itself. The Powers that have met at the Peace Conference are trying to prevent the expansion of the enemy countries, by means of brute force and not by the power of right. When stronger nations are obstructing the growth of weaker ones, the fire of war cannot cool down. . . The social revolution which is spreading in Europe makes it clear that the very fundamental principles on which the social structure has been based in the West have to be modified. The strikes of labourers in the Bombay mills and of one lakh of workers in the ship-building docks also point to the same truth. . . There are signs of a social revolution even in Britain, as can be seen from the aggression of Sinn Feiners, the labour-strikes, the desire of soldiers for demobilisation and the declaration of freedom by labour leaders. . . The whole Anglo-Indian community in India is hostile to the grant of political reforms to India. The Anglo-Indian merchants, the Anglo-Indian papers and the Anglo-Indian civilians in the country are manifesting a reactionary attitude. . . The grant of high offices does not solve the problem of India; it will have to be solved by the principles of self-determination and freedom which are now agitating the world. Unless the British Government and the people of India understand this secret and work for the attainment of that end, India and the Indian nation cannot derive any benefit nor command any respect.

76. The issues of the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th and 28th January, publish the speech of the President of the Gōdāvari District Co-operative Conference, held at Amālapuram, which contains occasional remarks such as:—It is not just that the Government which derives a large return over the capital outlay on irrigation works should take advantage of the absence of competition like ordinary merchants, and increase water-rate as it pleases.

77. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 30th January, writes:— . . . The Madras Mail wrote yesterday that no paper conducted with decency and self-respect could have any ground to be afraid of the Rowlatt Bills. Whatever repressive laws may come into force, the Anglo-Indian papers know full well that they enjoy perfect immunity from them. . . The use of strong medicines in the absence of serious diseases will undoubtedly spoil health and create trouble; nor is it strong medicines that will invariably be useful in curing troublesome complaints. Modern medical men say that in many such cases simple antidotes will do very well. . Nobody objects to the punishment of an offender. But it is punishment without trial and on mere suspicion that pains everybody. The new Bills do away with the authority of law courts and afford room for the exercise of unbridled power by the Police. It seems that the Rowlatt Committee has found the Police to be quite above reproach till now. But this finding of the committee fails to be convincing, as it conducted its inquiry in secret and in disregard of the principles of legal procedure. It has been pointed out by some gentlemen that the Viceroy's Council is not authorized to pass these Bills. . .

'No more fear'.

78. In its leader under this heading, the Hitakarini, of the 26th January, writes:—. . . To add to these difficulties, the Indian Civil Service Association has come into being. They are rulers as well as opponents This is the unspeakable pity of it. All the efforts of the people of India to realize their ideals will appear to the authorities as anarchical methods. . . The Indian Civil Service Association and its memorial tell us plainly that the authorities are hostile to our union and to the realization of our ideals. . . Almost all Indian papers have condemned the action of the Indian Civil Service Association. The arbitrary power so natural to this service becomes, therefore, apparent. . . A new repressive policy, hitherto unknown in India, is about to come into existence. From the advice given by some of our countrymen after the advent of the Rowlatt Committee Report, it is clear that coercion is likely to become stronger, if the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme is not accepted. Mr. Bannerjea's speech at the Law College supports this conclusion. It has become the habit of the Criminal Intelligence Department to let free Anglo-Indian papers, however strong may be their language and to find fault with the Indian papers, however cautiously they may write. To serve the country of one's birth and to desire one's birth-right are looked upon as sedition. Two of the three delegates nominated to the peace conference are still here. The Reform Committees have finished their inquiry at Madras and have gone to Bombay. Their proceedings were all secret. There cannot be a graver crisis for the Indian ideals than this. . .

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 26th Jan. 1919.

Village officers.

79. Under this heading, the Hitakarini, of the 26th January, writes:—G.O. No. 430, dated 5th October 1918, proposing some amendments to the hereditary rights of village officers is greatly agitating them. We do not know in what manner the hereditary right of these village officers of all things in the world has hampered the administration of the country. Every village officer is protesting against the proposed amendments. Numerous meetings, memorials and deputations are being got up for the purpose. Even the day fixed for receiving representations on the subject has been postponed to the 30th April. . .

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

The village officers.

The Swadesamitran, of the 28th January, publishes a communication, from the pen of a correspondent, about the Bill of the local Government making certain changes in the succession to village offices, in the course of which the following observations occur among others:—This Bill seems to aim at rooting out the right of succession by the rule of primogeniture and, by gradually curtailing the right of hereditary succession too, reducing this office to the level of other offices. The village officers may not raise their voice against this, for they do not deem the salaries they receive as a source of living and have to incur much loss by holding these offices. The fact that the minority of the heir of the last holder of the office is also one of the disabilities operating against his succession, makes it clear that the right of succession by heredity exists only in name and that the will of the appointing authority is the main factor. It cannot be denied that the monigars have to spend from their own pockets to make it convenient for the subordinate officials visiting the villages and that they are rarely able to recoup the cost of supplying materials to the officials of different departments passing through their villages. The only thing that makes up for all these hardships is the prestige of heredity attaching to the office. The qualifying test for the post of monigar is so easy that any one may pass it and succeed in getting the place in competition with the richest and most influential landholder in a village. But as far as a village office is concerned, it is enough to see if an applicant belongs to a family which had held this post and can conduct the administration efficiently. Even one who cannot sign his name may prove to be an efficient monigar. But in these days when education has spread, there will be very few illiterate people. The settlement of disputes constantly occurring in a village requires tact and experience, which can be acquired only by heredity. If the principle of heredity is dispensed with, the incumbents of this post may begin to exercise their powers autocratically and this may lead to a disruption of the village administration. As it is, the authorities have the power of appointing any one they like in the place of a monigar going on leave, if they are not satisfied with his nominee. By the exercise of this very power, the authorities can regulate the village administration, without curtailing the right of heredity, which will reduce the morale of the applicants to this post.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

This article is continued in the Swadesamitran of the 29th January in which the correspondent takes exception to the provision in the Bill transferring certain powers now exercised only by Divisional officers to Tahsildars and Deputy Tahsildars on the same grounds that are adduced in an article about this Bill in the Hindu Nesan of the 13th idem abstracted in paragraph 81 of Report No. 4 of 1919.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

Village officers.

A correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd February, writes:—. . . The wretched condition of villages cannot improve, unless the hereditary right of these village officers who care so little for the well being of the village people is rooted out.

80. Referring to the release of political prisoners by the Bengal Government, the Hitakariani, of the 26th January, remarks:— . . . The kindness and the liberality shown by the Bengal Government in the matter of releasing innocent men are really laudable. Of the remaining 385 prisoners, many are, we hear, innocent and deserve release. The highmindedness of the Government will be all the more commendable, if they order the release of these men also after a just inquiry.

81. Under this heading, the Hitakarini, of the 26th January, publishes in Telugu an appeal made to the Indian leaders of various schools by the London correspondent of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, which contains:—. . . That India should be given the right of self-determination is the only fact to be specially emphasised. . . Papers like the Times here are trying to object to the application of the principle of self-determination to India. It is not necessary to prove the futility of such fabricated arguments. These very papers are expressing themselves in favour of deciding the question of the African and other colonies on the principle of self-determination. . . We have to place before the Peace Conference through the Prime Minister as firmly as we can the view that the progress of India is only possible under a self-conceived scheme of reforms.

An appeal to the Indian leaders of different shades of opinion.

82. Under this heading, the Hitakarini, of the 26th January, publishes in Telugu from the Ceylon Daily News, extracts from the speech of the Hon'ble Mr. Ramanadhan on political reforms in the Ceylon Legislative Council, which contain:—. . . The Governors are adepts in appointing dumb non-official members to the council. . . Another point. The Government are also in the habit of concealing from non-official members information relating to administrative matters. . . The authorities have forgotten that we are also members of the council along with officials, and that we are their equals. Whenever they saw us, they used to keep us at a distance like contemptible men. . . There was no lack of smiles and shaking of hands, but in reality they began to treat us as out casts by denying information required by us for the proper discharge of our duty by the sovereign and by the people, and by not caring to have our advice or consent.

83. With reference to the Declaration of Irish Independence by Sinn Feiners, the Andhraprakasika, of the 25th January, observes: —Further, we doubt if our Home Rulers like their Irish Sinn Feiner brothers may not enter Delhi and proclaim the independence of India. Already some are fondly asking whether an act which has not been regarded as an offence in Ireland would be considered so in India. Some are drawing wonderful inferences that as Lord French has not reprimanded the Irish Sinn Feiners, Lord Chelmsford also will not reprimand our Home Rulers for doing a similar act. . .

84. Regarding the desirability of having the Hon'ble Mr. Wood as the Director of Civil Supplies, the Andhraprakasika, of the 30th January, writes under this heading:—. . . There are some rumours that on the strength of special permits, some merchants are exporting rice in larger quantities to other localities than those fixed by the Director of Civil Supplies. . . Since it is difficult to expect from others the experience of Mr. Wood in working out the scheme prepared by him, in view of the complications that may arise out of it, we submit that it would be but proper to have him as the Director of Civil Supplies for a few months more at least.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 30th Jan. 1919.

The Manorama, of the 28th January, notes that the reduction of steamer freight on rice, from Rs. 50 to Rs. 35 per ton, will help to reduce the market price but wishes the Collector of Malabar to try and get also the railway freights on rice and other foodstuffs reduced to the original rates.

The Fifth Kistna District Ryots' Conference.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

87. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 31st January, writes :— Speaking at Indian Ruling Chiefs' Conference at Delhi, the Maharaja of Gwalior said that there would be much loyalty and contentment in the whole country, if the Montagu Reforms were still further widened to suit the present conditions and introduced very soon. When responsible Ruling Chiefs themselves are for improving the Montagu Reforms, it will be seen that the wishes of the people in this respect are but just. The Maharaja referred to reforms and not to repressive laws as the surest means to promote loyalty, and we request the Government to note his remarks.

88. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st February, writes :— . . The Madras Mail has cast all decency to winds in its condemnation of the national leaders. It wrote thus in its yesterday's issue : "If anybody wants meaningless raving, it is enough if he reads the criticisms of extremists on the Sedition Bills. . .".

ANDHRAPATHIKA, Madura, 1st Feb. 1919.

89. The Andhrapatrika, of the 1st February, gives in Telugu the remarks of the Bombay Chronicle regarding the constitution of the select committees appointed by Government for considering the Rowlatt Bills :— . . It is worth noting that such a leading member of the Council as the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya does not find a place on the select committees appointed by Government to consider the coercive Bills. . . His presence on the Industrial Commission went hard with the Simla bureaucracy. His conduct in other committees too was not liked by them."

The paper then remarks :—It is strange that not only Mr. Malaviya, but Mr. Jinnah, Mr. Sarma and Mr. Iyyangar even should not be on the committees.

An important defect.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 26th Jan. 1919.

91. Referring to the constitution of the Committee to inquire into the working of the India Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd February, remarks :—. . . 92. Regarding the proportion of Brahmans and non-Brahmans in the Judicial Department, the Andhraprakasika, of the 3rd February, writes in its leader :—Non-Brahmans are to be hardly seen in this department like stars during the day-time. . . This department is manned by Brahmans from top to bottom. We think that may be the reason for such an uncommon state of things. . . Though both Brahmans and non-Brahmans are equal in qualification, the former have come into prominence in the department through favouritism. We request the authorities in charge of this branch to note the above fact and do justice to educated non-Brahmans. . . We do not know whether the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Ayling, the appointing authority is unable to get suitable non-Brahman educated men for the posts of District Munsifs and Subordinate Judges or whether he is not aware of the meagre representation of non-Brahmans in his department. The number of Brahmans being only 15 lakhs, the 4 million non-Brahmans in the Presidency are dissatisfied that the claims of their educated men are not respected in the Judicial Department to the extent to which their numerical strength warrants. It will, therefore, be the duty of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Ayling and other Judges to remove this dissatisfaction. . .

The Judicial Department.

Then, after complaining that all the District Munsifs and Subordinate Judges in the Kistna district are Brahmans, the paper gives an instance of Brahman favouritism in filling up an acting clerk's vacancy in a District Munsif's Court. The facts are briefly these: A District Munsif recommended an unqualified Brahman for an acting clerk's post. The District Judge, while returning the application of that Brahman candidate, forwarded the applications of two qualified non-Brahman candidates, one a Muhammadan and the other a Nayudu, with the direction that qualified men should be appointed. The District Munsif did not appoint either of the candidates whose applications were forwarded to him by the District Judge; but he selected a qualified Brahman candidate.

With reference to the above incident, the paper observes:—. . . You ask: Has the Kistna District Judge calmly passed over the matter? . . . We are sorry that even European Judges are also stooping to such unjust practices? . . . Even European Judges are treating such highhandedness with indifference. We say that the Government and the Judges of the High Court will do well to take proper notice of such irregularities, and reprimand the officers at fault. . .

93. Referring to the donation of Rs. 30,000 contributed by Mr. Tilak to the Labour Party in England to convert the Herald into a daily, the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st February, observes:-- . . . In every country having a democratic form of government, the Labour Party is coming into power. Though such a result has not happened in England for some reasons, the present ministry is not likely to continue long. Fresh elections are inevitable next year at least, though not this year. Labour candidates are sure to predominate then, and there will be a Labour Ministry. If this does not come about, a revolution in England is inevitable. It may be said that it is our misfortune that the Labour Party should have failed to be triumphant for the present. . . When in the same British Empire, one party is suffering misery under the tyranny of capital while another, under the dominance of a bureaucracy, it is but natural that both should join hands and try to get at the pinnacle of freedom. It is doubtful how far the movement of Indian self-government will succeed under the present Unionist Government in England, which is opposed to liberty. . .

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Feb. 1919.

The practical wisdom of Mr. Tilak.

94. Reviewing Sir John Woodroffe's book, "Is India civilised?", a correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st February, writes:— . . Sir John Woodroffe says: Any sensible Indian who has lived for a little while in Europe can understand the brutality, the drunkenness, the horrible adultery, the revolting deeds and the bad conduct of the people there and can silence any western by bearing testimony to the wretched condition of the west. But such a miserable condition has not yet befallen this country.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Feb. 1919.

Is India civilised?

It seems that Mr. Elphinstone also wrote thus about India: Here, adultery is not so rampant as in the west. In this respect, India will teach a lesson to all the other countries. The westerners should be ashamed to look at the spotless character of Indians.

95. With reference to the rise of prices of foodstuffs, the Sudarsini, of the 15th January, writes in its leader under this heading:—All the strong hopes of the people that since the war has come to an end, prices of foodstuffs will go down and that there would be no more suffering for them, have been blighted, and prices are now rising higher than what they were during the war. . . Should the three hundred and thirty-three millions of men suffer for years together all sorts of troubles for want of food to eat and cloth to wear? O God! what kind of justice is this? It is proper if the European races who are going to benefit largely from the war suffer a little inconvenience just now; but why should those who have no hope and no advantage, suffer all this unbearable misery? . . When the people are restless under such a great famine, it is quite surprising that the

The burning hunger.

Government should say that the conditions are not yet so dark as to require their action in accordance with the Famine Code. Already, the whole country is being greatly agitated. Should this continue for some time more, we fear that untoward conditions may arise. We request the Government who are the parents of the people to make arrangements without a moment's further delay for the supply of plenty of foodstuffs in every district and for the sale of cloth to the poor at special concession rates. . . Indians may or may not have self-government. It is enough if they can appease their burning hunger. . . The proposal of the Government to enhance taxes on land at the present juncture comes, like a rain of fire in the mid-summer. . . It does not become the political wisdom of such a liberal-minded Government as the British. To try to remove misery as far as possible is a sign of liberality. Will it not be cruelty to throw additional burden on these unfortunate people?

DINA BANDHU, Masulipatam, 10th Jan. 1919.

96. Under this heading, the Dina Bandhu, of the 10th January, which was received on the 24th January, writes:—. . .

The new year honours.

Of those who deserve to be honoured, Mr. P. Venkatarangayya who is spending his money so freely for the poor is one. It is very strange that among Government servants none of Mr. V. Bhogappayya Sastri, Mr. Appadurai Pillai and Mr. Muhammad Humayun Sahib who have done hard work in connexion with the war should not receive any honour. . . It seems that people are talking in different ways of the title of 'Rao Saheb' conferred on Mr. Srinivasaraghava Achari, the Sarishtadar of the Kistna District Court. But we believe that the Government will not honour any one without reason.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

97. With reference to the present Coalition Government in England, the Andhrapatrika, of the 4th February, writes in its leader:— . . The New Statesman says. . . There may be fresh elections in 1920. The Labour Party will certainly come into power then, if it makes a diligent use of the opportunities before it.

The British Government: its present responsibilities.

The above lines were written a month ago Though they might appear then as conjectures only, it may be said that they will come out true from what has taken place since. The problems which the Government has now to face are so grave as to warrant such an assumption. . . One cannot but be struck with the doubt whether the Coalition Government can successfully deal with such questions as the Sinn Fein movement, the Labour unrest and the cry for complete independence for South Africa. In addition to these, it is necessary that the problems of India and Egypt should be solved at once. The responsibilities of the British Government are increasing day after day. The English people are not without the ability to solve such problems. If the present Government works in accordance with the wishes of the people, well and good. If not, there will be fresh elections soon and the Labour Party is sure to come to power then. . .

99. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 3rd February, has the following in its news columns:—There is great excitement everywhere in India regarding the question of reforms. Some people are beginning to think why we too should not organise a republic. It is impossible to say what will happen in course of time.

100. Anent the punishment awarded to a Rangoon merchant for starting an unlawful combined lottery and Kuri, the Manorama, of the 28th January, urges the necessity for Government holding an enquiry immediately into similar Kuris now being carried on in various parts of the Presidency, so as to prevent unlawful schemes under which the poor are likely to suffer loss.

101. Reviewing the report on Co-operative Credit Societies for 1917–1918, the Manorama, of the 31st January, considers the progress made during the year to be 'very satisfactory', and it endorses the opinion of the Government that the active co-operation of non-official leaders in the establishment and maintenance of Co-operative Credit Societies is very necessary, and that if they undertake such valuable work it will be an important and lasting benefit to their brethren in this land.

102. A note in the Manorama, of the 31st January, refers to the statement made by a correspondent of the Times of India that 4,700,000 tons of various foodstuffs, 3,000,000 tons of wheat, etc., were sent to England from India during the last four years and that it is a great pity that at least in consideration of the heartiness with which India made the above contribution to England, the Government of India cannot find its way to place five or six unengaged ships for the transport of rice, etc., from Burma, to relieve the distress of the people of India consequent on the scarcity of food in India, and adds that this year's famine is unprecedented and it is specially to be regretted that the Government of India is not doing the needful to arrange for the supply of rice and such other matters.

Referring to the withdrawal by the Government of Bombay of its prohibition to transport food grains from one district to another within the Province, the Manorama, of the 31st January, expresses its conviction that a similar withdrawal of prohibition in the Madras Presidency is likely to relieve the present situation and alleviate famine and distress. It commends the idea to the Government for consideration and necessary action.

(August—October 1918), pays him a glowing tribute for his selfless and courageous endeavours for the uplift of Mother India, and takes very strong exception to Mr. Montagu's 'disgraceful and unfounded' characterisation, in Parliament, of Mr. Ayyar's 'holy epistle' to President Wilson, as "disgraceful and unfounded."

Doctor Subrahmanya Ayyar's letter again.

105. In an article under the heading 'the origin of Vande Mataram, a correspondent of the Kerala Kesari, of Chingom-Kanni 1097 M.E. (August—October 1918) gives what he says is a compilation of the most reasonable portions of theories advanced by different people on the subject. He says:—It is a well-known fact that the East India Company, which came to India for establishing a match industry, used all sorts of devices, in and out of season, and thereby created splits among the Indian Princes, secured possession of the land and began to administer it. When Indians arose from their slumber what they actually saw was that the power of the English was firmly established in the land, and the land was filled with whitemen. The sons of India were extremely pained to contemplate the downfall of holy Mother India and consequently began to bestir themselves for the recovery of their lost glory. A Government conducted in accordance with the wishes of foreigners was not agreeable to anyone. But alas! What could be done! While we were sleeping they defrauded us and took everything under their control. . . During the administration of Warren Hastings a most terrible famine visited the northern parts of the country, but the administrators were not kind and sympathetic enough to make arrangements for the protection of the people.

KERALA KESARI, Ernakulam, Chingam-Kanni 1094 M.E. August—October 1918.

Vande Mataram.

---

* Received on the 29th January 1919.

On seeing that the Government was indifferent to the peoples' safety, the hearts of the people were filled with a desire for revenge, and the calm tempered sanyasis, and other large-hearted people made themselves ready to drive the foreigners out of the land. Even the uneducated masses were touched by the agitation, and the whole of India from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin shook with a tremor of vengeance. The sanyasis met in conclave and thought about plans to destroy the enemy. . . With Vande Mataram as their war cry, they began to loot the villages and kill all Europeans they came across. . . The Governor-General sent a large army against them, but it was impossible to defeat these irresistible people who were moved by the force of patriotism. They were also found to be great experts in carrying on a sort of gorilla warfare without giving the enemy an occasion for open fight. Wherever the trumpet sounded Vande Mataram, there, they were always victorious. . . The article concludes with a prayer to mother India to infuse the power of Vande Mataram in her children, who are striving with all their heart to restore to her freedom and prosperity.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 22nd Jan. 1919.

India's Under Secretary.

106. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 22nd January, referring to this subject, writes:—We should be grateful to the British Government for the treatment meted out to India. We are greatly indebted to the Hon'ble Mr. Montagu, the Secretary of State for India, and His Excellency Lord Chelmsford, the Viceroy of India, for drawing up a reform scheme for India, which greatly surpasses Lord Morley's Reforms. Although the extremists have expressed their disapproval of the reforms, the Indian community unanimously declares that the Montford Scheme will gradually confer on India the dignity of self-government.

In spite of the change in the Government, the same Premier, the same Secretary of State for India and the same Viceroy continue to hold office and now the Premier has graciously been pleased to confer on Sir S. P. Sinha, that able son of India, the exalted position of Under Secretary of State for India. This is a fresh chapter opened in Indian politics in British History. No one ever dreamt that such a high position would ever be conferred on an Indian.

We hope that Mr. Sinha will assist the Secretary of State as far as possible in the matter of the Reform Scheme and in his present position prove an acquisition to the House of Lords.

Indian Muhammadans hope that Lord Sinha will take his cue from the Premier and laying aside all racial bias, and prejudice expouse the cause of Mussalmans as well as that of the other communities of India.

MUSHIR-I-DAKHAN, Hyderabad, 27th Jan. 1919.

Congratulations to Sir S. P. Sinha on his being raised to a Peerage.

107. The Mushir-i-Dakhan, of the 27th January, writes:—Sir S. P. Sinha, Under Secretary of State for India, is the first Indian to be raised to the Peerage. The people of India are unable to adequately express their appreciation of the honour conferred upon their compatriot.

The writer expresses sincere thanks to His Majesty the King-Emperor of India and in congratulating Lord Sinha prays that he may live long to enjoy the distinction and to be mindful of Mother India.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Jan. 1919.

Lord Sinha.

The Desabhaktan, of the 21st January, publishes a contributton from Babu Bepin Chandra Pal to the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, in which, while welcoming the appointment of Lord Sinha as Under Secretary of State for India as a fulfilment of an assurance given in the Queen's Proclamation, he expresses the view that the principle of such appointments, which is based on the policy of Lord Morley in rallying the moderates to the side of the Government, will have a deleterious effect on public life in India.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

Mr. Tilak's suggestions.

108. The Qaumi Report, of the 28th January, referring to Mr. Tilak's suggestion that all India should elect a panel of twelve delegates, etc., observes:—Undoubtedly this is a sound proposal. Although the Peace Conference has to deal with mostly Islamic matters, yet no Muhammadan leader has been nominated. We again invite the attention of the Government to the fact that at least one Muhammadan leader is necessary at the Peace Conference who will be able to explain matters and save the different communities and commissions from erring. When the Government kindly approves of the delegates of obscure communities, will it not appoint one from the renowned Muhammadan community.

109. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 28th January, in a lengthy leader on this subject, writes:—The contribution (of a crore of rupees) demanded is undoubtedly a very large sum and difficult to realize in India especially in these hard times. It remains, however, to be seen whether immediate attention will be paid to His Excellency's request.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

His Excellency the Viceroy's appeal for a crore of rupees.

We will surely say that Indians should interest themselves in that behalf. Although we had to face hardships during the war, and people are still complaining of high prices, yet our condition calls for gratification when compared with that of the people of Bulgaria, Serbia, Montenegro, Roumania and France, etc.

The Editor in conclusion asks: is it not incumbent on the public to discharge its duties by paying something out of its pocket in support of those through whose exertions we are now reaping satisfaction? We hope that the sons of the soil will pay immediate attention to the Viceroy's appeal and give tangible proof of their generosity and liberality.

III.—LEGISLATION.

110. With reference to the condemnation of the Rowlatt Bills by the Leader, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd February, observes:—Anglo-Indian papers have been inducing the Moderates to support the Rowlatt Bills. But that this attempt has not met with sufficient success so far is proved by the observations of the Leader on the subject. . . We suggest that it is the duty of the other Moderate papers to express their disapproval of the Rowlatt Bills, as the Leader has done.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The Moderates and the Rowlatt Bills.

The Vaisyamitran, of the 27th January, remarks that these Bills would prove an obstacle to every work undertaken for the benefit of the public and observes:—Before drafting these Bills were the legal experts in India or England consulted on the matter? Such Bills are drafted by the official members of the Imperial Legislative Council as they like and passed into law with the help of their official colleagues and those non-officials who care for titles. These laws are not always worded clearly in the beginning, so that the Judges and lawyers find it possible to interpret the provisions thereof as they like. This itself shows how much confidence the Government have in the Indians. On the one side they praise the Indians saying that but for them the advance of the German hordes against Paris could not have been prevented and on the other they call the Indians seditionists and plead for the introduction of more stringent laws to deal with them than the existing ones. The fact that these Bills are the reward of the Indians for having sacrificed their all in the war should be communicated to the representatives of different countries assembled at the Peace Conference.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 27th Jan. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Swadesamitran, of the 28th January, refers in detail to the provisions of the second Bill and observes:—The provision that a mere notification by the Government that the scheduled offences prevail in any area will render Part I of the Bill applicable to that area is explained by saying that it is introduced only with the object of expediting trials in the interests of the public. The number of the scheduled offences in any particular area may slightly increase, owing to either high prices or some quarrel or other petty cause, and yet the Government can apply Part I of the Bill to it. The several safeguards which an accused has under the ordinary laws are affected much by this Bill, thus leading to the people losing their natural rights as subjects. Similarly the provisions in Part II will make it difficult for one to escape, even though he may be innocent, if he is suspected by the Government. The Police are the eyes and ears of the Government and the Police rely upon their informants. There is no appeal to the High Court against the order of the Government. Thus Part II of the second Bill deprives the people in an area notified by the Government of their right to prove their innocence through a public trial in a Court of Law established by His Majesty. So the result of the provisions of this Bill is to render the ordinary law ineffective and grant absolute powers to the Government. The Government have these powers already under the Defence of India Act. But, as the people have been objecting to the application of this Act on ordinary occasions, this Bill authorises the Government to exercise at any time the same powers, after notifying in the Gazette that there is a likelihood of unrest or disturbance occurring in any area. It practically empowers the Government to take away the rights of the subjects by a stroke of the pen, relying on the Police. While things are taking this turn in India, popular rights are being strengthened in Europe. President Wilson stated in the Peace Conference that it was the people of the United States that were the masters of that Government and that the one object with which they entered into the war was to secure for each nation in the world the privilege of determining its own form of government. When such excellent principles are in the air in Europe, an attempt is made in India to deprive the people of rights enjoyed by them from time immemorial, and this makes one doubt whether India does not form part of the world. But it was as a part of the world that it rendered all possible assistance to the Allies in the war. While remarking that the causes which led to this war should be rooted out, Mr. Wilson mentioned among such causes the suppression of the smaller kingdoms by the larger ones, the attempt to govern an unwilling people by the force of arms and the efforts made by a handful of people to control the world and decide the fate of different races even as pawns in a game of chess. Let us hope that the officials will recognise the defects pointed out by Mr. Wilson, as far as they are concerned, and, without trying to shape the destinies of this big country as they like, conduct the administration according to the wishes of the people.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 28th January, has no faith in the argument advanced that the Government will not apply the provisions of those Bills often and, remarking that, once the bureaucracy is entrusted with the powers under these Bills, they will surely exercise them on the slightest possible pretext, instances the case of the Press Act and the Defence of India Act to prove how the assurances given by the Government of occasional and sympathetic application came to nothing and exhorts the people throughout the country to raise their voice against these Bills being passed into law.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 28th Jan. 1919.

In commenting again on these Bills, the Desabhaktan, of the 28th January, observes:—The bureaucrats are going to bring into force the new repressive measures. There is no doubt that the obstinate bureaucrats will in their (Indian Civil Service) Association consider the ways of applying these measures in the respective districts. While the whole world is steeped in the joy of liberty, it is nothing short of barbarism to subject India alone to different kinds of cruel laws. The Indians have now well understood the ways and tactics of the bureaucrats. Let them know that it will be impossible hereafter to govern the Indians by means of repression. . . If the Indian non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council oppose the Bills, then the bureaucrats might preach that these Bills would be used only against anarchists and would not affect those that agitate lawfully. The Indian representatives should not be duped by these enticing words. They have already had instances in which they were so duped. So we warn them that it is no longer wise for them to believe the assurances which may be given by the bureaucrats and risk their primary rights. . . Perhaps the Rowlatt Committee have made a recommendation in the report to give up the jury system, only after knowing that the trend of the public opinion is in favour of liberty! What a bold act it should be to try to bring in repressive measures setting at naught public opinion. If the Government really want to put down anarchists, where is the harm in having trial by the jury system? The bureaucrats in India attempt to bring everlasting disgrace on the Britishers who have won laurels in the righteous war in Europe and Asia. What a mad Act it is on the part of the authorities in wantonly discording public opinion and thinking of conducting the administration as they please? O bureaucrats! Do not hurt the feelings of loyal Indians. You think that by repressive measures you can quell unrest and discontent in India. This is a wrong notion. You propose to reward the Indians with new repressive laws for their services during the war. We request you not to be ungrateful.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 29th January, reverts to this subject and observes:—The people have not been given even breathing time in this matter, for the Bills are to be introduced at the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council on the 6th instant. They should be glad that the Government have not chosen to suspend all rules regulating the conduct of business in the Council and get the Bills passed into law on the same day. No one could have discovered a better method of blocking the Home Rule propaganda work. While we longed to secure political powers, we are faced by the danger of losing even the existing paltry privileges. These Bills in effect frame a charge against all the 33 crores of people in India. If one commits an offence, no one would object to proper steps being taken to get him punished. But it is a novelty, unknown in any country, to deprive the people of a locality, a province, nay even throughout India, of the privileges to which they are legally entitled, merely on the presumption that a few are likely to commit some offences. If the words of Edmund Burke, that the natural rights of the human race are a Divine gift and that, if they are affected prejudicially by any action of the Government, such action should be dropped for that very reason, are true, the only proper course now will be to drop these Bills and not push them through the Council hastily. But the Government have decided not only to introduce them but also to refer them to a Select Committee. The constitution of this committee is again curious. First of all, it is not the Law Member but the Home Member that is in charge of these Bills. Similarly, care has been taken to avoid from the committee many who have a knowledge of law. The Hon'ble Mr. Sastri will be on it. He himself admitted at a meeting of the Council that he had not the required knowledge of law to opine on matters like this and yet the Government have attributed this admission to a sense of modesty on his part and decided to include him in the Select Committee, deeming him to be fully qualified to express an opinion on these Bills. Of the two representatives of this Presidency in the Imperial Council, the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma is well versed in law, as the Government are aware, while the Hon'ble Mr. Sastri has admitted his ignorance of law. Perhaps this is the very reason why the Government have decided to choose the latter in preference to the former for the committee! Similarly the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohun Malaviya is an emenient lawyer and he has sacrificed his life for the public welfare. Why has he not then been included in this committee? Perhaps his inclusion as a member of the Industries Commission has given a taste of him! The haste with which the Government are moving and the clever way in which they are forming the Select Committee clearly show that they are decided upon getting these Bills passed soon without much of change. So, unless the people throughout the country meet and alter the obstinacy of the Government by communicating their protests against these Bills, even the existing happiness of the Indian community will be curtailed.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

Reproducing in Tamil the comments of the Bombay Chronicle on these Bills, and accepting the same the Desabhaktan, of the 29th January, observes:—India has helped England at a critical juncture only with the idea of strengthening the relationship between her and England. While so, why do the bureaucrats in India attempt to spoil it? What profit would they derive if India is at variance with England? Are not the benefits conferred on India by the bureaucrats enough? Why should they think of doing her further evil? They have carried and are still carrying away the wealth and other things of India. Ah! The bureaucrats have too much of gratitude!!

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 31st January, again writes on this subject as follows:—If these Bills are passed into law, then the Indians, whether rich or poor, educated or uneducated, will be required to be under the Police rule. We need not say anything at length about this rule in India, which generally means tyranny. The Indians should therefore raise a hue and cry against these Bills being passed and this cry should reach the British public and His Majesty.

The same paper exhorts the Home Rule Leagues and Congress Committees to hold protest meetings in every village and communicate the resolutions to the Viceroy, the Prime Minister and the President of the Peace Conference, and observing that a danger has now arisen in India to the liberty and property of man, remarks that, if the Rowlatt Bills are passed, India will be ever a country under bondage and slavery.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 31st January, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, a lengthy article on these Bills, in which the following observations occur among others:—The laws made here which either contravene the laws of God or refute them, are unjust and cruel ones Such laws will root out human society. The repressive measures which the Government now propose to introduce are not only unjust, but are also barbarous in character. It will be want of wisdom on the part of the authorities to subject all the people alike to a barbarous act. Brothers and sisters! Bear in mind that the whole Indian community will perish if the murderous Rowlatt Bills are passed. You should see that these Bills are not passed. I urge this on you as one of your duties.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919 & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Jan & 1st Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 31st January, and the Desabhaktan, of the 31st January and the 1st February, publish in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held in Madras on the 30th January 1919 to protest against the passing of these Bills.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 31st January, reiterates some of the arguments adduced by it already against these Bills and, echoing the views expressed about them at the public meeting held in Madras on the previous day and remarking that, while the British statesmen have been unstinting in their praises of the willing help rendered by India, they have permitted the introduction of repressive measures to any extent, adds:—It is the duty of the Government of India to prove the existence of a state of affairs which will justify their attempt to legislate on the lines recommended by the Rowlatt Committee. As they have not even tried to do this, it can be surely taken that such a condition has not arisen. A suggestion has been made at the public meeting yesterday that, if it is a fact that these Bills are introduced only in the interests of the public, their consideration may be postponed till the new Legislative Council is formed, seeing that the present Council does not represent the public and we learn a resolution to this effect will be moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Patel at the next meeting. Though the authorities may, in their present temperament, find it hard to accept this suggestion, it is clear from the views expressed at yesterday's meeting by people holding different political views that, unless the suggestion is acted upon, the Government will be creating an excitement among people who are now peaceful. The Bills were condemned by all classes of politicians yesterday and the Government should take the resolutions passed at the meeting to voice the public opinion of the country. Otherwise, let them add a preamble to the Bills to the effect: 'Whereas it is necessary to excite a peaceful people, it is hereby enacted as follows'.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

Referring to the proceedings of the protest meeting recently held in Madras and to a communication appearing in the Hindu from the pen of Mr. C. Rajapogala Achariyar of Salem, questioning the competency of the Government of India to enact a law of the nature of these Bills, the Hindu Nesan, of the 31st January, comments as follows:—When once a doubt has arisen in the matter, if the Government of India should without clearing the doubt enact a strange piece of legislation like this, the result will be nothing but unrest. The desirability or otherwise of enacting such a law should be decided by the Parliament, because the public will have greater confidence in their decision than in that of the Council of the Government of India, as the official element predominates in the latter body and as it is the Executive Council of the Government of India that prepared these Bills. It is essential to know impartially whether the Imperial Legislative Council is empowered to pass these two Bills. In our opinion the Government of India do not seem to have such power. Even if it should be decided otherwise, we should represent to the British public that it is the prayer of the Indian people that the question of passing these Bills should be decided by the British Parliament as they involve many matters of vital importance.

The Desabhaktan, of the 31st January, and the Swadesamitran, of the 1st February, publish in Tamil the resolutions passed at a meeting held at Salem, on the 29th January 1919 (?) protesting against these Bills.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919 & SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

Adverting to the proceedings of the protest meeting held at Madras, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st February, remarks that the statement made by Mr. Rangaswami Ayyangar at that meeting that the Imperial Legislative Council has no power to pass these Bills into law, and that the present Council is not a representative body of people but is only a tool in the hands of the Executive Government, is not unfounded, and observes:—Even the Government of India seem to have no power to pass these repressive laws. It is then highly unjust and improper for them to venture to bring into force such measures. While it is the duty of the Government to rule the country in such a way as to promote civilization and education, they are determined to act otherwise.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Feb. 1919.

The same paper again comments on these Bills in the following strain:—We are afraid that the excitement now caused by these Bills, may lead to any unrest when they are passed into law. Mr. Yakub Hasan expressed the same fear when he spoke in the protest meeting recently. The majority of the Indian politicians are anxious lest the British armies in India should have much work to do. . . The Government of India comprised of the bureaucrats have not published the Rowlatt Committee's report in full. They say that portions which would not be interesting to the public have been omitted. But how do they know that the public would read only certain parts and not others? The views and the acts of the Government of India are indeed wonderful! The Indian politicians ask what the purpose is of publishing the Rowlatt Committee Report immediately after the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals came out. It has been the custom for India to recieve reforms and repressive measures simultaneously. It is thought by wise men that the purpose of publishing the Rowlatt Committee Report just after the publication of the reform proposals is to repress the politicians who may agitate that the reforms are defective and demonstrate to the British public that, as there are anarchical schemes in India as stated in the Rowlatt Committee Report, granting too many reforms to her is undesirable. We do not correctly know what the motive of the Government of India is.

The Rowlatt Bills.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd February, reverts to a consideration of these Bills and observes as follows among other things:—If the Defence of India Act, which is essentially a war measure, and the regulation of 1818, which was passed at a time when order had not been restored in the country, are not applied, the authorities can get one, whom they suspect, punished only after proving his guilt in a court of law. But if these Bills are passed into law, this principle will cease to be. It is stated in the Administration Report of the Government of India for last year that there was no unrest of any kind in the country, and that there was no political agitation whatever as far as the ordinary classes were concerned. Where is, then, the necessity for a piece of legislation, which affects the liberty of the people? None else but the bureaucracy can make it dangerous for the people, who exercise their liberty of speech and writing and, if the bureaucracy go to this length, who is to check them? The Parliament, which has this power legally, is far away, and so, if the people, who are affected by the administration here, are prevented from expressing their opinion, the bureaucracy will come to have absolute powers. Raja Ram Mohan Rai wrote to Lord Crawford in 1828 expressing his regret at the then Government frequently passing laws without consulting the people and ascertaining their feelings. Ninety years have since passed, but there has been no change in the trend of the Government. Laws are passed still without realising the feelings of the people and even when they are realised, without caring for them.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 4th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article in which the following observations find place:—Till now we were freely giving vent to our grievances. We are gagged hereafter. Russian laws are dancing in British India with gaping mouths and making us their victims. True patriots will have to succumb to the Rowlatt Bills. When Mazzini, the celebrated Italian patriot, was walking along the street meditating on something while he was a boy, he was arrested by the Austrian authorities. When his father questioned the authorities as to the cause of his arrest, he was told in reply that in Italy youths were not permitted to walk about the streets meditatively. I apprehend whether such measures will be introduced in our sacred country too! This kind of Home Rule we do not want. Brethren, there is only one way of getting rid of this law. When this law comes into force, true patriots should silently walk to the prison house and call out: "Officers, open the doors. We will enter the prison now because we have to do it one day or other and why should we give you unnecessary trouble then"? If the whole of India acts in this manner, this law will be defeated.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 3rd February, publishes the proceedings of a public meeting held at Dindigul on the 1st idem to protest against the passing of the Rowlatt Bills, and this paper and the Desabhaktan in their issues of the 4th idem publish a summary of the proceedings of a similar meeting recently held at Tuticorin.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 31st January, publishes in Telugu the proceedings of the public meeting held in the Gokhale Hall to protest against the new Criminal Law Bills and summaries of the speeches delivered thereat. An English version of the same proceedings appears in the Hindu of the same date. With reference to the meeting, the Patrika observes:—A perusal of the proceedings of yesterday's meeting at the Gokhale Hall will show the feeling of indignation which the new Bills are arousing in the country. . . The new Government will be in a position to appreciate well the difficulties of the people. . . Anyhow, there is no doubt that the Bills will be passed into law by the Imperial Legislative Council. The people should not give up the matter on this ground. They should try to test the competency of the Government of India to enact such a law and see that the Parliament itself takes up these Bills for consideration. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th February, publishes in Telugu brief reports of the public meetings held at Calcutta, Nagpur Bezwada and Rajahmundry to protest against the Rowlatt Bills.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 31st Jan. 1919.

Excess Profits Duty Bill.

111. The Dravidan, of the 31st January, publishes in Tamil a long leader reproducing the sentiments contained in a leaderette in Justice of the 30th idem on this subject.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The First Kistna District Village Officers' Conference.

112. Under this heading, Andhraprakasika, of the 3rd February, notes from the speech of the Chairman of the Reception Committee a passage containing:—. . . It will be no exaggeration to say that the very next day that the hereditary right is taken away, the whole Government from the village to the Imperial administration will fall into disrepute. There cannot, therefore, be a piece of greater shortsightedness than the attempt to destroy this right.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 8th Jan. 1919.

A criticism on the Village Officers Act Amendment Bill.

113. Under this heading, the Desabhimani, of the 8th January, reproduces from the second Telugu pamphlet published by the Guntūr District Association criticising the Hereditary Village Officers Act Amendment Bill, a portion, which contains:—. . . The provision sanctioning the appointment of a qualified man from the divided family of the permanent office holder, if one such cannot be found in the undivided family, violates the law of primogeniture, as laid down in the Hindu sastras. . . The amendment gives power to a Deputy Tahsildar to disqualify a man who, however, learned and respected, happens to be poor, if he does not like him for any reason. Then, it is very difficult to understand the meaning of such terms as "bringing the Government into contempt" and "the tranquility of the village" which are used in the disqualification relating to public peace. The result of all this would be, it may be said without doubt, that all those who fail to please the Deputy Tahsildar or superior officers and incur their displeasure will come under the above disqualifications. It can be said with certainty that the bureaucracy will disqualify all those sympathising with and working to some extent for the cause of the public. . .

To bring down these offices which are governed by the Hindu law of primogeniture to the level of ordinary posts filled up by Government from time to time is contrary to justice and political traditions, besides being a source of unbounded discontentment in the country.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Feb. 1919.

The repressive policy of the Government of India.

114. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills, the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st February, writes under this heading:—The Government of India are determined to pass the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee into law. In the past, they gave the Morely Reforms with one hand and the Press Act with the other. While Mr. Montagu is busy in England in preparing the scheme of self-government for India, here the Government of India are trying to enact repressive laws which cut at the root of the fundamental rights of man. No amount of cries and protests of the people will avail. Once the Government have made up their mind, their will becomes law against any odds. When the people have no power of legislation, their cries will be but cries in wilderness. . . We are hailing the advent of self-government with acclamation. We are expressing our joy at the appointment of Sir S. P. Sinha as the Under Secretary for India in the House of Lords. But ropes are being prepared to stifle liberty to-morrow. Are these the days of freedom?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

The Ongole taluk village officers' conference.

115. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th February, publishes the proceedings of the Ongole taluk village officers' conference, and the resolution passed thereat.

DESABHIMANI, Guntūr, 29th Jan. 1919.

The Sedition Bills.

116. With reference to the new Sedition Bills, the Desabhimani, of the 29th January, writes:— . . . The secret sessions held by the Rowlatt Commissions are themselves proofs of the fact that the procedure adopted, and the information collected by them were alike unjust and illegal. . . They have suggested in their report many modifications to the present criminal law. Some of those modifications are meant to be temporary and some others to be permanent. All these proposed amendments are detrimental to the rights of the people in India. Such laws are not in force in any country. The Indian National Congress after discussing at length all these aspects of the matter, wholly condemned the report on sound reasons. It is highly regrettable that in these circumstances the Government in disregard of public opinion should try to introduce Bills at the next session of the Imperial Legislative Council with a view to passing into law the recommendations made in the report. . . It seems highly strange and perverse to us that such repressive measures which are a menace to the freedom of the loyal people of India who have fought so bravely in the war should be sought to be enacted for the purpose of punishing a few anarchists who are found to exist only in some corner. The new amendments upset many principles of law and are unknown in any other civilised country in the world. They violate the principle of English Law, which lays down that the accused should be presumed to be innocent, till his guilt is proved. Another strange provision of the new Bills denies the right of appeal to the convicted. The necessity for passing into law a Bill with many such harsh provisions has not been shown. To pass it after peace has been established in the country is unjust. . . Mr. Rajagopala Achari of Salem questions the power of the Government of India to enact such a law. It seems that the members of the Rowlatt Commission were themselves doubtful on this point. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 29th Jan. 1919.

The New Repressive Act.

117. Adverting to the Rowlatt Bills, the Andrapatrika, weekly of the 29th January, writes in its leader under this heading:— . . . There is no wonder in the new repressive Act causing deep regret to all Indians and to all lovers of British Empire. . . Who can maintain that a necessity has arisen in the beginning of the year 1919, for these coercive measures which were found to be unnecessary at the time of passing the Indian Penal Code eighty years ago and at the time of the Great Indian Mutiny sixty years ago? It will be ridiculous to say that after eighty years of British Rule, India has become a hot bed of sedition which has been unknown to her all these years. Even admitting this to be true, it is the British Government and not the people of India who are responsible for this spread of sedition. . . It is painful that the British authorities, merchants, and editors in India should fail to understand the secret of one of the most important lessons taught by the war, namely, that sedition and revolution which are so common in countries governed chiefly by coercive legislation are but very rarely met with in countries having free and independent forms of Government. . . Punishment of offenders by means of the strong provisions of the Penal Code already in force is a feature of all civilised governments. The substitution of the methods of a despotic government in place of the principles of civilised governments frustrates the very object of the British Government. . . It is against statesmanship to try to enact laws on the basis of the drastic recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission. . . Saying that the loyalty of the people checked the conspiracies of the revolutionaries, the commission has recommended repressive laws for the whole of India in order to punish a few offenders. . . On reading the new Bills from beginning to end, we are afraid that they will cut at the very root of personal freedom in India, should they become law. . . Since the members of the Rowlatt Commission are themselves doubtful of the competency of the Government of India to pass these Bills into law, it is of the utmost importance in the interests of India and the British Empire as well that legal experts should decide the point and prevent this fresh coercion. . .

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. Patel's Hindu Inter-marriage Bill.

118. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 31st January, in a leading article condemning the Hindu Inter-caste Marriage Bill, remarks:—'The Bill aims at too radical a piece of reform and is directly contrary to the ancient codes of law. The argument that marriage under the new measure is purely optional is as ridiculous as the opening of public houses in fresh localities and stating that they are meant only for persons who stand in need of them. The contention that the Bill aims at giving individual liberty of action becomes meaningless when it is remembered that individual likes and dislikes have perforce to be overlooked whenever they are at variance with matters of communal importance. Just as the authorities are wont to tell us when we demand self-government that reform should be gradual—though there is no precedent in history to show that a full measure of political reform granted all at once has led to any untoward results—social reform too should be gradual and may be commenced with the liberty of inter-marriage among the numerous sub-sects of the four principal castes. The orthodox sections of Hindu society at all the important cities have protested very strongly against the Bill and it is the duty of the orthodox classes including the heads of the various religious institutions and the priests in South Kanara as well to gauge the trend of current events and express their opposition to the Bill by means of resolutions at meetings duly communicated to His Excellency the Viceroy.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Rowlatt Committee.

119. In an article criticising the Bills based on the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 31st January, observes:—The provisions of the new law make it fully evident that the bureaucracy intends to put an end to all popular liberty of speech and writing. . . Even words, signs and expressions against the 'public servant', which means the bureaucracy are to be regarded as sedition. In short, this new measure expects that the people should silently put up with the doings of the bureaucracy without passing any comments whatsoever. We see before us a series of eclipses both here and in England even before the dawn of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. The monster shadow of the Rowlatt Committee is already darkening the horizon in the shape of a new law. We would request the authorities to give effect to just one suggestion which was made by the Hindu, namely, that the new Bill should be laid before the statesmen who meet at the Peace Conference; the Conference will then know in what manner the bureaucracy is going to reward poor India who has so dutifully helped the Imperial Government and their Allies in the great war.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 5th Feb. 1919.

The Moslem Marriage Registation Bill.

120. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 5th February, observes that the Moslems would do well to support the Moslem Marriage Registration Bill inasmuch as it merely seeks to give the parties the option of strengthening the evidence in regard to marriage by a simple process of registration in addition to the customary rites, if necessary; and that the Bill would prove a great help in curtailing the expenses of marriage among the poor.

"The Black Bills."

121. Under the heading 'The Black Bills,' the Lokaprakasam, of the 3rd February, writes as follows in English :—The series of public meetings held from the Himalayas to the Cape protesting against the passing of the Criminal Procedure Amendment Bills on the harsh recommendations of the Rowlatt Report is a clear testimony of the unpopularity of the measure the authorities seem bent upon adding to the Statute Book. . . In these days of advance and progress of democratic institutions, when the Government of Great Britain is desirous of improving the reciprocal relation between the Governors and the governed, it is idle to think that in the teeth of so much opposition and public discontent, they will pass the measure now on the legislative anvil. We refuse to believe it as being more undiplomatic than unstatesmanlike.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, 3rd Feb. 1919.

The Municipal Bill and Muhammadans.

122. The Qaumi Report, of the 27th January, referring to Mr. Yakub Hasan's Minute of Dissent on the Select Committee's report regarding the Madras Municipal Bill, writes :—As the matter is at present before the Government, it is incumbent on the Muhammadans to repeatedly draw the attention of the authorities to the question and to appeal for the grant of our rights. We, too, have the right to a share in the management of municipal affairs, but we have been overwhelmed by the numerical superiority of the Hindus. If the Government were to draw a distinction between the Hindu and the Muhammadan communities, each would enjoy the right of electing its own commissioner.

The Editor advises the Muhammadans of Madras to convene a general meeting and to invite the attention of the Government to the fact that it is necessary to take such steps as will secure our separate rights, and to point out that unless we are given the right of separate election we can derive no advantage from the advancement or the expansion of the Empire.

We hope His Excellency Lord Pentland's Government will deal justly with the appeal of the Muhammadans.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 27th Jan. 1919.

IV.—NATIVE STATES.

A declaration by His Excellency the Viceroy on self-government.

123. The Mushir-i-Dakhan, of the 27th January, says:—In November last when placing the young Maharaja of Bharatpur on the Masnad, His Excellency the Viceroy made an important and statesmanlike speech, in the course of which he observed :—

"In Europe self-government is being established in lieu of autocratic rule. The Government of India decided that the people of India should have a fair share in the administration of their country Native States should also infuse into their governments the spirit of freedom and self-government; for, without it, the interests of peoples cannot be safeguarded from the influence of autocracy."

At a time when the Reform Scheme is under discussion, His Excellency's declaration is very encouraging and shows that the Viceroy supports and favours the idea that responsible government should be introduced in British India and in Indian States. At the same time he is opposed to interference by the Imperial Government in the internal affairs of the States.

This pronouncement in effect instructs the Indian States where there are no Local Funds or Corporation Boards to establish such institutions as expeditiously as possible with a view to their affording the necessary training in the principles of self-government.

ENGLISH PAPERS.

II.—Home Administration.

1. The West Coast Spectator, of the 6th February, remarks:—"Speaking of the Walavanad case, we should very much like to hear what the police authorities have done with the inspector whose conduct in not producing an important piece of documentary evidence was severely criticised by the Sessions Judge. The public expected at least an indifferent inquiry and subsequent whitewashing, but nothing has, as yet, been heard. In Mr. Windle we have a conscientious, honest head of the department who, we know, is rough on slackers and questionable characters and we trust he will even now hold an inquiry."

2. In an article under the heading "Is it Executive interference", the South Indian Mail, of the 10th February, writes:—"A meeting of the district people's association was held on the 1st instant with a view to consider resolutions for protesting against the introduction of the Sedition Bills and preventing them from becoming law. The meeting was a private one and it was necessary that the discussion there should be open only to members. But owing to the presence of Mr. Ramachandra Ayyar, C.I.D. Sub-Inspector, the discussion could not go on as it was sure that the whole proceedings would become public. . . The question is, has the police any right to interfere in meetings which are strictly private? The Sub-Inspector was requested by Mr. M. Narayanaswami Ayyar to withdraw on the ground that the general body, at that stage, could not allow its proceedings to be interfered with by the executive. The Sub-Inspector said that he had orders to remain there and would not withdraw. . . The public opinion in this country is decidedly of opinion that deprivation of the most elementary rights of citizenship as in the present instance is injurious to the growth of the sense of constitutional agitation and the bureaucracy does not see that its interference in such an officious way is dangerous to the prolongation of good understanding between the rulers and the ruled. It is the height of madness in these days of readjustment to accentuate the difference and every care ought to be taken to realise that the representative of the executive takes a very serious responsibility in an attempt to tread under foot the right of a citizen to hold a private meeting. . . It is a humiliation to feel that even before the Rowlatt Bills become law, public life is begun to be threatened with degradation and extinction."

3. In an article under the heading "Missionary Insolence" in which reference is made to the action of the Rev. Johnstone of the C.M.S. College Hostel, Calcutta, in throwing an image of goddess Saraswati into a dust-bin, New India, of the 14th February, remarks:—"The foreign Missionary has all the vices of the foreign administrator and exploiter, and also something else which is more blighting than what the latter possess. Under the guise of religion, he exploits the young Igdian's self-respect, his love for his country, his religion, history and traditions. In other words, he effects a moral and spiritual bankruptcy which is infinitely worse than the material exploitation of the foreign merchant, planter or the miner. . . Wholesale and persistent calumny of Indians and their sacred institutions and the consequent decay of faith and morale in the young pupils is quite common. . . Only in India can these bigoted bullies take vulgar advantage of the peaceful and reverent dispositions of our boys. . . It is a pity that the country is helpless against unclean-minded people and that too foreigners, like the reverend gentleman in question."

Agrarian discontent in Malabar.

4. The West Coast Spectator, of the 11th February, has the following:—"The Ernad outbreak once again forcibly reminds us of the existence of agrarian discontent in Malabar. . . There is acute distress in the interior, paddy is held in reserve by certain jenmies and demands made to them by the poor for releasing the surplus stock have been treated with derision. . . We have been fighting shy of the agrarian problem for a very, very long time; the Government have let it alone the jenmies have cleverly, camouflaged it and the agrarian reformer cries in the wilderness. Poverty, which is at the root of every crime, cannot be removed from Malabar without a satisfactory settlement of the agrarian question, unless eviction, except for valid and reasonable reasons, is entirely stopped, and the cultivator given an incentive to improve his holding without fear of being driven away by a rival aided and abetted by his landlord. Give us the three F's—the three F's which Gladstone found so very effective in Ireland and almost put down agrarian crime and discontent—namely, fair rent, fixity of tenure and freedom of sale, is the cry that has gone forth, the cry we have heard since 1875. . . As we have repeatedly said, agrarian discontent is becoming keener and keener as days advance, and we fear that the principle of 'self-determination,' whatever that may mean, of which we hear so much, has caught the tenants of Malabar also."

The kerosene oil situation.

5. The West Coast Spectator, of the 4th February, has the following:—"We deeply regret to have to note that the 'kerosene oil situation' in Calicut has become intolerable. We have off and on pointed out in these columns the remedies the public considers the best to deal with the chronic distemper, but the tendency so far on the part of the officials has been to let it alone or to issue ponderous platitudes in the shape of communiqués. These communiquès and pious exhortations have, however, fallen flat, and the result is that yesterday the price of a bottle of inferior oil was 12 annas. . . An earlier communiqué issued by the Local Government laid it down that permit-holders who sold oil above the rates fixed should be immediately arrested, taken before a first-class Magistrate, and convicted if the evidence was strong. . . We have, however, reason to believe that this direction of the Government is respected more in the breach than in observance. Nearly a week ago, a respectable citizen of Calicut complained against a permit-holder. Instead of arresting the man at once and inquiring into the case, the District Magistrate's office quietly sends on the complaint to the Tahsildar asking the latter functuary to report through the police authorities! That means it will take another two weeks before the matter is finally settled. This is a case of red tape with a vengeance, and we least expected that such an important case would be bound by red tape in the face of an explicit Government Order. Our inquiries have elicited the fact that Mr. Hall knows absolutely nothing of this complaint and that it was forwarded to the Tahsildar's circumlocution office by some taper or Tadpole in his office. We hope Mr. Hall, who is nothing if not strenuous and prompt, will hold a searching inquiry and deal properly with the party who is responsible for this violation of an explicit ruling of the Government. . . Knowing Mr. Hall's energy and shrewdness as we do, we have no doubt he will take the situation promptly in hand and deal mercilessly with profiteers, high or low, and their friends who stand behind the scenes."

Commonweal, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

Dr. M. A. Ansari's address and the Punjab Government.

6. The Commonweal, of week ending 7th February, writes:—"An outrageous insult has been levelled at the All-India Moslem League and Moslems in general by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. His Honour has declared forfeited to His Majesty all copies, both in English and vernacular, wherever found, of Dr. M. A. Ansari's address as Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Moslem League Session at Delhi, and the reason for this high-handed action is that the address 'contains matter which is likely to incite acts of violence and disloyalty to the King-Emperor, and to sympathy with His Majesty's enemies, to create feelings of hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects and to excite dissatisfaction towards the Government.' Is it possible to believe that in any other country in the world the address of a much respected and responsible public man of the position of Doctor Ansari to a constitutional body would be treated by the administration in this high-handed manner?"

7. In a leader under the heading 'The Great Surrender,' the Hindu, of the 8th February, observes:—"The bureaucrat has triumphed. If in the hour of his apotheosis we may introduce a jarring note, it would be merely to wonder at the completeness of his success. His bluff had not even the merit of verisimilitude: it was so palpably and unshamedly a bluff. Yet by holding a pistol at the head of the distinguished authors of the scheme—an ancient weapon more dangerous to the user than the opponent—he has routed the Viceroy and forced as abject a surrender as the records of Viceregal invertebracy could show. . . In other words His Excellency has offered the services such guarantees as would convert the scheme into a blatant caricature of the self-government that was promised to this country. That this is not straining the possibilities of the situation will, we think, become clear when the nature of these guarantees is considered. Judging from their extent and scope it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the whittling-down process has already begun and that the country will be sitting at a Barmecide's banquet by the time the scheme becomes a reality. . . In the circumstances we may be excused if we choose rather to commiserate the Viceroy on his predicament than to congratulate him, as he seems ingenuously to expect, on the grace with which he has rounded an awkward corner. . . The answer of the Viceroy, stripped of its somewhat superfluous verbiage, is in effect to ask them to continue to rule only consenting to a not very convincing camouflage as a concession to popular clamour. A public that does not share the Viceroy's robust faith in the service's beatific virtues may well be entitled to ask where it stands in this tender scene of reconciliation between him and the services. Had not a wider question been involved than that of discipline, the Viceroy may be felicitated on his airy grace in wriggling out of an awkward corner, a grace reminiscent, as Lord Rosebery once said, of a butterfly—with a pin through it. But the public has a right to protest if this feat of Viceregal acrobatics is performed at the cost of sacrificing a still further portion of the not very generous measure of reform proposed in the scheme."

The Viceroy and the services.

Hindu, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

8. New India, of the 11th February, states:—"It is curious that so little attention has been paid by the Indian Press to the apparent determination of the Government of India, presumably with the sanction of the Secretary of State, to perpetuate conscription for Europeans and Anglo-Indians. Only a short time ago His Excellency the Viceroy declared at a meeting of the Indian Defence Force in Calcutta that the defence of this country must largely lie in the hands of the British, and that, therefore, it was necessary to continue the existence of a force which originally had been intended to last only during the War. . . On the other hand, the decision to continue conscription for Europeans and Anglo-Indians is not only additional evidence of the Government's unconquerable distrust of the Indian people, but shows a pernicious lack of appreciation of the very objects for which Great Britain has fought and conquered in the War now over. It is important to chronicle and to denounce such an attitude, so that overwhelming evidence may be accumulated as to the vital need for reform in the system by which this country is governed. It cannot too strongly be insisted that almost all important legislation undertaken since the War is highly retrograde, and, while the fight must necessarily centre mainly round the Rowlatt Bills, we must by no means lose sight of the spirit in which the decision has been taken to maintain an armed European and Anglo-Indian force for the ostensible purpose of defending a country which its inhabitants are presumed to be incompetent to protect. . . What we are concerned with is the deliberate insult to the Indian people which such legislation implies. At the present moment, India's prospects are undoubtedly the reverse of hopeful. It almost seems as if her great services during the War have not been thought worth remembering, and that now that the Government is free from other preoccupations, a policy of severe repression is not regarded as inconsistent with Britain's debt to India."

Hindu, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

Lawyers and the Reforms Scheme.

9. The Hindu, of the 12th February, observes:—"We understand that, as a result of the gatherings held by some of the members of the legal profession in Madras to consider the present political situation, the following manifesto has been decided to be issued and it is being sent round for signature not only among the members of the legal profession but also among others. . . The manifesto is not only inconsistent with the resolutions passed at the Delhi Congress, but in some respects it is at variance with the resolutions adopted at the Bombay Special Congress. . . We do not desire to-day to go into a fuller discussion of the manifesto, but we must express our grave doubts as to the wisdom and expediency of issuing such manifestoes, accentuating points of difference among our public men, at a time when unity of action and solidarity of opinion are most essential."

Hindu, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms Scheme.

10. The Hindu, of the 12th February, says:—"Certain sapient politicians of the Junker school of thought have epitomised a volume of criticism of the scheme in the pregnant phrase: 'A Leap in the Dark'. . . Granting the absence of illumination it is at least possible to argue that the term 'leap' is a misnomer in what is at best a cautious and hesitating step forward, with more ample provision for speedy retracing than for a bold continuance of progress. . . It has been claimed by the authors of the report that their scheme offers the best, even the only, solution of the problem of introducing responsible Government. That scheme finds its real test in the manner in which it satisfies this pledge. Every other consideration apart, it is the duty of the Indian public to see that the trial is a fair one. The vastness of the Governor's powers under the scheme makes the chances of any real self-government precarious. The authors have talked eloquently of guarantees which, stripped of camouflage, would act in effect to fostering the evils they are ostensibly designed to prevent. . . The revolt of the services however has succeeded in coercing the Viceroy into further concessions to reaction, which acting upon on already attenuated measure of reform would have the effect of reducing the scheme to the hollowest of shams. . . It is not necessary at this stage to demonstrate how hostile the spirit of the services is to anything in the shape of reform. That has been made clear with brutal frankness in a recent document. They have definitely refused to give up their rights for merely to justify the 'faith within us'. It is clear, therefore, that the cordial co-operation which the authors expected from the services has been transmuted into active opposition. . . . It is the concessions in regard to the position of services and European commerce under the Indian ministers that we assert must prove fatal to success. In the first place European subordinates of the Indian ministers are to have the right of direct access to the Governor. . . A more absurd anomaly could hardly be conceived than that of investing a Governor with powers of final decision, of making a faineant minister a stalking-horse and handing the strings for working this puppet show to the bureaucracy. . . Again what about the position of the Governor? He must, it appears, be not merely an archangel but also consent to serve as the hewer of wood and drawer of water for the services. He must persuade obstreperous ministers into reason by influence and persuasion and tactful exercise of authority. . . When so many and heavy interests are confided to the Governor's care he would be more than human if he resists the chance of taking the line of least resistance. The services can be very nasty indeed if their privileges are threatened. European commerce has carried to the pitch of a fine art the accomplishment that consists in howling before one is hurt. In this scramble for the Governor's good graces it is hardly likely, even granting to him the best of wills in the world, that the people's representatives would have much chance. . . We are clearly of opinion that a new situation has been created in regard to reforms by this unedifying surrender and that that situation requires a searching canvass. The old shibboleths may as well be thrown on the scrap-heap and politicians cease to split hairs on whether the scheme is a distinct advance or not. For unless the situation is met squarely and the process of whittling-down reversed there will be little cause left for either the champions or opponents of the scheme to worry about its fate."

Writing under the heading "the Indian Reforms" New India, of the 12th February, remarks:—"Yet what do we find? The highest dignitary in the land, the representative of His Majesty the King-Emperor in this country, and one who had signed, along with the Secretary of State, the important document promising responsible Government, surrendering to this opposition and trying to placate the official and the merchant, and sacrificing the country in the bargain. New India, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

Strictly speaking the Viceroy ought to have adopted one of the two courses against the Bolshevism of the Indian Civil Service. Either he ought to have treated it with silent contempt, as unnoticed, or severely rebuked it for its mutiny. Instead, His Excellency Lord Chelmsford patted them on the back and told them that it was a mere toy that they were offering to Indians and so the Indian Civil Service need fear no diminution in their pay, privilege, and prestige. . . To make the picture complete, the Viceroy even hinted, in his usual polite and periphrastic way, that the ministers will be generally toadies. So we have here a fairly good idea of the "responsible Government" which we shall have.

The bureaucracy being thus appeased, the exploiters were then sought to be consoled. . . European business concerns, it would appear, will be immune from Provincial taxation. But are they then to have representation all the same, in the Provincial Councils? "No taxation only representation" new principle indeed, but quite in consonance with the "responsible Government" that is prepared for India! The pretence that the Indian Government will control such taxation and matters connected with European business concerns may be taken for what it is worth. . . The responsible Government for India therefore will be a perpetuation of the existing system all round, under a different name and in a more cumbrous manner. . . We do not blame Lord Chelmsford for this abject surrender to vested interests, by even going back on his own words. That is a matter between him and his conscience. By breaking the pledge he is but carrying on the traditions of Anglo-Indian statesmanship. But India must protest, and protest emphatically, against his Lordship's unjustifiable and unfair policy of compromising the interests of his trust, and lengthening her term of mortgage to foreigners."

11. The Hindu, of the 13th February, writes:—"The privilege of possessing the casting vote is one which ought to be exercised with the utmost discretion, and always on the side of amelioration in cases where the vote, which ends in a majority, concerns a large number of people or affects the poor. . . It was in the case of ryots unable to recoup the money spent by Government that the Hon'ble Mr. Siva Rao tried to intervene and failed, because of the Governor's casting vote. . . His Excellency's casting vote, decided the issue against the poverty-stricken ryot and exhibited a lack of sympathy which is lamentable in the head of the Government. 'He that hath pity on the poor lendeth unto the Lord,' but that kind of investment is apparently confined to the relief of troops smitten in the war. Poverty among the people, in thousands of cases is also a result of the war, but it is difficult to remember that in the case of ryots who, after all, are the basis of the public which pays the head of it a handsome salary." Hindu, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

III.—Legislation.

12. New India, of the 8th February, remarks:—"To-day we publish the full text of Sir William Vincent's speech made on the sad occasion—sad for the British Empire and for the British people whose fair names will be blackened by these Prussian measures—of introducing the Bills, based on the one-sided, partial and unreliable report of the Rowlatt Commission. . . We have no hesitation in saying that we look upon that speech as one of which any liberty-loving Britisher should be ashamed. But in the citadels of autocracy which are held by arch-bureaucrats, sense of liberty and freedom can hardly exist. . . No responsible Government has claimed such abnormal engines of oppression; New India, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

only irresponsible Government, like the present one, can desire it. If India is to get any form of responsible Government, it must first be freed of all coercive legislation, and it is ludicrous and absurd to say that non-official members who fight for responsible Government should vote for these Black Bills."

HINDU, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

The Hindu, of the 8th February, says:—"The Rowlatt Bills have been introduced and referred to a Select Committee in the teeth of the unanimous opposition of the Indian non-official members of the Council. The Government has made up its mind to flout Indian opinion of all shades throughout the country. . . The capitulation of the Viceroy to the Civil Service and to the British mercantile interests which has been made clear in His Excellency's speech and the whittling down and emasculation of the Reform Scheme which is its natural result, give us the measure of the so-called responsible Government which we may expect. We hope the Indian public will now grasp the realities of the present situation and not flinch from taking all the needful steps to save the country from the perils with which it is now threatened."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

The following appears in New India of the 10th February:—"For the first time in the history of the Supreme Council did the non-officials vote solidly against a repressive measure. . . We hope the bureaucracy will have the good sense to consider what that means. The entire vote of the country, through its chosen representatives, is cast against the Government; and the speeches made to dissuade it from further proceeding with the measures are unequivocal and emphatic. So the Government knows, now at least, that if it goes further, the country is solidly opposed to it. The public can in no way be held responsible for the outcome. Whatever trouble comes, the bureaucracy will have courted it with open hands, and that against the verdict of the country. Perhaps it will argue that no trouble is likely. That is the despotic line of reasoning. To mention a sinister comparison, the Russian autocrats never thought that every exile to Siberia was steadily undermining their own position. . . And let the bureaucracy note that in the case of none of them was the national verdict so unanimously hostile. To-day the country is determined to see that the object of the bureaucracy as evidenced in these Black Bills is frustrated? Need we explain what will be the consequences? Perhaps during the next six months, the Government will find it necessary to introduce material law—not to put down any rebellion but to fight out the martial spirit. We do not think even that will be of any avail."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

New India, of the 11th February, says:—"Sir William Vincent is reported to have stated at the end of the debate on the Black Bills that it was the Government's intention that they should remain in force for three years after the declaration of peace. Our comment on this move is that we do not believe in the word of the bureaucrats, much less in their intentions. Their record of broken pledges is unique. The Indian public will look upon this as in the nature of an eye-wash, of which there are innumerable varieties in the shops of the Delhi-Simla quacks."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919

In the second of a series of articles on this subject Mrs. Annie Besant writes in New India, of the 12th February, as follows:—"The First Bill, which is, alas! Number 1 of 1919—the first gift of Britain to India in the year of victory—provides for the amendment of the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898. As regards the punishment of "Offences against the State" (Chapter VI, Indian Penal Code) the Indian Penal Code is already savage enough and shows out strongly the foreign character of the Government. No civilised State with a native Government would punish so severely offences so trivial as are therein contained. The changes proposed, permanent amendments of the law, make the Code yet more severe, and these are made immediately after India has poured out lavishly her blood and treasure for the ungrateful country that repays her with increasing severity of rule.

INDIAN PATRIOT, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

13. The Indian Patriot, of the 13th February, observes:—"In these ways the Government have completely set aside public opinion and have determined to proceed with the City Municipal Bill without the provisions ardently desired for by the Madras public. The Bill affects the interest of a large body of the population, and it ought to have been framed on the lines best acceptable to them. . . Flimsy and untenable arguments are advanced with a view to satisfy a few, while the many are disappointed. . . The Corporation is rendered ineffective and has no voice in determining the best course for its management and upkeep The public of Madras view the Bill with the keenest disappointment and dissatisfaction, and the strength of public feeling against the Bill is not to be disregarded. Opposition is keen and it is sure to manifest itself in diverse ways. Monster meetings will be held in the city to protest against the measure, and we hope that the public of Madras will lose no time in presenting an united opposition to the Bill. We would also suggest that the indifference on the part of the Government to respect public feeling should receive proper attention from the Viceroy and that His Excellency should be appealed to to exercise his veto and order for a reconsideration of the Bill by the Madras Government."

The Government of Madras and the City Municipal Bill.

II.—Home Administration.

(d) Education.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

Progress of education.

14. Referring to the recommendations of the Educational Conference held at Ootacamund in March 1916, the Swadesamitram, of the 6th February, observes:— The Government slept over the matter for the last three years. Now and again there were interpellations in the Legislative Council which however failed to rouse their interest. . . They have after all issued quite a lifeless order regarding these recommendations. A perusal of this order shows clearly the real interest and sympathy the bureaucrats evince for the voiceless crores of people whose guardians they pose themselves to be. Though the Government have been readily promising a good deal for the improvement of education, they have not done anything in the matter practically. Our present system of administration allows this manner of dragging things along wearily. As long as vital questions concerning us are in the hands of a foreign bureaucracy who are in no way responsible to us, there is no room for us to expect proper redress. The conference recommended the levy of a uniform scale of fees in all elementary schools and a slight reduction therein. The Government were not in favour of any such reduction, as they apprehended loss to the extent of two lakhs of rupees which in their opinion would affect the measures calculated to improve elementary education. This only appears to be a quibble. Will not reduction of fees bring in a larger number of pupils? Will not that be in itself an incentive for the spread of elementary education?

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

Education and grants.

15. Referring to the views of the Government on the recommendations made by the Educational Conference presided over by the Director of Public Instruction in 1916, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th February, remarks:—. . . It is not proper that adequate help has not been provided for the depressed classes. The Government proposals do not seem to be encouraging to the cause of education.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, 8th Feb. 1919.

The Government Girls' College.

16. Referring to the Government Second-grade College for Women at Masulipatam, the Kistnapatrika, of the 8th February, observes:— . . . It is not proper to hand over to Christian ladies a college where the majority of students are Hindu women. Further, these Christian ladies come from the Tamil country and do not know Telugu. It is needless to say more. We hope that the Government will try to appoint Andhra Hindu women only as teachers in this college as early as possible.

Manorama, Calicut, 11th Feb. 1919.

Aided elementary schools.

17. A correspondent writing in the Manorama, of the 11th February, states that most of the aided elementary schools are worked very irregularly by the Managers who nominally keep up the schools only for earning the annual grant. The attendance of teachers and pupils is very meagre, and teaching, if any, is very inefficient. The correspondent suggests a reversion to the old result-grant-system as a solution to this problem, and invites the attention of the Educational authorities to the subject.

(e) Local and Municipal.

Desabhimani, Cuddalore, 1st Feb. 1919.

The appointment of special executive officers in local boards.

18. Referring to the suggestion of the Government to appoint special executive officers in district boards and such sub-district boards as deal with large areas, on which they had invited the opinion of presidents of district and taluk boards, the Desabhimani, of the 1st February, says in English :—". . . It would be seen that except to a few official presidents and one or two non-officials the suggestion is not, on the whole, welcome. As we already remarked, the suggestion has raised some apprehensions in certain non-official minds. One president of taluk board. . . shrewdly suspects that the appointment has been based on the misconception that non-officials generally as a class are not well-acquainted with official methods of correspondence, that they are not punctual and regular in their correspondence and that they require some help to conduct such official work. Others suspect that it is a veiled obtrusion of the bureaucracy. This may be real or fancied. The rank of honorary workers count men of remarkable ability, steady and persistent endeavour, and devoted sincerity and patriotism. Any measure that is calculated to rouse their jealousy or injure their self-respect or affect their dignity and independence in the eyes of others, is certainly undesirable at the present stage of our public life and ought to be avoided by the Government. At the same time there is no doubt that the appointment—call him a special executive officer, or a dignified head clerk, or a paid vice-president—while giving relief to our elected non-official presidents who are to-day mainly drawn from a very busy section of Indian public life, will make for the efficiency of administration and will help towards maintaining a vigorous and healthy official discipline. The necessity of an office such as the one proposed in the memorandum, is sure to arise in the future, though not at present, when the work of our local boards is sure to increase. . ."

Sampad Abhyudaya, Mysore, 10th Feb. 1919.

Government and epidemics.

19. Referring to a letter published in the Madras Mail stating that the ravages of cholera in a village between Kavali and Udayagiri are so great that the people unable to arrange for the proper cremation or burial of the dead, throw the corpses near the tanks where they are eaten by wild animals and birds of prey, the Sampad Abhudaya, of the 10th February, observes :—Wise men agree that if a Government fails to afford relief to its subjects when they are in distress, that Government is unfit to exercise sovereignty over those subjects. The Government ought not to give room for such an accusation. They ought to make proper arrangements for providing medical relief and warding off the epidemic and escape all obloquy. The Mail says that the relief measures would require Rs. 50 while the taluk board would not pay more than Rs. 5. It behoves the Government to avoid blots on their reputation even if the relief measures should cost fifty lakhs. Else they will have committed suicide.

The Forest Administration Report.

20. Reviewing the Forest Administration Report for 1917–18, the Andhrapartrika, of the 11th February, remarks in its leader :— . . . The Government Forest Administration Report shows that the Forest Panchayats have worked well. If they are based on good foundations and entrusted with greater powers and responsibilities, the forest administration is sure to make a rapid progress.

Dearth of salt and epidemics.

21. Referring to a paper read by Sir L. Rogers at the Science Congress held at Bombay on the importance of salt in the treatment for cholera, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th February, writes :—When even such eminent western scientists as Sir Rogers admit the value of salt in warding off disease, it surely behoves the Government to enquire in what quantities the masses in India are able to get it. When salt is so valuable in curing cholera, it goes without saying that cholera will not break out at all if salt is normally used with food in sufficient quantities. Salt is said to be equally useful in the treatment for plague. India can only hear of the immense value of salt through scientists but not know it in practice since Government have prohibited the manufacture of salt at various centres which made it very cheap. We trust that Government will give due attention to the observations made by Sir Rogers.

An objectionable drama.

22. The Swadesamitran, of the 4th February, publishes an account of a public meeting held by the Muslim League at Nachchiyarkovil on the 2nd idem, when the following resolution among others is reported to have been passed:—This League requests the Government to forfeit the Tamil drama entitled "The Eye of Love" written by Mr. P. Sambanda Mudaliyar, B.A., B.L., inasmuch as it, contrary to the religious tenets of Muhammadans, contains a statement, as found in the Koran, that it is permissible to utter a falsehood in return for a thousand gold.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

The Reform Committees

23. Observing that the Government of Madras are said to have stated, in their evidence before these Committees that only the administration of Municipalities, the Registration Department, the Co-operative Credit Department and such others should be classed among the "transferred subjects", the Desabhaktan, of the 5th February, remarks:—Cannot even elementary education be classed as a "transferred subject"? Can we expect anything better from Lord Pentland's Government?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

Advice to the Dravidians.

24. A correspondent to the Desabhaktan, of the 5th February, reproduces in Tamil an extract from a notice said to have been issued by the Neo-Fabian Society on the voting Franchise in Madras, commenting adversely on the exercise by foreigners of certain privileges in India not enjoyed by the Indians, and makes the following observations among others:—O Dravidians, who cry out that the Brahmans will carry everything before them in case Home Rule is granted! Just consider what is stated in this notice. . . What enormous rights do the whites enjoy, who are not permanent residents of the country and who pay only low taxes! They may shoot us as if we were bears, stab us in jest and molest those in carriages occupied by gosha women, and for all this they have to be tried by European Judges with the help of the European jury. . . O Dravidians! Just consider a handful of Europeans monopolizing more than half the seats on the Legislative Councils, while 42 crores of Indians have not got even half the number. Why do you feel jealous of Brahmans being returned to these Councils? In what low condition are the whites keeping us? Without any feeling of shame, for all their interpellations these Brahmans receive the reply "that the Government are not prepared to answer". O Dravidians! Will you or any one else, except those who do not care much for self-respect, wish to become members of these Councils? Consider these as well as the other iniquities. Join the Home Rulers soon. Honour is more important to man than life. The poorest should have liberty and should cast away slavishness.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Provincial Budget for 1919–20.

25. Referring to an increase of 16 lakhs of rupees in the budget provision for the Police department during the year 1919–20 over that of the previous year, the Desabhaktan, of the 5th February, observes:—The object of making this additional provision for the Police is not clear. We ask what need there is to increase the present Police force in each district. An annual expenditure of about a lakh of rupees is incurred on experts in ancient works, and on degree-holders in education and for certain other matters. It is not stated to whom grants are given under this head. It is apparent that the Government propose to incur additional expenditure under this head during the year 1919–20, but they have not made known for whom and in what way they propose to utilize this amount. We ask them if all the Indians who have made great progress in education are to be participators in this grant.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

Adverting to the speech of Sir Alexander Cardew in introducing this budget in which he has referred to the change of the date on which the budget is presented to the Council, the Swadesamitran, of the 5th February, observes:—To the best of our experience we do not think that the wishes of the people in regard to the receipts and charges of the Government will in any way be gratified by means of this change. If the Government are in earnest to fulfil the wishes of the public, the limitations and restrictions of their own making cannot be an impediment. Rules and regulations require that both the Imperial and Provincial Governments should not close their budgets before the end of March. Final figures are presented in the Imperial Council only at the end of March and in the Provincial Councils only at the beginning of April, and any number of changes desired by the people can therefore be made during the interval. But the requests and entreaties made by the representative members at any time for such changes are thrown away by the bureaucrats for some reason or other. Unless this power is taken away from them, this serious defect cannot be rectified. So we cannot find any reason for Sir Alexander Cardew to expect that the slight change introduced this year will be much appreciated by the representative members. It will be found that, in spite of the failure of the rains and of the heavy prices, the Government revenues are steadily on the increase. We have often pointed out that it is in the nature of the system in vogue in the Madras Government to go on collecting increased taxes from the people and accumulate the savings on hand. It is usual to prepare the budget, making provision for a large expenditure out of the balance on hand at the beginning of the year. The same procedure has been adopted this year also. We will wait and see if at least next year the expenditure is fully incurred and the assurances of Sir Alexander Cardew are fulfilled. Land revenue is year after year showing an increase by 10 to 12 lakhs of rupees. But along with this, the abkari revenue also has increased considerably. If the Government should habituate themselves to get such a large revenue depending on the evil ways of the people, it is needless for us to say how far they can evince real sympathy with the endeavours of the people to curtail the spread of such an evil habit. There is no doubt that the provision of 37 lakhs of rupees for payment of war allowances to certain employees of Government will be recouped by the increase of revenue from taxes. Excepting this item, provision has been made in the budget only for matters required by the Anglo-Indian bureaucrats; while those in which the Indian officers and public are interested, have been treated with indifference as usual. The Madras Government do not look into any matter unless there is pressure from above. The Anglo-Indian officers in Madras exerted themselves a good deal to deem the appointment of an Indian Secretary to the Government to be a set-off for a District Collectorship for an Indian. They had, however, to yield after a delay of two or three years on receipt of orders from the higher authorities. Similarly a delay was made until very recently in the matter of the appointment of an Indian as a member of the Board of Revenue. In spite of the persistent efforts for the past ten years to afford relief to the hardworked district munsifs and sub-judges, notwithstanding the large income from stamps in connexion with legal proceedings nothing has been done till now. The resolution of Mr. Ranga Achariyar on this subject was disallowed by His Excellency. But a provision of Rs. 72,000 has been made for this purpose in the budget. No harm would have resulted if the resolution had been accepted and the details explained in the Council. In fine, all the trouble taken in the budget debate appears to be taken in vain.

The Madras Budget for 1919-20.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 11th Feb. 1919.

The Manorama, of the 11th February, approves of the increased allotments provided for education in the Budget for 1919-20, and is only anxious that the allotments should be properly spent. It considers it high time for the Government to attend to the necessity of increasing the pay of the subordinate Police establishment.

Doctor Nayar in the Legislative Council.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

26. Referring to the fact that Doctor Nayar and Mr. Molony have been appointed members of the Legislative Council in connexion with the discussions of the Madras City Municipal Bill, the Swadesamitran, of the 5th February, observes:—Mr. Ranga Achariyar is the representative of the Madras Corporation on the Legislative Council and the Hon'ble Mr. Yaqub Hasan, one of the members of the Corporation, is also on the Council. Both of them have long experience in the municipal administration of the City. Besides these every official member on the Council from the Hon'ble Sir Alexander Cardew downwards is well acquainted with this administration. While there are so many persons we fail to recognise the need to appoint Doctor Nayar as an expert. It is not our contention that he is disqualified for the work. But the only mystery is what special emergency necessitated his appointment. This Bill was first introduced when Sir P. S. Sivaswami Ayyar was on the Executive Council. If there had been any need for experts, it should have existed then. For aught we know, it appears that certain amendments made in the Bill by the Select Committee are not pleasing to the Government It may be that an attempt is made to reject these. The Government appointed Doctor Nayar probably with the idea of securing his support in this matter. The attitude of Doctor Nayar at the time of the consideration of the Bill will surely explain matters.'

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

27. Referring to the fact that the present famine in which rice and other foodstuffs sell at a very high price and kerosene oil is scarcely available, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th February, observes:—It is highly regrettable that the Government have not instituted proper inquiries into this matter. It is not known what the special officer appointed for the purpose in Madras is doing. The present situation only gives cause for apprehending that the prices might rise higher. The Government have only regulated the prices of a few articles but have not paid their attention to articles indispensable for life, chiefly the foodstuffs. While presenting the budget in the Legislative Council, Sir Alexander Cardew justified the grant of an allowance to Government servants on the ground of the rise in price of foodstuffs but he did not pause to find out the causes for this situation. Do the Government believe that the hardships of the public are at an end if an allowance is granted to Government employees? How much have they set apart for the relief of the poor while they have provided 20 lakhs of rupees for the Police? It is no fault to say that the Government are generally indifferent in regard to the poor people, though the Anglo-Indian papers are blabbing that it is only the Anglo-Indian bureaucrats that care for the ignorant masses. The Government are not in a mood to spend anything on behalf of the poor while they are ready to spend liberally on unnecessary matters. Whose sin is this due to?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

The Swadesamitran, of the 10th February, reproduces in Tamil a letter written by Doctor Mehta of Rangoon suggesting the desirability of a further reduction being effected in the freight charged for the transport of rice from Burma, and observes:—It is Doctor Mehta's contention that it devolves on the Government to carry out his suggestion in the interests of the Indian public. None can easily deny the justification of his plea. He thinks that the profits accruing from shipping freights go to the British Government, and we trust that the authorities will not fail to pay heed to his suggestion in this connexion.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

The Lokopakari, of the 10th February, writes on this subject as follows:—The prices of articles are indeed much higher now than what they were during the war. Besides, articles are not available in the market for the prices published in the Government Gazette. There are sufficient reasons for the prices of articles to be imported from other countries not going down. But why are the articles to be had locally increasing in prices every day? There is a talk among the people that these articles are purchased in the very places in which they are produced for being exported to other countries from there. If this complaint is true, the Government should attend to it promptly. The hardships of the people will in a way be mitigated if the Government issue strict orders that only articles, which may remain after meeting the demands of the country, should be exported.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

The meeting of the Provincial Legislative Council.

28. Observing that the Honourable Members of this Council have very often pointed out to the Government that inordinate expenditure is being incurred in this province on Survey and Settlement and referring to the statement in the administration report of this Presidency for the year 1917–18 that there has been a curtailment of expenditure on this item during the year and that the question of the feasibility of any further reduction is engaging the attention of the Government the Desabhaktan, of the 6th February, says:—It is regrettable that, in such circumstances, there should be an increase of 70 per cent in the budget provision for the settlement parties, and that the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapathi Raju to curtail this expenditure by a lakh of rupees was opposed by the Government on plausible grounds. The Government are acting quite inconsistently in attempting to increase this expenditure.

Then the Hon'ble Mr. K. Sadasiva Bhat brought forward a resolution to grant war allowance to village officers and servants. Sir Alexander Cardew pointed out that he was personally aware of the hardships of village officers and the pitiable condition of village servants, but said that it would cost 50 lakhs of rupees a year if war allowance should be granted to them. He made several statements without recognising that this allowance was not to be given year after year. By their not being paid adequate salaries, village officers receive bribes and fleece the poor mirasidars. This the Government have failed to note. Sir Alexander argued that most of the village officers have lands and that they are not full-timed servants of Government, and assured that he would recommend to the Board of Revenue the cases of village officers having no lands and no other sources of income for some concessions under the darkhast rules. The Government have not understood their pitiable condition. We need not say that it is only with their co-operation and hard work that the Government are deriving great benefit. It is not therefore fair for our Government to disregard them. We warn beforehand that, in case discontent and unrest prevail among village officers and servants, the Government may have to suffer later on. It is essential, therefore, that the Board of Revenue should, without delay, bring into effect at least the recommendation of Sir Alexander Cardew. The expenditure on Police is increasing by leaps and bounds every year. It was only 16 lakhs in 1915 but became 136 lakhs in 1916. If the work of the Police is at least satisfactory, this heavy expenditure may be put up with. But this is not the case. Crimes are increasing in this Presidency and the harmony between the Police and the people is growing weaker. In such a condition the inordinate expenditure on the Police is unbearable.

Appreciating the conduct of the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar in having left the Council Chamber on the 5th February 1919 on the ground, as alleged in the paper, that he did not relish the action of the President, the Desabhakatan, of the 6th February, observes:—We are greatly pleased that he did so, quite in accordance with the true Indian nature. It is fresh in our memory that, when Lord Willingdon spoke disparagingly of the Home Rulers in the Bombay Legislative Council, Messrs. Horniman, Tilak and others stepped out of the Chamber. This will clearly show that non-official members will not be afraid of the defiant attitude of the bureaucrats. What were the other non-official members doing when Mr. Narasimha Ayyar left the Chamber? Did not the procedure of the President appear to be objectionable to them? DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

Adverting to the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. A. S. Krishna Rao that a sum of Rs. 50,000 should be set apart for the establishment of boarding houses in select places in this Presidency for the benefit of students among the depressed classes, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th February, observes:—It is needless for us to point out how necessary it is to pass this resolution. In opposition to this, the bureaucrats urged many plausible arguments. Mr. Littlehailes was of opinion that it was not possible at present to act up to this resolution. We do not know when this will become possible. The Government came forward with pleasure to open boarding houses for European students while they show indifference in regard to the progress of the depressed classes. We say that this is neither fair nor just. DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The Dravidan, of the 7th February, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments expressed in Justice of the 6th February under the heading "Resolutions." DRAVIDAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The meeting of the Provincial Legislative Council.

Referring to the stress laid in the last speech of the Viceroy on the necessity of the Provincial Governments taking active steps in regard to the sanitation of the country and to the 'pertinacity' with which the Local Government declined to accept a resolution moved at the last meeting of the local Legislative Council that a grant of two lakhs of rupees should be made to the district boards for attending to village sanitation, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th February, says:—In former times, village sanitation was in an efficient condition and it was usual for the people in towns to move to villages periodically. But now the insanitary condition of the villages makes the people therein move to and settle in towns. We ask whether the Government are aware of this DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

situation? At present infectious diseases spread in villages also as in towns. It is revolting to see that the Hon'ble Mr. Rajagopala Achariyar, an Indian well acquainted with the present insanitary condition of villages, came forward to oppose this resolution. It is the duty of the taluk and district boards to attend to village sanitation and these are careless in regard to that duty for want of funds. Till now, epidemics like cholera, plague and smallpox spread from towns to villages; but we apprehend that, hereafter, the villages will become the breeding centres of such diseases. It is pitiable that the Government do not come forward to render sufficient pecuniary aid to improve village sanitation in this twentieth century when the authorities are perfectly alive to the necessity of doing so.

The same paper also refers to the opposition of the Hon'ble Mr. Rajagopala Achariyar to the resolution asking for a special grant for improving the experimental panchayats started in some places last year and adds:—Whose fault is it if these panchayats have failed to do satisfactory work? We have to ascribe it to the officials appointed to supervise their work. It will not do for the Government to ignore the village panchayats on some plausible excuse.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

The meeting of the Provincial Legislative Council.

Characterizing Doctor Nayar's taking his oath as a member of the Legislative Council and the withdrawal of the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar from the Council Chamber when the President declined to accept his proposal to adjourn the meeting, as dramatic, the Swadesamitran, of the 11th February, quotes precedents to support the action of the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar and remarks:—If non-official members are to leave the Council taking umbrage at the Government using the strength of their majority to discard the opinion of those who represent the public, such an event may occur at the close of the discussion on almost every resolution, as very few resolutions moved at this meeting in connexion with the budget were accepted by the Government. In the case of almost every resolution the Government succeeded in making out that they were in the right and the non-officials were wrong. But the ignorance betrayed by the Government members now and again was amazing. For example, in replying to the resolution suggesting the payment of war allowances to village servants Sir Alexander Cardew pointed out that karnams owned lands. It is true that village munsifs own lands and one or two karnams may have lands, but there is no basis for the statement that the karnams as a class own lands. In opposing the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Krishna Rao for making an additional provision of Rs. 75,000 to help deserving students to continue higher education, which they are at present unable to do for want of funds, the Director of Public Instruction was only finding fault with the wording of the resolution without paying any attention to the spirit of it, and the resolution was declared lost. How could it fare otherwise when all the non-official European members have made it a point always to vote on the side of the Government? Even the resolution to allot funds for the provision of boarding houses for students among the depressed classes was not accepted by the Government, though they recognized its importance. Such institutions have been established in Mysore and the Panchama boys are being attended to properly. Why cannot the same thing be done in British India? In fine, the characteristic feature of the proceedings of the Legislative Council is the rejection of most of the resolutions. If any resolution stands a chance of being carried, the Governor-President steps in to prevent it. This happened in the case of the Agricultural Pests and Diseases Bill. Lord Pentland is one experienced in English Parliamentary procedure which is based on the principle of popular representation and yet he used his official position in the Council to defeat the opinion of the people's representatives. So, until the popular voice comes to predominate in the Legislative Councils and the officials are prevented from having their own way, it is not possible for the people's representatives to change the administration.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The nationalist papers.

29. Referring to the reply of Sir William Vincent to an interpellation in the Imperial Legislative Council as to the cause for the nationalist papers such as the Hindu, the Amrita Bazaar Patrika and the Bombay Chronicle having been prohibited from entering England, the Swadesamitran, of the 7th February, observes:—It appears that the Government finding themselves unable to offer a satisfactory explanation have toiled for a long time and given this reply, because they are obliged to give one. Did the military authorities begin to prohibit newspapers advocating Congress matters, without being told by anybody else? Do not the moderate papers such as the Bengalee, the Leader and the Servant of India write in detail on such matters? Perhaps the Germans were not moved so much by these papers! Will even the plea be urged that the Germans are more sympathetic with the nationalist papers than with the moderate ones? Then, will it be inappropriate, if it is said that the sympathies of the officials of the British Government are more with the moderate papers than with some of the nationalist papers? However it may be, we should take consolation in the fact that there is no room for such mischief hereafter.

30. The Desabhaktan, of the 7th February, observes:—It is a well-known fact that the Government of Madras do not do properly what they have to do. While so, it appears they are going to take over the management of the Royapetta hospital in their hands. While the Madras Corporation is satisfactorily administering it, where is the need for this step? Why should they allot three lakhs of rupees for a matter which is still under consideration in spite of the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr Siva Rao to the contrary? The bureaucrats have resolved to act as they please without in the least condescending to consult the wishes of the people's representatives in regard to matters of administration. Public money is thus squandered.

The Royapetta Hospital.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

31. Reproducing in Tamil extracts from the opening speech of His Excellency the Viceroy, the Swadesamitran, of the 7th February, observes among other things:—The speech is entirely disappointing. Many doubted whether the Government would not postpone the consideration of the Rowlatt Bills out of respect for public opinion. The speech of the Viceroy shows that the Government have no such intentions. Nor were any special reasons assigned in the speech to justify the enacting of such Bills at a time when reform proposals are being considered. It is quite patent from his observations about the great help and contributions rendered by India for the war, about the loyalty of the Indians and their peaceful nature, that these Bills are quite unnecessary and will lead to harm in the end. Then again let us consider what our Viceroy's views are about the reform proposals. He has evinced great anxiety about the condition of the members of the Civil Service and European merchants, and begun to offer consolations to them. It is an impossible task to stifle the legitimate aspirations of the people with a view to avoid displeasing the Civil servants. It is not statesmanship to give prominence to their rights while laying the foundation for establishing responsible government. Nobody should forget that the Civilians are only public servants who have come to India to serve on specified salaries subject to certain specified terms, and chiefly our Viceroy should not forget this. It is indeed surprising that he should in his speech express sympathy for the very Civilians who hold views quite opposite to his own. We fail to see how the Viceroy who thought of patting the Civilians so much, omitted to recognise any need to give them a note of warning for all their clamour. Is it not his duty to tell those Civilians who are agitating, that they should act according to the exigencies of the times? Judged from his speech, the scope of the coming reforms is not very much encouraging.

The meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

In commenting on this speech, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th February, observes:—While speaking about the officials coming from England to serve here, the Viceroy referred to all officials in general and not to the Indian Civil servants in particular. From this we infer that all of them are agitating out of apprehensions for the reform scheme. . . We do not blame the Viceroy for having spoken about the members of the Indian Civil Service in this strain. But how can they who are also Government servants take part in politics? Why has the Viceroy kept silent on this point?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

In commenting upon the Viceroy's speech, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th February, observes:—There is no doubt that Lord Chelmsford is an able statesman. But he is not quite steady. His tone savoured of Lord Curzon when he replied to a deputation about the Press Act soon after he landed in India and his opening speech at the Council meeting held during the internment of Mrs. Besant dispelled this view. But this speech of his shows that he wants to become Lord Curzon again. We would put Lord Chelmsford in mind of the consequences of the partition of Bengal made by Lord Curzon against the public will. His remarks about the Rowlatt Bills even after coming to know of all the protests against them cannot but provoke indignation. If the foreword itself is so severe, it can be easily imagined what the sequel will be. This speech makes it quite clear that he has not well understood the true condition of India. The bureaucratic rule, which is against British justice, can flourish and be permanent in India only if they often harp upon the existence of anarchism in India and pass repressive laws on that account. The Viceroy lays stress upon the unanimous nature of the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee. Will persons of the type of Mr. Kumaraswami Sastriyar, devoid of political experience and sympathy with the public, have the mettle to write a dissenting minute? We very well know the capacity of the Indian members selected to serve on this committee. The Viceroy gives two reasons for his agreeing to the introduction of the Bills and they are the termination of the war and the anticipted speedy close of the Peace Conference. This shows that India is not governed with love. Perhaps the authorities thought that, on the close of the war and the Peace Conference, the Indians might raise an agitation for liberty and so wanted to enact these Bills! Perhaps they consider that, as the war has ended, they might go on treating India in any manner they choose. Will not war break out at any time in the world in future, and will not India's help be expected again? Lord Chelmsford considers it necessary to pass these Bills into law as a substitute for the Defence of India Act, which was safeguarding India's peace. When the latter Act was first introduced as a war measure, it was given out that it would cease to exist six months after the close of the war. Probably the meaning then was that in its place the Rowlatt Bills would become law. It is a great mistake for Lord Chelmsford to think that a coercive law will bring about peace in India. It is perhaps consistent with western civilization to bring in a worse law on the expiry of a bad one. The Viceroy seems to think that there is anarchism in India and that without a proper substitute for the Defence of India Act after its expiry it will become impossible for him to conduct the administration This needs no elaborate reply. We hold that it is the repressive measures that breed anarchism, which will be crushed only by love. Lord Chelmsford is afraid lest the spirit of anarchism which is disturbing the whole civilized world should affect India too. But there is vast difference between India and other countries. The people of other countries treat the ruler as an ordinary human being and make a puppet of him, while the Indians deem their king to be divine and worship him. Even if the bureaucrats bribe the Indians and teach them anarchism, the latter will never take to it. It is not just to do harm to loyalty in India on the strength of the false reports of C.I.D. officials, made for the purpose of eking out a livelihood.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

The meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Remarking that the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy with reference to the Rowlatt Bills, the actions of the members of the Indian Civil Service in opposition to the reform scheme, and the European commercial interests as affected by this scheme, is likely to cause discontent to the people, the Hindu Nesan, of the 8th February, observes among other things:—The speech shows that all the protest meetings and oppositions against the enactment of the Rowlatt Bills were of no avail. The Civil Servants have been patted instead of being chastised for their declaring openly that they cannot agree in the views of the British Government as stated in the pronouncement of the 20th August 1917. If the representative members feel that their view is correct, and that it has been unnecessarily rejected, they have no other alternative than to secede from the Council following the example of the late Sir P. Mehta and leave the bureaucrats to pass the Bills on their own responsibility. Public opinion is expressed only to acquaint the rulers, from time to time, with the wishes, hardships and grievances of the people, so that the administration may be conducted satisfactorily. What is to be done, if this fails to secure the desired object?

The Dravidan, of the 10th February, reproduces in Tamil the comments appearing in the Justice, of the 7th idem on the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy, chiefly expressing its disagreement with him in the matter of the extension of the term of office of the members of the Imperial Legislative Council and agreeing with him as to the desirability of the enactment of the Rowlatt Bills.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

The Lokopakari, of the 10th February, comments as follows:—The Viceroy, without putting down the I.C.S. party by one word that it is unlawful to oppose the Government, chose to hear their illegitimate cry and gave them a consoling answer. Many questions arise from his speech. Has the Montagu-Chelmsford reform scheme been drafted to protect the interests of the Anglo-Indian merchants and the I.C.S. party? Or, has it been prepared with a view to grant India responsible government and liberty? Do the Government exist to satisfy the Indians or the Anglo-Indians? If the Viceroy is of opinion that India is governed with a view to satisfy the Indians, he would have respected the strong protests of the public against these Bills. If he accepts that the reform scheme has been drafted only as a preliminary to the grant of Home Rule to India, he would not have spoken evincing sympathy with the I.C.S. party and the Anglo-Indian merchants. From the assurance given by the British Government on the 20th August 1917, it follows that India will be governed for her own sake by the Indians. This, in its turn, leads to the conclusion that the influence of the I.C.S. party and the Anglo-Indian merchants will not be in the ascendant. But as the Viceroy is of opinion that the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms will not affect the influence of the above parties, it becomes quite clear that Indian patriots are right in contending that these reforms will not secure Home Rule for India in the end, unless they are modified in accordance with the Congress-League proposals.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

32. Referring to the view expressed lately by President Wilson that the basic principle of the Peace Conference should be the grant of self-determination to all the countries in the world which is said to have created a new desire in the minds of the people of this country to acquire this right, the Janabhimani, for January, observes:—The British Government entered into this war with a view to establish justice and it is a serious question, indeed, whether at a time when the small States in Europe are permitted to have the right of self-determination, such a right will be denied to India which rendered ungrudging help in the war. Are the Indians to be refused the very privileges for which they waged the war?

India and self-determination.

JANABHIMANI, Madras, January 1919.

The Vaisyamitran, of the 3rd February, refers to the argument of the official class, that the time has not yet come for the Indians to exercise the right of self-determination, and remarking that the plea of the authorities that the Indians have no experience of administration and have to learn it by remaining under the tutelage of British statesmen for a long time is untenable, observes that the Indians are not the descendants of savages to learn civilization anew, and that they have a reputation of being hereditary administrators and industrialists. It points to the appointment of Lord Sinha as Under Secretary of State for India as a proof of the fact that the Indians are not behind other nations in the matter of administrative capacity and says that the right of self-determination is quite necessary for the Indians as they are "in every case distrusted by their rulers now" and an administration by others, however well they may understand the customs and habits of the people, will not be as satisfactory as that conducted by the people themselves.

India and self-determination.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 3rd Feb. 1919.

33. The Desabhaktan, of the 10th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article in which the following finds place among others:—O Mother Bharata! Is it agreeable to you to see the 33 crores of your children lead an ignominious life without food and raiment? . . . Is it not cruel to bring in the Rowlatt

Thirst for liberty.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

Bills, fit to be hated by the civilized countries, at a time when the people raise a cry for the repeal of all repressive measures which arrest the progress of the country and the necessity for every country being given the right of self-determination is urged by great statesmen? . . . Patriots and newspapers that sincerely work for the welfare of the country become victims to these repressive measures. Patriots are confined in prison with ordinary criminals as if they had committed murder and theft . . . Goddess Bharata! At a time when slavery has disappeared, is it fair on your part to allow us, your children, still to be grovelling in slavery? If the whole of the Indian population should become educated, if the dearth of foodstuffs should be averted, if industries should flourish and India should become opulent, she should obtain self-determination and be governed by the people's representatives. The thirst for liberty will not be quenched unless self-determination is secured.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

Spies in ancient days.

34. A correspondent to the Desabhaktan of the 11th February, contrasts the spies that were engaged by kings in ancient days in India and those engaged by the British Government now and cites an incident from the Ramayana where Rama is said to have sent his own brother Lakshmana to find out the public opinion about Sita, on the ground that he was the proper person to understand the meaning of the statements made by the public and to have sent Sita to the forest in accordance with public opinion, without punishing the washerman who suspected her chastity. The correspondent also cites another instance to prove that the kings in ancient days did the work of the C.I.D. themselves.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1918.

The present situation.

35. The annual supplement to the Swadesamitran, for 1918, contains a contribution from Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao on the present situation, in which the following observations find place:—As long as the present bureaucracy continues, there will be no scope for the spread of education among the ordinary people or for the improvement of their economic condition. The powers of administration should be entrusted to the people. My experience shows that the people of the Madras Presidency and especially those in Southern India are very well fitted to have Home Rule. The system of self-government in villages has been in existence in India from the time of the Muhammadan Kings and it is the Englishmen that have changed it. In the beginning the British required money for conducting the administration and other expenses, and their only source of revenue was the land. So they did away with all rights which were inconvenient to them in this matter, the result being that the mirasidars became the tenants of the Government. Besides this, the land-tax is being raised at every settlement without the consent of the mirasidars. It is again the British Government that are responsible for penalising a default in the payment of land revenue and making it punishable with forfeiture of land, as if it were an offence of sedition It is only in this manner that our rulers have been protecting the interests of our agriculturists! They have, by their laws and indifference, brought about the ruin of our trades and industries and allowed most of them to be enjoyed exclusively by the ruling race. The foreign bureaucrats in our country say that they are the best fitted to safeguard the interests of the ordinary people. But the aforesaid facts will show that it is the ordinary people that have been affected most by the rule of the bureaucrats and reduced to a state of poverty. The present low condition of the people can be improved only if India is free to control her finances.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1918.

Fortunes of Bharata.

36. The Swadesamitran of 1918 publishes a drama under this heading, in which Bharata Devi, apparently representing India, is, while bewailing her lot, met by sage Narada and comforted with the hope of a brighter future. Elsewhere, Swetavalli, apparently representing Britain, is prevailing upon her sons to grant complete rights to her sister Bharata Devi, which they are not prepared to do, on the ground that the sons of Bharata Devi are not yet fit to have complete liberty. On this, Swetavalli reminds her sons of the timely help rendered by the sons of her sister in a recent war and addresses them in the following strain:—Do not persist. Think of the future. The vital principle of a national ideal is making itself felt in every corner of the world. This yearning for liberty is not to be trifled with. It is born with every one. It cannot be injured by weapons or blocked by any force. You should realize that numerous kingdoms have been ruined before our time. Do you not see crowned kings humbled to dust? Let us not be cursed by any one. Do not forget that your ancestors gave shelter to thousands of foreigners. Grant liberty to my sister to spread the lustre of your own rule. The rights she is enjoying are not new to her. When I was quite ignorant of many things, immense was the help rendered to me by my sister. When you were suffering, with no one to help you, invaluable was the assistance she rendered to you. Have you forgotten this? She is an embodiment of patience. How long is she to await your favour? Let the past be past. Restore her dues to her now.

On this, the sons of Swetavalli assure her that they will act according to her wishes.

37. The Dravidan, of the 4th February, reiterates certain epithets applied to the Brahmans referred to in an article abstracted from it in paragraph No. 58 of Report No. 43 of 1918 and, quoting Abbe Dubois to have stated that the Brahmans cheated the Hindu and Muhammadan Kings of olden days to serve their own purposes, adds:— What does it matter to the Brahmans who care only for their living what opinions others have of them? Their philosophy consists only in coveting other people's property. The deception practised by the Brahmans is now known throughout the world. The attributes of 'wily,' 'double-tongued' and 'servile' well befit them.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

Brahman characteristics.

38. The Desabhaktan, of the 6th February, and the Swadesamitran, of the 8th idem, reproduce in Tamil an extract from an article in the "Textile Mercury" published in Manchester, in which the writer describes how the cotton industry in India was ruined only by the competition of the British and other nations and the restrictions placed on the import of Indian cotton goods in England and pleads for a change in the commercial policy adopted by the British Government in India in the interests of both India and England.

The British commercial policy in India.

39. The Swadesamitran, of the 8th February, publishes a communication from a tanner in which he complains that the tanners in India have not been benefited in any way in spite of their having supplied nearly 60 per cent of the hides required by the Government at a loss to themselves, as Japan and America have now captured the British market, and remarks that, as the profits made by selling the skins not required by the War office do not seem to have reached the Government of India, they should remain only with the British War office.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

A grievance of the tanners.

40. Reviewing in its leader under this heading a pamphlet published by the Indian Home Rule League in London dealing with these questions, the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th February, observes:—. . . The seeds of war have to be fully rooted out, and international relations, based on the principles of justice. Otherwise, the League of Nations may multiply the troubles of dependent nations. To prevent such evils, the London branch of our Home Rule League asks for the grant of the right of self-determination to all peoples impartially. . . In the announcement of the 20th August 1917, it was stated that the Government would have the power to determine the stages of self-government to be granted to India. The pamphlet clearly shows that this statement is against the principle of self-determination, and also gives a suitable answer to the objection that India cannot have the right of self-determination on the ground that its people do not constitute a single nation. . . It is clear to us in these times that the Federal system is the only arrangement that can embrace people speaking different languages. . . The United States of India will have to be formed on the model of the United States of America. For this purpose, the distribution of provinces on the language basis is of the highest importance.

Self-determination: self-government and the redistribution of provinces on linguistic basis.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

Villages and the national movement.

41. Urging the improvement of villages, the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th February, writes:—. . . The development of the village populace is a proof of the development of the nation. . . To those who have seen village life in India, it is clear that our villages are in an intolerable condition under British Rule. Generally, we find our villagers submerged in unbearable poverty and ignorance. Three-fourths of them have hardly a rag to wear, food to eat and water to drink. Rags, half-rations and dirty water are their usual lot. Our villages which were once healthy are now the hot-beds of cholera, smallpox and other diseases. It may be said that the people have practically no medical aid. . There are no good roads to villages. . . The village people have to bow to the Police constable, to the abkāri peon, to the Taluk office peon and to such others and they have to pay them all their mamuls. Our villages which were once the homes of health, wealth and self-government are now in a state of disease, poverty and dependence. . . These perverse conditions are devitalising the national life. . . Villages are the main sources of agricultural industry which brings the Government its revenue, the nation, its income and the people, their sustenance. But neither the people nor the Government take proper steps for the well-being of villages. . . We rarely find in our villages to-day that devotion to God and those good habits which were once so characteristic of them. The young men who have got a smattering of English education in towns become the leaders of villages and are spreading there evil habits instead of good ones. . . The gloss of materialism, the contempt for spirituality, and the tendency towards atheism which have come to towns in the wake of western civilization are spreading to villages also. . . It behoves the Government who proclaim themselves as the sole guardians of the people's welfare, as well as the leaders who have at heart their country's cause to use all their resources and energy for the improvement of villages, and thereby to help the regeneration of our national soul. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

42. With reference to the resolutions brought forward by non-official members in the recent session of the Madras Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika. of the 8th February, remarks:—. . . The Legislative Council has not given up its usual practice. The proposal of resolutions by non-official members and their rejection do not cause surprise to the people, as they are no novel occurrences.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

The Legislative Council.

Referring to the amendments proposed to the Madras City Municipal Bill, the Andhraprakasika, of the 6th February, remarks:— . . . If they fail to be accepted, it may be said to be due to the misfortune of rate-payers. Those who have proposed the amendments can only advance arguments. But the result depends on the attitude of the official members. Some of the amendments like the one relating to the house-tax are very important. Their acceptance leaves no room for dissatisfaction among rate-payers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

Referring to the discussion on the Madras City Municipality Bill in the Local Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th February, writes:— . . . We fail to understand why distinctiou should be made between Indian and European Chambers of Commerce in the matter of representation. . . From the way in which the useful proposals of non-official members have been rejected and the amendments of the Hon'ble Mr. Rajagopala Achari which are opposed to progress, have been carried out, we have little hope of the progress of local self-government under the new Act. . . The proposal made by the Hon'ble Mr Siva Rao with regard to the charges incurred for the removal of diseased trees is a very just one. Even this has not been accepted by the Government. . . Nineteen members have voted for and 19 against this resolution. His Excellency the Governor has at last given his vote against it. It is not possible for the wishes of the people to prevail in Legislative Council governed by such a narrow spirit.

43. Referring to the reply of Sir William Vincent in the Imperial Legislative Council to the question about the prohibition of certain newspapers from reaching England, the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th February, says:—. . . It seems that the censors have detained these papers, lest the enemy should use to his own advantage the writings in these papers about Home Rule. It is not understood why the censors have never published this reason in spite of frequent representations. The questions put in the Legislative Councils and the answers which they elicit are in this tone. This state of affairs will not change, unless self-government is established.

49. In the Kerala Sanchari, of the 5th February, a correspondent writes:—It is doubtful whether the paddy grown in Malabar during an year will suffice for three months' needs of the district. While therefore an extension of area under paddy cultivation is urgently required, that area is really getting diminished—(a) by people raising fields to make them 'parambas' or house-sites and (b) by allowing huge avenue trees, like the banyan, on both sides of roads passing through paddy fields. These trees become a hindrance to the growth of paddy and do great harm to paddy cultivation. If, therefore, these trees are removed and trees like the cocoanut palm are substituted, the latter will be a source of income and will not obstruct the growth of paddy. This matter should receive the immediate attention of Local Boards and the Revenue Board.

The Indian Civil Service Association.

52. In an article published in the Manorama, of the 4th February, calling upon the people of India to awake out of sleep, to put aside their inter-communal rivalries and to show a united front to their enemies, one Mr. Chippukkutti Nayar points out that it is not surprising that the people of India should meet with various obstacles in their endeavour to obtain greater privileges in the administration of the country, that, while the opinion of almost all parties in India is that even if the recommendations contained in the Montagu-Chelmsford report are carried into effect no great changes will be seen in the old order of things and that they will not therefore conduce to the welfare of the country; there is no end to the increase in the number of associations which consider that the recommendations give too much freedom to the people of India, and that a new association, with an awe inspiring form and nature, namely, the association of the Indian Civil Service officers has now newly entered the field threatening the Government that they will resign in a body if the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme is brought into force. He says that many worthy people think that it is highly improper on the part of public servants to form themselves into an association to deal with politics and observes that there is no doubt that it is a violation of all discipline for subordinates to protest against the recommendations made by two of the highest authorities who are at the head of the administration of India.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 11th Feb. 1919.

The Indian Civil Service and the Viceroy's speech.

53. Referring to the Viceroy's speech in which His Excellency has allayed the fears of the Indian Civil Service and of the British merchants regarding 'Indian Reforms', the Manorama, of the 11th February, remarks that His Excellency the Viceroy, the joint author of the Reform Scheme, has himself now declared that the authority of the Indian Ministers will be very little. The interests of the Indian Civil Service and of the British merchants are safeguarded. But in the circumstances described, is there anything tnat an Indian Minister can accomplish?

III.—LEGISLATION.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

54. Adverting to the question raised by the Hindu as to the necessity for enacting these bills for the whole of India, the Dravidan, of the 4th February, observes: This is indeed strange. It is only those that deal with intricate problems relating to the administration of a country that can realise the importance of the responsibility and the safety of Government and devise means for safeguarding the same. The argument that there has been unrest only in one province presumes the existence of such indications in the other provinces as well. Is it not incumbent on the Government to take precautions to guard themselves against it and keep the country also in a good condition? How many political agitators had preached that the army should be curtailed in view of the heavy expenditure involved? How did all these preachings end? The German war proved the necessity for increasing the army 20,000 times over. Every one should consider that even in South India it has become possible for undesirable things being spoken and written on many occasions. Some without proper education and a sound knowledge of politics think that they can speak and write in any manner they please. Some others praise the action of such people to the skies. In such circumstances we do not consider it proper to oppose or hinder the precautionary measures adopted by the Government. The Hindu observes that the people in England will not brook the Indian Penal Code and asks, when such an Act is in force in India, what necessity there is for a more severe one. Alas! This is a wonder of wonders! How can the Hindu compare India with England? The main object in attempting to soar as high as England is only to establish here the Government by a few and bring into force the laws of Manu. It apprehends that, if these Bills are passed, further unrests and disturbances may crop up. It is usual for the Home Rulers to say so whether wittingly or unwittingly, and such statements, we believe, will not be accepted by the Government. The Government are bound to do all that is necessary in the interest of preventing unnecessary and undesirable disturbances and of securing peace and contentment. The Hindu is solicitous in remarking that the authorities will exceed their powers in carrying out these acts into practice. This is another matter altogether. If this happens to be true, then we can find out a remedy for it; but there is no reason to take exception to the enactment of the law itself on that score.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 4th February, observes:—To introduce the above Bills one should be well conversant with the laws of this country and the procedure in the courts of law. So the introduction of these Bills may, with better advantage, have been entrusted to the Law Member than to Sir William Vincent. Much discretion has not been shown even in the matter of the appointment of members for the Select Committee formed to consider these Bills.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Desabhaktan, of the 5th February, and the Swadesamitran, of the 6th idem, publish in Tamil the opinion of Sir Narayan Chandravarkar about these Bills and the proceedings of a public meeting recently held at Trichinopoly to protest against them.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

Characterising the Rowlatt Bills as a most venomous poison which India is about to swallow, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th February, doubts whether the various meetings held and speeches delivered protesting against these Bills will crush them, and adds:—The bureaucratic deity has become used to such meetings and speeches and it does not pay much heed to them. So the days for words are gone. The representative members should argue to the best of their ability against the Bills being passed, and if the opposition is of no avail, all of them should secede from the Council. If those in the Imperial Legislative Council do so, the representative members in the Provincial Councils should also follow suit and the patriots should give up all desire for membership in the Legislative Councils. The public should be prepared to resort to passive resistance and patriots should be ready to preach to the people the method of passive resistance, and to endure any hardships likely to result from it. This is the time for adopting in each household the advice of Tilak, the teachings of Pal, the swadesi vow of Surendranath and the passive resistance of Gandhi. O patriots! Spread these broadcast; be prepared to endure troubles.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

Remarking that, as it is hard to alter the determination of the bureaucrats, the Rowlatt Bills are sure to be passed in spite of the opposition of the non-officials, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th February, observes that the passing of these will certainly confer a benefit on India, to reap which several should get ready to sacrifice their souls, and adds:—There are many objects in view for the bureaucrats introducing repressive laws and they suppress the papers and patriots that give publicity to these objects. Real sedition does not at all exist in India. Most of the patriots punished for sedition are loyal persons. Instead of taking steps to relieve the distress of the lakhs and lakhs of people that are suffering in India for want of food and clothing, the bureaucrats are trying to pass cruel laws to put down the patriots that come forward to work for the poor. Is this in keeping with civilization? So long as the system of administration in India continues to be in the hands of a class that unnecessarily suspects those that espouse the cause of the poor and find fault with them, it is impossible to obtain the British liberty she expects.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the remark of Sir William Vincent that it is the laws such as the Defence of India Act that are the causes of the absence of any anarchical crime in India towards the end of 1918, the same paper remarks:—The opinion of the wise is that repression decreases loyalty and increases seditious movements and so we cannot see why Sir William Vincent should hold a contrary view. The reasons adduced by him in favour of the Bills are very curious. He assures us that these Bills have not been introduced in opposition to political movements. The truth of this will become patent only in experience. It is only those that work in the political movement that become victims to repressive laws. He has further stated that it is not the intention of the Government to curtail the liberties of the people. It is no doubt true that the British Government will not entertain such cruel ideas. But it has become the practice for the bureaucrats to be actually adopting harmful measures, giving out all the time that they do not intend to do any harm. Is it not usual for the Indians to raise a hue and cry every time a repressive law is passed and for the bureaucrats to pacify them? Similarly, Sir William Vincent has now come forward to wipe our eyes. What more solace do we require? The Viceroy and the other responsible members should take the words of the Hon'ble Mr. Patel and others in the Council as a note of warning. A thoughtless act may lead to serious harm. When even Mr. Shafi of the Punjab, who always used to nod to the wishes of the Government, whether they be right or wrong, opposes these Bills, what are we to say about Sir P. C. Mitter and Justice Kumaraswami Sastriyar, who were members of the Rowlatt Committee, and what regard can we have for their recommendations? The Bills have now been referred to a Select Committee and Messrs. Bannerjee, Srinivasa Sastriyar and Shafi are members of it. Now the question is whether these three, who opposed the motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, would like to sit on it. If they do, they will be accused of acting against their conscience both by the Indians and the Anglo-Indians. If they have Indian blood running in their veins, they should not consent to serve on this committee. Mother Bharata is now bewailing her lot and feels staggered. To console her is our duty. We need not care about the Rowlatt Bills at all. We should not desist from our agitation, through which we will attain success. O Mother Bharata! You will have good time and success will be secured in the war of justice.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Desabhaktan, of the 10th February, observes:—The bureaucrats have the right of governing India with the help of any kind of cruel laws. The existence of non-official members on Legislative Councils counts for nothing. All of them in a body opposed the Bills; but to what end? It is surprising that Mr. Surendranath Bannerji, who is well acquainted with the tactics of the bureaucrats, still confides in them. Was the least consideration shown by the official members of the Imperial Legislative Council to objections raised by elderly men like Mr. Surendranath who ardently advocate the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms? Seeing that the recommendations of the Rowlatt Committee have taken the shape of a Bill so soon, it can be said that Mr. Surendranath will get disappointed. The affront received by Mr. Surendranath and the insult still in store for him make one feel impetuous. Perhaps Surendranath keeps this impetuosity under check in expectation of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. Moderates! You are no doubt patriots. The bureaucrats are coaxing you out of selfish motives. In regard to the application of repressive measures, they view you and the others as belonging to the same party. They are hampering the country's progress relying on your support. The veteran patriot, Mr. Gokhale, who all his days confided in the bureaucrats, was in the end deceived and he thrusted the Press Act on us. . . Enough of all this confidence and disappointment. Join the nationalist cause without delay and seek the benefit of the country. Mr. Surendranath cannot afford to sleep any longer. He should rise up again as the Surendranath of old. In his presidential address at the Conference of the moderates in Bombay he spoke to the effect that, if reforms were stinted in grant, he would make Ireland of India. Now as the passing of the Rowlatt Bills is worse than a stinted grant of reforms, let Surendranath proceed at once to show his words in action. If he takes the lead to agitate against these Bills, all parties will surely stand by him. Even though he does not agitate directly, we have his lectures and his heroic deeds, for our guidance. Let us follow them. It is the duty of the patriots to get rid of the bureaucratic system of administration completely and establish British justice in India by means of constitutional agitation. The agitation should be commenced even now when the Bills are with the Select Committee. Let those among the readers of the Desabhaktan, who have not till now taken the swadeshi vow of Surendranath take it at once.

The same paper observes:—The Indian members warned the Government that a strong unprecedented agitation was likely to be made in the country if these Bills were passed. The concluding speech of Sir William Vincent only shows that the Government have begun to coax the moderates. Having once opposed the Bills in the Legislative Council, will the moderates and the nationalists support them in the Select Committee? If the Indian members yield to Sir William Vincent's wishes in the Committee, then they will be considered to have sold their conscience.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

Adverting to the constitution of the Select Committee to which these Bills have been referred, the Swadesamitran, of the 10th February, observes:—It is alike strange and regrettable that the seven gentlemen, who as the representatives of the people opposed the Bills in strong and clear terms should have been proposed for the Select Committee and that these should have consented to serve on that Committee. It is only when the general principle of a Bill is approved by the Council, it should be considered by a Select Committee. The general principle of the present Bill was got approved only with the help of the official majority in the Council; but so far as the non-official members are concerned, it should be construed as not having been approved at all, because all of them said that there was no need for any such legislation. The speech of Sir William Vincent in which he has spoken so artfully as to divide the non-officials into two parties has probably made them change their mind. Perhaps the Honourable Members accepted to serve on this Committee with the hope that they would be able to effect any alterations they like in this Committee. But the words used by Sir William Vincent with great care in his reply are noteworthy in this connexion. If these members, forgetting the distinction of moderates and extremists refuse to serve on the Committee in consideration of the prejudicial nature of the Bills, then a necessity will arise for the authorities in England to look into the nature of these Bills. How else can we make known to the world that all the Indians refused to serve on the Select Committee and that the Government are trying to pass the Bills by virtue of the powers vested in them by law? If the members who refused to vote for the proposition to refer the Bills to the Select Committee have accepted to serve on the Select Committee, being duped by the words of Sir William Vincent, we believe they will now calmly reflect over the matter, realize the conflicting nature of their situation and decline to serve on the Committee.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 11th February, reproduces in Tamil, the leader of the New India in its issue of the 10th idem on the "National Vote" and as a sequel thereto observes:—Sir William Vincent pointed out that the first of the Rowlatt Bills would, when passed into law, be in force only for three years. Perhaps this is a stratagem played to hoodwink the non-official members! While there is no necessity at all for the existence of such a cruel law, what is the object in stating that it will be in force only for a short period? Brothers and sisters! you have been till now feeling indignant at the iniquitous acts of the bureaucrats. The time is near at hand for opposing their actions in a constitutional manner. So every one should be resolutely prepared for it. You should not forget even in your dreams that virtue will win in spite of the worst of reverses.

Referring to the fact that the first of these Bills has been referred to the Select Committee, the same paper remarks:—Even the zamindars won over by the bureaucrats to their side, do not countenance this cruel Bill. The public too condemn the action of the Government. Sir George Loundes has stated that the Government have resolved to pass this Bill regardless of all opposition and agitation alleging as a reason the propriety and justice of the proposed measure. There is no doubt that any one with common sense will hate this opinion. So it follows that, in India, the Government have resolved to do anything they like and carry on the administration regardless of public opinion and that hereafter equity and British justice will not be respected. This, we apprehend, will tend to make the Indians consider that all righteousness and liberty talked of till now were empty words uttered to suit the occasion.

DESABHIMANI, Cuddalore, 1st Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Desabhimani, of the 1st February, comments as follows in English upon these Bills:—" . . . We have necessarily to point out at this stage that the time is very inopportune to persuade the country into accepting a legislation of the kind, not to mention of its injustice. The war has inspired new hopes and faiths into all nations and the world is sought to be reconstituted on the basis of a League of Nations. . . India having participated in the process throbs now with these joys and hopes. The whole country is clamouring for the liberation of the political detinues and looks to the inauguration of an era of greater trust and confidence and faith in the Indian people. It would be most unfortunate if at this psychological moment anything is done that is calculated to create discontent and incite bitter feelings in the minds of the people . . . ."

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 7th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an abstract of the proceedings of a public meeting held in Kumbakōnam on the 4th idem protesting against these Bills.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

Adverting to the Bills having been referred to a Select Committee, the Swadesamitran, of the 8th February, observes:—Such a critical juncture as this has not occurred in the history of the Imperial Legislative Council till now. The Government have not till now dared to press legislation on the public, in direct opposition to their privileges and prayers, by means of their authority and thereby secure their autocratic sway. They did it yesterday, as the bad luck of the land of Bharata would have it. We can presume now what kind of false stuff the Home Rule reforms they grant us will be made of. The Bills have been condemned by all classes of people in the country. Judging from the excitement in the country, even the ancient Emperors, exercising enormous powers, should be taken to have acted in accordance with public opinion. The system now begun, of trying to get laws passed by the Legislative Council by force and by means of the votes at the disposal of the Government, has to be noted. The authorities seek absolute powers to enact such laws as they deem to be necessary for the public good and peace of the country and the very first provision of the Montagu-Chelmsford report is that the English Government should always have these powers, whatever reforms are introduced. The present incident clearly demonstrates what our future condition will be if we accept this provision and secure facilities to the authorities, through the State Council and Provincial Grand Committees, to prevent even our present cry in the Legislative Council. But it is incongruous to discuss the reforms now. At a time when we are about to be deprived of our birth-rights indispensable for securing a civilized life, there is no reason for us to think of the privileges of self-government that can befit us for a better life. Does it not reflect the greatest discredit on our rulers that they should have allowed those legal principles, that have from time immemorial been glorifying the English rule, to prevail in India for 150 years and now try to do away with them? It is the duty of the bureaucracy to see that this discredit does not attach to their administration. If they are to do this duty, they should immediately drop these Bills. If, without doing this, they persist in taking a wrong course, we would humbly point out that it will not benefit either the Government or the land of Bharata.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 5th February, publishes in Tamil, as reported by a correspondent, a summary of the proceedings of a public meeting held in Tanjore on the 4th idem to protest against the passing of these Bills when Mr. C. Rajagopala Achariyar of Salem is reported to have dwelt at length on the several disadvantages likely to result from these Bills and remarked that if they are passed into law they will be tools in the hands of the 'unsympathetic bureaucrats' for teasing the people. The Desabhaktan and the Dravidan of the 7th and 10th February, respectively, also publish these proceedings, the former reproducing a gist of the speech of Mr. C. Rajagopala Achariyar while the latter makes but a brief reference to it.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

The Lokopakari, of the 10th February, also expresses its surprise at the reasons given by the Viceroy for the introduction of these Bills and adds:—For securing the peace of the world, why should there be repressive legislation in India, which, without being the cause of the war, has been instrumental in bringing the war to a successful issue by rendering assistance in men and money? The British Government declared that the human race could be happy only if the war came to a successful end, and President Wilson assured the world that the system of one nation lording over another would cease with the war. The war has ended and peace proposals are progressing. The question of granting self-determination even to insignificant races and States is being considered by the Peace Conference. But in India alone the authorities are bent upon enacting repressive laws paying no heed to the lessons of history and recent events in the world. Liberty is the birth-right of every man. When, as Professor Bose has pointed out, even plants have the faculty of resisting those that try to oppress them, it is no wonder that it is present in man, a rational being. But it is not in Indian nature to oppose their king. We apprehend whether the authorities in India will, by their unconstitutional procedure, change the meekness of the Indians. None can deny that these Bills are introduced out of distrust in the loyalty of the Indians. If not, the Government would have consented to the proposal of deferring their consideration to a later date. It is not a sound administrative policy on the part of the officials in India to push through a law which is entirely opposed to the wishes of the people's representatives.

The same paper refers elsewhere to the Bills having been referred to a Select Committee, in spite of the opposition of the non-official members, and remarks that the public are of opinion that all the representative members should have left the Council Chamber at the time votes were taken, which would have made it impossible for the Bills being referred to a Select Committee.

The Desabhakatan, of the 10th February, also thinks that these Bills reflect discredit upon both the British Government and the British public and observes: —There is no doubt that Sir William Vincent is a Britisher, loving liberty. Still even wild savages, unaware of liberty, will tremble at his words in introducing these Bills. Perhaps there is no regard for liberty within the pale of the bureaucracy. Sir William wants that the members of the Council should conduct themselves boldly and honourably to suit the occasion. That is our wish too. If they have a love for their country and a devotion to their sovereign, if they are interested in the welfare of India and the strength of the British Empire, they should stand against these Bills to the end. Has our Government become so uncivilized as to make these repressive laws a part of its system of administration? Sir William asks whether it is not the duty of the members to help the Government. True it is and they can help the Government only if they oppose the Bills. The Government Member makes the incongruous remark that the conduct of the members in reference to these Bills will be the test to determine their fitness for having a responsible government. If any Indian yields to the persuasion of this Member and supports the Bills, the public will deem him to be a traitor to the country. No responsible government is armed with such a cruel law. It is only an irresponsible government that will resort to such a barbarous piece of legislation. If India is to have any the least measure of reform, is it not necessary to get rid of repressive laws now in force? This is the time for the non-official members to show that they are true Indians. It is they that should defeat the object of the authorities in respect of these Bills.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 11th February, publishes in Tamil the resolutions passed at a meeting of the Madras Presidency Moslem League on the 5th idem, in one of which the League appeals to the Government to postpone the enactment of these Bills for one year, if total abandonment is not possible at present.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 10th February, publishes a notice, over the signatures of the President and other office-bearers of the Gannavaram taluk ryots' association, inviting the ryots of the taluk to a special meeting to be held at Indupalli on 23rd February 1919, under the presidency of Mr. C. Rajagopala Acharyulu, B.A., B.L., Government Pleader, 'to give a decisive expression to the firm opinion of the ryots, that to maintain the prestige of the British Empire the Government of India should withdraw the thoughtless Criminal Law Amendment Bills, which they have without the slightest consideration, introduced into the Imperial Legislative Council in pursuance of the recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission in which the people have not the least faith, as the said Bills are most prejudicial to the progress of the ryot population, and debase them by depriving them of their moral [sic] rights, as they help to make the Government officers, tyrants over the people by tempting them to accept bribes and habituating them to improper practices, as there is no country where such needless and unjust laws exist, except Russia of the past, and as they are productive of intense excitement and unrest among the people, which is subversive and destructive of sacred British statesmanship.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 4th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

In a long leading article under the heading 'the two impending terrible bills', the Manorama, of the 4th February, points out that it was apprehended when the Defence of India Act was passed as an emergency war measure, that it was likely to be abused and experience has amply proved that the apprehension was not altogether unfounded. The people however had the consolation that this ill-omened Act would cease to be in force six months after the close of the war. But the report of the Rowlatt Committee dispelled all such hopes. It was not anticipated, however, that action will be taken in such haste to carry out the recommendations of that Committee. The recommendations of several commissions on important matters of public welfare are rusting (in Government archives). The deligence of Government to pass repressive measures is indeed praiseworthy! If the two Bills should be passed into law, they will rob the people of their personal liberty and put into the hands of the Executive officers most arbitrary powers to arrest and imprison people as they please and without allowing the sufferers any right of appeal. It is surprising that the Government should have decided to enact these measures at a time when the question of granting self-government to India is being considered. The paper refers to the speeches of Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar and Mr. Yakub Hasan at the recent meeting held at the Gokhale Hall to protest against these measures, and the former is reported to have said that as a result of these measures India will become more obstinate than Ireland and will cause England more trouble, and the latter is reported to have predicted that the result will be an upheaval far greater than that of 1857 and adds:—To try to bring into force such repressive measures contrary to the wishes of the people is not becoming on the part of any Government. It is because of the want of human kindness in the administrative system that such laws are considered to be necessary. If the system was sufficiently humane such a conclusion would not have been arrived at. In future, in no part of the world can a Government exist which does not pay heed and give full play to public opinion, and the speech of President Wilson at the Peace Conference amply testifies to this principle. Do the Government of India think that the opinion of President Wilson is worthless?

MANORAMA, Calicut, 11th Feb. 1919.

Reverting to the same subject, the Manorama, of the 11th February, asks what necessity or reason there was to enact measures relating to the whole of India, when even according to the Rowlatt Committee's report anarchist movements were confined to a few isolated places and what harm there could possibly be to deal with sedition under the ordinary criminal law, establishing, if necessary, a special court to try such cases. The article records the admission of the Bills in the teeth of unanimous opposition from the Indian non-official members and prays the British Government to intervene.

MALABAR ISLAM, Mattancherri, 7th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the same subject, the Malabar Islam, of the 7th February, thinks that at a time when the people of India were entertaining the hope that India would be granted self-government as a result of the great war, it was greatly to be regretted that the Government should attempt to pass new laws which would enable the officers of Government to destroy completely at their will even the freedom now enjoyed by Indians. It points out that these laws deprive the accused of all opportunities of defence and the public of all their freedom, and there will be none bold enough to undertake necessary action in respect of administrative affairs or to criticise the conduct of public servants, and as a result all new aspirations will languish as if the country were paralysed. If the people's mouths are gagged, the bureaucracy will become autocratic. The various protest meetings held in different parts of India show that the Bills are not acceptable to the people. In the light of the tranquility reported in the administrative report of India, the Bills are quite uncalled for and could well await disposal by the new legislative councils to be introduced under the reform scheme.

The Rowlatt Bills and the power to enact them.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

Discussing the competency of the Government of India to enact the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th February, writes under this heading:—. . . From the judgment given in the Moment case, it is clear that the East India Company could have no power to pass an Act like the Defence of India Act. . . It will be proper, if the Government abandon these repressive measures, especially at the present time when self-government is about to be introduced. . .

The Madras Legislative Council and a strange event.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

55. Referring to the Hon'ble Mr. B V. Narasimha Ayyar's walking out from the meeting of the Local Legislative Council on the first day of its last session as a protest, the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th February, remarks:—. . . When public opinion is flouted and popular ideals are lightly treated, no self-respecting representative of the people can behave otherwise. We are confident that the popular representatives in the Imperial Legislative Council will similarly maintain their self-respect at the present crisis.

The Madras Legislative Council and the passing of the Budget.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

56. Adverting to the Government Budget Estimate for 1919–20, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th February, observes in its leader: —Though the economic condition of the Madras Presidency is very satisfactory, it affords room for fear to those who have the welfare of the people at heart. The abkari revenue, being much larger than last year's, has contributed to the increase of the Government income. . . This leads us to infer that the wealth of the Province is derived from the drinking of its people. There cannot be a more deplorable state of affairs. . . The present miserable state of affairs does not admit of improvement, so long as the abkari revenue forms the main source of the Government income. Instead of expressing regret at such a condition in the Budget statement, Sir Alexander Cardew explains that it was the result of the high wages paid to the labouring classes by the ryots who were largely profited by the rise in the prices of food grains and that it was on account of the increase of these wages that the people could bear the high taxes imposed on intoxicating drinks. But the way of reasoning adopted by him excites our surprise when we consider the famine now prevailing in the country. . . Though it is true that ryots whose crops have not failed, have gained some profits on account of the rise in the price of paddy, it is a fact known to every one that the prices of articles which are necessary for their every-day life have abnormally risen. . . It will be thus easily seen that the profits made by ryots would hardly suffice for their necessaries of life. . . The agitation among the Andhra ryots owing to the proposed enhancement of water-rate will clearly show in what state they are. It is true, no doubt, that the outburst of unrest in the country is not commensurate with the famine which is now prevailing. It should be understood that this is due to the gentle disposition of the people, and the lootings that took place will only show the severity of the famine which tested the patience of even such gentle people. The Government may write in their reports that the lootings were engineered by political agitators, and may thus console themselves. But the people cannot think in that way.

Sir Alexander Cardew is of opinion that the people could bear the burden of increased taxation on intoxicating drinks. But it is a fact known to everybody that drunkenness is likely to increase among men in despair suffering from severe famine. It is to drown their miseries that people naturally resort to drinks. . . The increase of abkari revenue should, therefore, mean the growing severity of famine. . . There can be no use, unless the present state is completely changed and attempts are made for the enforcement of total prohibition of drinking as in the United States of America. . . It is thus clear that drunkenness also is increasing along with the revenue. Increased taxation only goes to impoverish the masses all the more. . . The drink problem is not an ordinary problem. The well-being of the country is based on the solution of that problem. There is a strong difference of opinion between the people and the Government in this respect. . . The proceedings of the Council yesterday would show that not even one of the resolutions brought forward by the popular representatives has been accepted. There is thus no hope that any alterations will be made in the budget even this time. . . While provision has been made in the budget for the grant of war allowance to officers on Rs. 50 we fail to understand why such low-paid servants as the karnam and the vettian who may be said to be the foundation of the Government should be denied this concession. . . 136·51 lakhs of rupees is the budget estimate for the Police department for 1919–20 as against 120·46 lakhs which was the sum actually spent in 1918–19. The reasons for this increased expenditure are not known. . . At a time when every one is fondly hoping that peace will soon be established on account of the termination of the war, it cannot but seem strange that the expenditure over the Police department should show increase instead of decrease. . . The sum set apart for education is not so liberal as to satisfy the needs of the present times. The provision for health and medicine is not also encouraging. The very meagre estimate for irrigation works is disappointing. The proposed expenditure of 15·62 lakhs for Public Works Department officials seems to be too heavy. . . The people will not be in a position to settle public income and expenditure, unless they have the control of the exchequer. Till then, the Government will have the financial control in their hands. There is no doubt that any scheme of self-government which does not confer financial control on the people will be useless.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The Imperial Legislative Council

57. Referring to the speech of His Excellency, the Viceroy opening the latest session of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th February, observes in its leader:—. . . It is regrettable that the speech of the Viceroy at the Imperial Legislative Council, dealing as it does with many important topics of the day, should be full of remarks so disappointing to the people of this country. . . His apprehension about the Arms Act report submitted by the committee of enquiry to the Secretary of State as not being cast in a mould that will satisfy all is enough to give us beforehand an idea of its nature. . . His announcement of the grant of 300 lakhs of rupees by the Imperial Government for the introduction of compulsory elementary education in places like Bombay, Bihar and Orissa is commendable, and has earned for him the gratitude of all Indians. . . He said that epidemics like 'influenza' which had wrought such havoc in the country revealed the defects of our sanitation. But it will not do to rest contented that this is the main cause. The unbearable poverty of the people is the cause of this. Saying that the people suffered many hardships on account of the famine, he hopes that the rains which fell of late will mitigate this evil. It cannot but appear strange to any one that the Viceroy who is so sorry that the salaries of Indian Civil Service officers receiving thousands of rupees every month are not sufficient in these famine days should dispose of the grievances of the poor in one sentence in the above manner.

There are two important subjects which have been discussed in this speech and which are even more disappointing than these. The first of them relates to the Rowlatt Bills. . . It will be seen that the whole country irrespective of moderates and extremists has protested against the enactment of these Bills. . . . What is more than this is that even Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, himself a member of the Rowlatt Commission, has expressed his disapproval of these Bills. The remarks of the Viceroy urging their immediate enactment in the face of the strong public opinion against them are bound to be received with disappointment by the people who are afraid that the innocent also will suffer from them along with the guilty and that they would result in obstructing freedom. . . Sir William Vincent has assured that the object of the Bills is not to punish patriots nor to obstruct political movements. Even a stronger assurance was given at the time of introducing the Defence of India Act, and we know therefore by experience that even some innocent persons will also suffer under these Bills. To respect public opinion in the matter will be very safe for the Government. . . Now as for Reforms, the second important subject. The Indian Civil Servants have been accorded the right of appeal to the Government of India, whenever they feel themselves aggrieved. Similar promises have been made to the British merchants in unequivocal terms.

It will be clear from the above facts how far the Montagu reforms will promote the well-being of the people, and how unwilling the bureaucrats are to transfer their power to the hands of the people. It is not safe that the interests of the Civilians and English merchants should be preferred to the welfare of millions of men, and that obstructions should be thrown in the way of democracy. The speech of the Viceroy has cleared the situation. The bureaucracy is trying to defeat even the present meagre reforms which give so little of real power to the people. They are determined to follow the usual policy of repression side by side with concessions —a policy which already rendered the Morley-Minto reforms ineffectual and strengethened political agitation in the country instead of stamping out discontentment as expected by their authors. There is no doubt that these Bills also will confirm the past experience. . . When freedom is spreading throughout the world, it is ridiculous to obstruct it in India. It will be impossible for any people whatsoever to go against the tide of time.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

Supporting the enactment of the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhraprakasika, of the 8th February, remarks:— . . . The absence of crime at present does not obviate the necessity for repressive legislation.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

* * * * * *

A serious injustice.

58. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th February, publishes in Telugu an extract from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika reproducing the remarks of the John Bull on two cases decided by Justice Rowlatt in England and commenting thereon to the following effect:—. . . This Justice Rowlatt was invited from England by our paternal Government to come to India and lay the foundation of the new Bills. . . The judicial temperament of this Judge can be understood from the thirty months' rigorous imprisonment which he gave to the man who outraged the modesty of two girls and seven years' penal servitude to the man who burnt a farmer's haystack.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

The main issue.

59. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills in its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th February, observes:— . . . Sir William Vincent has admitted that no anarchical crime has been committed in any part of India since the middle of the year 1918 till now. The Rowlatt Commission also has come to the conclusion that it came to an end in the Bombay Presidency long ago. There is, of course, no place for it in the Madras Presidency. The Central Provinces, the United Provinces and Bihar are alike peaceful. Bengal alone afforded room for anarchical crime for a while. . . The Defence of India Act is bound to be in force for six months after the conclusion of peace. Anyhow it will operate for at least a year more. Anarchical crime has disappeared. In these circumstances, the people fail to understand what necessity there is for the enactment of repressive measures now. . . There will be no sort of unrest in the country, in case a satisfactory scheme of self-government is introduced. . . These instances will do to show that conciliation always dispels unrest A calm atmosphere is necessary for the working out of the scheme of reforms. Repressive measures cannot keep up such a peaceful condition. This is a historical fact. . . If the authorities entertain any doubts in this respect, let them accept the amendment of Mr. Patel to put in abeyance the consideration of these Bills until six months after the introduction of the new scheme of reforms and see for themselves. . . Moderates like Mr. Bannerjee, Sapru, and Sir G. Chitnavis are also opposing the Bills. It is left to the Government to read the public mind from this. There can be no room for doubt, if the Government notes what a reactionary like Mr. Shaffi has said about the Bills. . . Mr. Jinnah said that if the Bills should be passed into law, there would be an unprecedented agitation from one end of the country to another and that the good relations between the rulers and the ruled would be strained. When the fundamental principles of justice are going to be violated for the sake of punishing a very few individuals, no well-wishers of the country can approve of these Bills. For the passing of these extraordinary Bills, an unprecedented procedure has been adopted. The Bills have not been published in the Gazette and public opinion on them has not been invited. That the Bills should be referred to Select Committees soon after their introduction, and that the Committees should be asked to submit the reports at a very early date, are arrangements which are perfectly in keeping with the nature of these Bills. All the popular representatives have clearly explained the incompetency of the Government of India to enact the Bills. . . Notwithstanding the fact that all the non-official members have unanimously protested against the Bills, there is no wonder in the Government carrying their point, taking advantage of the minority of the non-official members. . . Further, it should be considered what necessity has arisen in India to enact measures which are not regarded as necessary in any civilised country. A National Defence Act has been in force in England also during the war. But the British Government does not think of perpetuating it. The mischief of labourers and the intimidation of electrical workers to plunge the whole of England in darkness lead us to fear that constitutional agitation is giving place to unconstitutional methods. These facts show that there is a greater necessity in England for repressive legislation than in India. And yet the English authorities are not losing their courage. They are not betraying unnecessary panic. They are not going to introduce repressive laws. Why should there be this wonder in India then? There is but one main issue. Reform or repression? Repression has at last been accepted. The Government have taken advantage of their numerical majority. Thirty-six members voted for and 21 against the Bills. . . The Bills have been referred to the Select Committees. Will the popular representatives work on them? If they should, they will have to bear to some extent the responsibility of passing these Bills. The country requests her representatives not to take such a step and is waiting to see how they will keep up their self-respect. The people will not hereafter be anxious about the success of reforms, when their very birth-rights are being taken away. What is the good of having reforms after that? We can understand from the Viceroy's speech how far those reforms will be useful. The people of India will have to concentrate their energies to regain their primary rights. . .

ANDHRAPAKASIKA, Madras, 8th Feb. 1919.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 2nd Jan. 1919.

Repressive legislation.

60. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills, the Hitakarini, of the 2nd February, writes in its leader under this heading:— . . . If any repressive legislation is necessary at present, it is better to leave it to the Councils to be newly constituted. It will be very safe for the Government to accept the amendment of Mr. Patel. It does not seem to be safe to enact the Bills merely relying on the strength of official majority. . . Let the Madras Mail understand now at least that the effusions of Anglo-Indians who are working in panic against Indian aspirations like bulls frightened by a red rag are also meaningless to Indians. . . Anglo-Indian papers are using their wits and energies in this manner to vilify Indians. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

Disregard of public opinion.

61. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th February, writes in its leader under this heading:—The official members have failed to prove the necessity for repressive legislation . . The Government having once appointed the Rowlatt Commission, Sir George Lowndes asks if it is fair on their part not to act up to the recommendations made by the Commission. He thinks it an improper act not to acept those recommendations, however flagrantly public opinion is flouted thereby. The secret inquiry conducted by the Rowlatt Commission, let it be remembered, bears resemblance to ex parte decrees. To try to bind the whole country by such an inquiry is unfair. . . There is but one effective remedy for unrest. It is conciliation. Coercion cannot accomplish this purpose. The voting of Mr. M. M. Hogg in favour of Mr. Bannerjee's amendment is worthy of note . . It is clear that the bureaucracy is not prepared to respect the force of public opinion, as it wants to carry out these measures in the teeth of popular opposition. . . There was an apprehension some time back that the differences of opinion created among our leaders by the scheme of reforms would become accentuated. But the repressive Bills succeeded in uniting them again. . . It is remarkable that such a moderate of moderates as Sir Narayan Chandravarkar, himself a member of the committee which inquired into the internments in Bengal, should contribute a series of articles condemning the new Bills. . . They may pass these measures by the sheer force of official majority. But such an Act cannot have the force of justice behind it, as has been remarked by Sir Chandravarkar. A law which is not based on moral force will increase unrest instead of diminishing it. . . . The father of an internee seems to have deposed before Sir Chandravarkar to the following effect: " . . . Has it ever occurred since the beginning of the world that young men as at present are taken away by the Police, to-day from this family and to-morrow from that, without any reasons being assigned ? . . . That young men should be taken away in our presence and in the presence of our neighbourers strikes terror into the hearts of the people living in villages." . . . Having rejected the advice of the moderates not to pass the Bills based on the ground that they will give rise to a strong agitation, it is ridiculous to ask for their support in putting down any such agitation, should it be started. . . . The moderates should not be elated by the flattery of Sir William Vincent and slacken their determination.

What is our future move ?

62. With reference to the Rowlatt Bills the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th February, writes under this heading :—Sir William Vincent has said that the Emergency Powers Bill would be put into force as a temporary measure for three years after the conclusion of peace. . . But it is hoping against hope that a repressive measure of that sort, when once passed, will be again repealed. . . These amendments (of the Indian Penal Code and Criminal Procedure Code) will upset the principles of law. The popular representatives have dissuaded the Government from enacting them, but all in vain. . . What should be our future move then ?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

63. The Sampadabhyudaya, of the 13th February, writes :—It is impossible to say whether it is the misfortune of England or of India that the Government of India in introducing these Bills have acted on the stupid suggestions of those who think that coercion can succeed in promoting loyalty, and proposed a measure which will lead the people to believe that Englishmen abandon their traditions when they come to this country. If these Bills should be passed into law, the fire of anger among many of the Indians will be ablaze, and the anger of the Government of India will be even greater when they see them disobey the Government. The heat created by this friction will undermine the glory, traditions and constitutionalism of the British. The British will incur the evil repute of having lost their traditions in India, and the Indians will be notorious as Bolsheviks. . . In criticising the measure in the council, even the moderates began to speak like extremists The speeches of the Hon'bles Sastri, Bannerji, Malaviyya and Jinnah make one's hair stand on end, and the reader begins to wonder how the Indians, who are servile as a rule, came to show such manliness. It looks as though the non-official members regarded the council as a republican body. The speeches of the official members are even more surprising. Some of them seem to think themselves Nabobs. Since the officials form the majority the Bill will be passed into law. At least some of those who are entrusted with the enforcement of the measure will prove indiscreet. At least a few who are innocent will be punished. This will cause a blot on the fair name of the British. Justice is the very foundation of the British Empire. Emperors and rulers were swept away in the west like the leaves of trees in winter. This is because justice was ignored. The British Empire alone found itself firm, because it stood by the traditions of its constitution and remained popular. We pray that the British may not lose sight of those traditions in India, and that His Excellency the Viceroy, or failing he, the Secretary of State or the Parliament, may be pleased to withdraw the measure.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 13th Feb. 1919.

V.—Prospects of the Crops and the Condition of the People.

The poverty of India.

64. Adverting to a statement made by the Registrar of Co-operative Societies, Bombay, in an address recently delivered by him to the effect that India is a poor country and that the condition of its agriculturists is miserable, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th February, observes :—We feel greatly elated to see that, though a bureaucrat, he has spoken the truth. Let those bureaucrats and the editors of Anglo-Indian papers who, hiding the truth, blindly represent to the Government that India is a rich country and that, for any funds required to meet the expenditure of the British Empire, the Indian agriculturist may be taxed, note his words. The Government do not relieve the hardships of the Indian agriculturists. Owing to poverty these agriculturists are compelled to borrow at heavy rates of interest and suffer much without the means to repay the loans.

ENGLISH PAPERS.

I—Foreign Politics.

1. New India, of the 21st February, states:—"The world-wide hope raised by the suggestion of the formation of a League of Nations that should guard the world's peace, and should use the strength of all to protect the Rights and the Liberty of the smallest nation, is dashed into pieces by the publication of the Articles of 'The League of Nations Covenant,' as the proposed constitution. . . It is obviously to be a League of White Nations, for though Japan is there, she will be helpless, one vote against four, perhaps one vote against eight. . . Various countries are in future to have 'mandates' to look after the peoples whom the League considers too weak to stand alone. They might prefer floundering to slavery, but that is not to be permitted under this gigantic tyranny. . . What right have these arrogant White Nations to assign 'tutors, advisers and directors' to these 'helpless peoples?' . . What hope have the coloured races of the world against this terrible spectre of a League of White Nations, with their 'words smoother than butter, having war in their hearts?' Indian soldiers will have fought to perpetuate the slavery of their countrymen in South Africa, and to bring all Africa under the exploitation of the white peoples. . . What hope will there be under this frightful yoke of the armed White Mandatories advising and directing the unarmed coloured peoples? The irony of it is that from the coloured races have proceeded the greatest of mankind; when will the white races give to humanity a Buddha or a Christ?"

The League of White Nations.

2. The West Coast Spectator, of the 18th February, writes:—"As we have no desire to confuse the inquiry Mr. Hall is conducting with his usual zeal and thoroughness, we shall just put two or three questions which we should like very much to be answered by the people concerned or taken up by the District Magistrate for further elucidation. . . No. (1) Had the Circle Inspector of Police at Manjeri any information beforehand of the impending outbreak? No. (2) Did the Pandicad or Wandur Sub-Inspector send a report about it a few days before the actual occurrence? No. (3) What did the Sub-Inspector do? and No. (4) Where was the Circle Inspector when the outbreak did actually take place? We are told that the diary kept by the Sub-Inspector at Pandicad will throw some light on these questions. Another question we desire to ask is, if it is true that the Circle Inspector interviewed Chekku Haji a few days before the outbreak, on receipt of information from the Sub-Inspector, and if he did, did he send a report to the higher authorities and take precautionary measures, or did he content himself with a mere admonition to Chekku Haji?

"Let there be a thorough inquiry, and let there be no attempt at white-washing. We are heartily sick of these periodical outbreaks and carnivals of bloodshed, and when we pay a colossal sum of money to maintain a police force which is claimed to be efficient we expect that force to prevent outbreaks of crime."

3. The Indian Patriot, of the 19th February, observes:—"Diwan Bahadur P. Tygaraya Chettiyar has given notice that he would move at the meeting of the Corporation on Thursday the 20th instant for an address to be presented to His Excellency Lord Pentland on the eve of his departure 'in view of the great interest His Excellency has been taking for the health of the City and for the material, moral and social progress of the Presidency in general.'

"After the way in which the suggestions made by the Corporation, not once but twice, regarding the Municipal Bill were treated in the Council by the Government of His Excellency, and the amendments proposed by the Corporation were all opposed and rejected and the amendments opposed by the Corporation were carried by the solid official phalanx, it looks very much like licking the foot that kicks you for that body to vote an address to Lord Pentland. But there are those in this country who will do it."

HINDU, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

The Hindu, of the 21st February, has the following:—"The Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achari said at the Corporation meeting held yesterday that the discussion on Mr. Tyagaraya Chetti's resolution to present Lord Pentland with an address prior to his departure would take a long time. His remark was doubtless cast in euphemistic phraseology. It has never been the custom for the Corporation to present a departing Governor with an address, and we consider it a curious psychological aberration that two Commissioners should have been afflicted with the idea of bidding Lord Pentland godspeed through the medium of a Corporation address. . . There has been no Governor of this Presidency who has treated the Corporation so cavalierly as Lord Pentland. The manner in which he disregarded the unanimous opinion of the Corporation with respect to the holding of the Park Fair must be fresh in the memories of our readers, and the way in which the Municipal Bill has been rushed through the Council, with scant regard to the amendments made by the non-official members of the Council, is evidence of the fact that the Corporation is of little or no consequence whatever, in the opinion of Lord Pentland and the Government over which he still presides."

(k) General.

EVERYMAN'S REVIEW, Madras, February 1919.

4. Everyman's Review, for February, has the following:—"Such is the India of to-day with a third-rate world position as a territorial unit and a still worse subject-position as a dependency within the British Empire itself. While even small nations and tribes are accorded an honourable, independent treatment, the Indian continent peopled with vast millions and varied races and tribes is still in bondage and subjection, is still snubbed and bullied at every turn and has but a feeble voice even to protest in the interests of her own children. While others want more territories and powers of exploitation, India seeks and seeks in vain only freedom from undue exploitation and administrative ill-treatment. The people beg of the Government to have a nominee of their choice at the Peace Conference; but the Government of India is far too high and powerful to heed to such beggarly clamour."

India and the Peace Conference.

NEW INDIA, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

Writing under the heading "India and the League of Nations", New India, of the 17th February, observes:—"Article 7 of the League of Nations' covenant lays down the conditions of admission to the League of States and limits the right to 'fully self-governing countries, including the dominions and the colonies.' It makes no mention of India and presumably our country cannot come under the category of 'fully self-governing countries.' Because we have been deprived of the rights of self-government, first by foreign aggrandisement and later on by the ruling bureaucracy, we shall be deprived of all representation at the Council of the Nations through this handicap. The sooner we get rid of the present drawbacks the better for our status in the world. There is no other remedy but Home Rule."

THE COMMONWEAL, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

5. The Commonweal, for the week ending 14th February, observes:—"Now that the anxiety about the Rowlatt Bills has assumed a stage beyond painful suspense, the country will devote its attention to the question of Reforms. The Viceroy's opening speech at the session is most disappointing in this respect. He has made an abject surrender to the Anglo-Indian opposition to the Reforms, promising it to whittle down the scheme to any extent, till the country will have a mere shadow of 'responsible government'. The interest of the country will be sacrificed to appease the Indian Civil Service. They will get larger pay, larger pensions, and larger leave privileges than they enjoy at present. They will exercise the same irresponsible power which they now do. The Indian Ministers are merely puppets. They are to control certain departments, but will have no power whatever over the services under them, for the services will be defended by the Governor, the Indian Government and the Secretary of State. Under such humiliating circumstances we wonder whether any self-respecting Indian will come forward to be ministers. But the Viceroy himself has hinted that toadies and persons prepared to be tools in the hands of the irresponsible part of the Government, will be chosen."

The Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms Scheme.

Official majorities in Indian Legislative Councils.

6. In a leader under the heading 'Council or Camouflage?', New India, of the 15th February, says:—"Considering the way in which official majorities are used in Indian Legislative Councils—whether supreme or local—it is a matter for astonishment why there should be any Legislative Councils at all. Using modern parlance, we are tempted to wonder whether they are not a part of an elaborate machinery of camouflage intended to persuade the Indian people that they are looking at the beginnings of self-government, and to convince the world that representative institutions are by no means absent from the Indian systems of Government. . . As a general rule, the bureaucracy goes its own sweet way according to its own sweet will, and the Indian members of Council waste their own particular sweetness on the desert air of the Council Chamber. We do not know how the Government of India and the Local Governments are able to reconcile their own indifference to public opinion with the apparently forward policy adopted and declared vital by the statesmen of the Empire. . . They take it for granted that Indian agitation is, in most cases, unlikely to go very far. It is always possible to retrieve the situation when public disapproval manifests itself in an unpleasantly emphatic manner. Until the latter point is reached, Executive Councillors may safely look upon their Indian colleagues with bland, cynical and somewhat amused expressions. . . Let it be known to the world that it is possible in India for the whole people to cry out against a proposed law, and yet for that law to be forced upon the Statute Book and its provisions used without the slightest regard to the protests of the nation."

Economic conditions in the Madras Presidency.

7. The following appears in the Hindu of the 15th February:—"There was one question of great moment to which but little attention was paid at the meeting of the local Legislative Council when resolutions on the budget were discussed. The economic situation in the Presidency is going from bad to worse; and it would have been well if it had been ascertained of the Government what measures Government exactly proposed to take to meet it. . . The situation was considered very bad towards the close of last year when rice was selling at three measures or so a rupee as a result of which there was some looting. The same quality of rice sells at present at less than two and a half measures. . . What is worse, it is threatened that the price may go higher up with little chance of its lowering in the near future. . . If such prices obtain at the harvest season it is easy to conceive what will be the case later in the year when stocks will be in a depleted condition. . . The Hon'ble Sir Alexander Cardew, in his speech on the Hon'ble Mr. Yakub Hasan's resolution recommending the abolition of the office of the Director of Civil Supplies, admitted that the present economic conditions in the Presidency were serious. . . Sir Alexander Cardew proclaims that he could not say what would happen in the next few months—a confession that the Government have no definite programme to keep a steady flow of supplies. If they themselves are thus uncertain as to the future, it is not inexcusable if the dealers refuse to lower prices and keep on threatening that prices would rise higher. . . Certainly transport of food to the poor, struggling population, suffering acute distress for more than four years, should be given priority to transport of war materials. More energetic and effective steps characterised by well-informed foresight, are needed, if we are to escape disaster. We trust therefore that Government will take steps to see that provision is at once made to bring fresh supplies, before we are inextricably involved in dangerous difficulties."

Home Rule for India.

8. The following appears in the Mysore Patriot of the 18th February:—"The Moderates, in dancing to the tune of the officials, exclaim that, if they do not accept the halting reforms outlined in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report and whittled down by the Sydenham party in England, they would get no reform at all. We do not want the shadows and apologies of reforms. If the British Government, the British Parliament and the British people find it in their hearts to go behind the promises they have made and if they are determined not to give Home Rule, if the apologies for Home Rule are not accepted let India have no Home Rule. Let a number of Curzons, Sydenhams and Nawabs of that description rule India; and they will, before long, pave the way for Home Rule. Whoever expected the dreadful revolution in Europe to-day and what do we know what is in the womb of time for India and what her future is likely to be? It is better that the Nationalists of India stick to their policy of getting either a whole loaf or no loaf."

India and self-determination.

9. Justice, of the 19th February, says:—"We know what the Peace Conference has been doing, and we also know India's place in the British Empire. But there are politicians among us, victims of sonorous phrases, who proceed as if India were a newly-conquered country with its Government still unsettled the internal affairs of which should occupy the attention of the Peace Conference. Mr. Tilak is now in England, and that gentleman or some under-study of his has been sending letters to certain extremist organs evidently to revive and sustain the drooping spirits of the species of imaginative politicians who apparently want some sort of delusion for them to cherish. . . If politics were a surviving branch of ancient casuistry all this sort of stuff would pass muster. But unfortunately for Mr. Tilak and his coterie it is a social art, though they themselves persistently decline to view it in that light. Mr. Tilak, the breaker of the Surat Congress, is very keen about Indian unity. He does not and possibly cannot understand that he is one efficient cause of disunion."

Justice, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Political parties in India.

10. Justice, of the 21st February, says:—"As the Montford drama approaches its denouement, political parties in India seem to multiply like rabbits in Australia. At the time of the Montford investigation, there existed an Indian Home Rule party who were determined to die in the last ditch for securing Home Rule for India. As the Montford scheme burst on the Indian political horizon, the Home Rule party began to split up. . . The split was a small one, for the moderate party at this stage of it existence required high-power miscroscopes to observe it. Recruitment for the Moderate party went on even more vigorously than the recruitment for the Indian army. And as a result of these extraordinary efforts something like a party was formed which consisted of more leaders than followers. . . An observant Englishman, after a visit to the Indian National Congress, described India as an anthropological museum of living specimens. The intelligent British elector, after listening to the various views of different political deputations, might come to the conclusion that political opinion in India consists of various assortments of extremism, seasoned with anti-British tendencies of differing degrees of bitterness."

Justice, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

The Indian Home Rule party in England.

11. Justice, of the 21st February, writes:—"On the eve of the general election the Indian Home Rule party in England issued a statement of their case, the full text of which we reproduce elsewhere if only to show how without comprehending the conditions amidst which they live, move and have their being men become slaves to words and phrases copied as they undoubtedly are from past and contemporary literature. It is not necessary to dwell upon the wrong assumptions, the false analogies and the distortion of facts of which this statement is full. We need only refer the reader's attention to the absolute nonsense indulged in by the author of this precious document to prove that India is a nation. . . Indeed, for bare-faced effrontery nothing could beat this latest offspring of the Home Ruler's self-deluding fancy."

III.—Legislation.

12. Everyman's Review, for February, says :—

Everyman's Review, Madras, February 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

"A Betrayal of Weakness.

"The Bills of repression framed by the British authorities of India for immediate inclusion into the Statute Book betray the weakness of the foreign and alien Government existing at present in the most lurid light. . . The giant of prodigious strength is the blind victim of his own fears and the bondsman of his deluding fancies when he stalks up and down and makes use of his most mighty limbs to detect the least sound of irreverence or whispering movements of disrespect. . . The monarch or the Government enthroned over the very summit of human power betrays its despicable mortal and earthly nature when its main attention is centred on the thought of the rats and vermins who might burrow beneath and loosen the foundations of the fastnesses. After the most glorious victory in the greatest war in history, after years of fighting in the cause of human justice and liberty after promises of self-government and pledges of more responsible administration, who but the powerfully-weak bureaucrats of India, who but the fear-obsessed and repression-resorting alien administrators of India would have thought it opportune to introduce these infamous Bills into the Legislative Council at this hour of our country's and world's history ?

"These repression Bills stand condemned on many grounds. From the very nature of their inception, from the haste with which they are sought to be inscribed in the permanent Statute Book, from the precedence they are given in time and importance to the great Reform proposals which are yet in preparation, from the unanimity of opinion amongst the highest officials as regards the desirability of enforcing them against the wishes of the whole country, these Bills of bondage and fetters to freedom, these embodiments of distrust and incitements to disloyalty, these stimulants to sedition and provocations of the worst passions are reprehensible and objectionable, censurable and blameworthy to the highest degree. . . It is the fear of the pestilence of sedition and the contagion of disloyal ideas, rather than of the persons of the seditionists, that has hastened the hands of the authorities to forge such shackles and fetters, such clogs and obstructions in the path of free movements of all persons and free expressions of all ideas. . . As it is and as it ever was in the past, the British have never cared for anything but their own interests, have never striven to win the affections of the poor millions, have never made themselves human and lovable, though it must be granted they have never gone out of their province of immediate and personal interests to do any harm to others for the mere love of doing so, as the Germans perpetrated in their Colonies and the Belgians in the Congo. Whenever the British do anything good or bad in India, they do it out of calculated self-interest with an eye for the continuation of their overlordship in this alien soil and the consequent economic gain to themselves and imperial glory to their nation."

Justice, of the 11th February, * observes:—"The Rowlatt Bills have been referred to a select committee for report. . . The motion to commit the Bills was hotly contested by the non-official Indian Members of the Imperial Legislative Council. Most of them spoke in unmeasured condemnation of the measure from excellent motives, but we are afraid in thorough misapprehension of the scope of the Bills and of the need for enacting them. . . It is altogether a misrepresentation to say that these Bills are directed against constitutional agitation, however violent in character. The raison de etre of the Bills is the maintenance of law and order, the protection of the person and property of the Indian citizen. The ordinary law has been found to be quite insufficient, if not powerless to afford the required protection while the Defence of India Act has demonstrated its potency to repress this particular class of crime. . . Has the Act ever been directed against political agitation, against violent speeches, against those who openly avowed that they were the enemies of the British Government or even against those who publicly said they could not see any justification for asking people to recruit to defend the Indian Empire of a foreign nation against the menace of a foe who was also a foreigner? Did the existence of the Defence of India Act thwart or make any impression on the violence of the political agitation that we have been witnessing these last two or three years? Has it helped to diminish attacks on the Government in season and out of season and have those who did so been dealt with under the Defence of India Act? . . If the Indian revolutionaries and anarchists, about whose existence even the opponents of the new legislation in the Imperial Council had no doubt, can be picked up in the street, would they not prove willing tools in the hands of the Bolshevist agents helping their propaganda work to subvert the Government and society and introduce a reign of terror such as, alas! has been the experience of Petrograd for the past six months? Is it not then the bounden duty of all right thinking men, of every patriot and well wisher of India to lend the weight of his support to measures calculated to prevent the catastrophy that has overtaken Russia? . . That the proposed legislation will be a reflection on the people of India is in our opinion quite unfounded. If penal laws argue the character of the inhabitants, then the Penal Code does inflict humiliation on the people. Respectable people have nothing to be ashamed of or to fear because of certain penal laws. even severe penal laws. These affect only the criminal who exists in all countries. We know how sparingly and even reluctantly the regulation of 1818, and the Moplah Act of Malabar have been availed of by the Government. . . For our part we regret that the non-official Indian members organized such vigorous opposition to the Bills. It would afford evidence to the enemies of Indian progress of our inability to realize responsibilities, the grave responsibilities in face of the existence of revolutionary and anarchical conspiracies in India and the danger, namely, of the threatened invasion by Bolshevism."

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Wednesday Review, for the week ending 12th February, remarks:—"The announcement made at the Imperial Council that the Rowlatt Bills will be in operation only for a period of three years after the conclusion of peace will reassure the public mind as to the attitude of the Government towards coercive legislation. . . We cannot help saying that the Honourable Members who opposed the introduction of the Bills made a tactical blunder. They thereby took up an attitude which was slightly inconsistent with their repeated professions of co-operation with the Government in putting down revolutionary conspiracies. . . It is futile to contend that the Government of India are alarmists and they have an exaggerated notion of the nature and extent of the revolutionary conspiracy in Bengal and elsewhere and they have deliberately embarked upon a policy of coercive legislation to put down the liberty and the just rights of the citizens. . . We have said that the Honourable Members who opposed the introduction of the Rowlatt Bills committed a tactical blunder. . . By opposing their very introduction they have taken an irreconcilable attitude which not only lays them open to the suspicion that while they are loud in their professions of horror at anarchist doings, they will not help the Government in repressing anarchy, but will also impair the value of their criticisms when the Bills are taken up for consideration by the Council"

People's Opinion, Trivandrum, 15th Feb. 1919.

The People's Opinion, of the 15th February, says:—"No Indian question has evoked such unanimous protest in unmistakable terms from the Indian public as the pernicious piece of legislation embodied in the Rowlatt Bills that has been recently introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council by the Government of India. . . The unanimous opposition of the non-official members in the Council is a faithful reflux of the Indian opinion throughout the country. . . The Government persists in imposing this legislation and does not incline to realize that it is unnecessarily throwing the country into a vortex of agitation and discontent. The necessity for maintaining the repressive measure for three years in addition to the existing laws of the country is not either urgent or immediate, and the Government have woefully failed to gauge the situation rightly. We hope in the interests of good Government that better counsels will prevail."

New India, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

In the fourth of a series of articles on these Bills Mrs. Besant writes in New India of the 17th February:—"If this Bill and its still more abominable fellow do not stir the Nation up to win Home Rule as quickly as possible, it will deserve to be the slave Nation to which these Bills reduce it."

In the fifth article on 'these Bills' Mrs. Besant, in New India, of the 18th February, observes:—"Britain under the Star Chamber was in the condition that India will be reduced to if this Bill becomes law, and the fact that the Government of India can force it into law emphasises the necessity of breaking up the 'machinery of autocracy,' so carefully preserved in the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals. . . It is idle to talk of the safeguard of the high character of our rulers. They are hardly comparable with Cecil and Burghley, who connived at the executions sanctioned by the Star Chamber. The great revolution in Britain was caused by the abuses of the Star Chamber, which infringed Magna Carta, and thus set subjects free from their allegiance to the Kings, justified their taking up of arms against him, and his execution for treason to the Nation. Is it not treason to the Empire to reintroduce in a part of it Star Chamber methods, and provisions even worse than those of that detested institution, and is it not a shocking return to India for her splendid services in the days of peril to the Empire, to place at the mercy of an autocrat the life, liberty and property of every man and woman in the country, as the first legislation of the opening year of Peace? The terrible degradation of India in the eyes of the world by the forcing upon her of legislation unparalleled in any civilized country, must cause us all to bow our heads in shame before free peoples, and Britain is even more deeply shamed by the confession that she cannot rule India without recourse to the methods of Russia under the Tsars. . . No Indian, no champion of Indian liberty, is safe when an English bureaucrat sits on the Bench, who sees in the acknowledgment of the courage of an anarchist a sympathy with assassination, as it may diminish the horror of his crime!"

NEW INDIA, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

In the sixth article on this subject Mrs. Besant says:—"Section 23 gives the monstrous power 'to every officer of Government' charged with such an order, of using 'any and every means to enforce compliance with the same'. The italicised words are thus printed with no reservation. The unhappy victim, untried, with no offence proven against him, may be beaten, tortured, starved, in the well-known fashion, hitherto unauthorised. . . Be it noted that all these restrictions and penalties can be used where the Governor-General in Council thinks that there are only movements 'likely to lead' to offences. No offence need have been committed, though the liberty of every person in that area may be taken away at the will of the Local Government! And this is to be 'British justice,' as exhibited in India, in the year 1919, the year of peace. There is one comfort: such legislation will much hasten the coming of Home Rule which will relieve us from this tyranny."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

In the seventh article Mrs. Besant remarks:—"Such is an analysis of these cruel Acts, which will indelibly brand British rule in India as that of a bureaucracy which could only hold its own against the rebellious forces it had evoked by legislation unparalleled under the dominion of any civilised nation. Yet Britain is one of the Great Powers which is expected to be a mandatory under the proposed League of Nations!"

NEW INDIA, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

13. Justice, of the 13th February,* states:—"The attitude of the Madras Government in regard to the Madras City Municipal Bill, which is now being discussed in the Local Legislative Council, is rather strange. They have been opposing even the most necessary and useful amendments, and by means of their majority, throwing them out. Upon these amendments and on the general character of the Bill we shall have something to say later on. We must here protest strongly against the narrow spirit in which the Madras Government have been dealing with questions connected with local self-government. . . To develop municipal institutions on sound and progressive lines, an intimate personal acquaintance with their working is essential. Unfortunately, there is none in the Government here who possesses this qualification, with the result that they but imperfectly comprehend the true spirit of municipal progress."

The Madras Government and the City Municipal Bill.

JUSTICE, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

Commenting further on this Bill, Justice, of the 15th February, remarks:—"The local Legislative Council completed yesterday what in parliamentary language is called the report stage of the City Municipal Bill. . . We cannot understand what object will be served by reforms of local bodies on the lines adopted in the present Bill. We can only find one explanation why such useless attempts at reforms are made. The legislatures in India dominated and controlled by the Local and Imperial Governments in India have got into a groove, and the official mind finds itself difficult to get out of that groove. It is force of habit rather than anything else that is responsible for this sort of aimless legislation. The Viceroy and the Secretary of State were right in saying that the reform of local bodies should hereafter be undertaken by autonomous provinces. Why then did they not stop these attempts at so-called reforms? Enormous amount of the valuable time of both officials and non-officials has been wasted on this Bill of over 400 sections. It could have been postponed a little longer when the reformed Provincial Councils might have come into existence to undertake the legitimate duty of introducing reform into the sphere of local self-government.

"We are sorry a good deal of time and energy has been wasted. But something will have been gained if the public are even now convinced that it is as difficult to get an old Indian Provincial Government to produce a liberal measure of local self-government as it is to extract sun beams out of cucumber."

IV.—Native States.

Karnataka, Bangalore City, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Diwan's Assistant Private Secretary.

14. Writing under the heading 'a new appointment' the Karnataka, of the 15th February, says:—"But for the fact that some principles seem to us to be involved in it, we should not have liked to make any comments on the appointment of Mr. B. Puttayya, Assistant Superintendent, Government Press, as Assistant Private Secretary to the Diwan. . . The translation of a man from the printing press to the Private Secretary's office is a direct and violent negation of the principle of departmentalization in public service. Mr. Puttayya has specialized himself as a printer at considerable expense to the State; and it would be a manifest waste of assets to make him unlearn his technical knowledge and skill, or leave them unutilized. . . The office of Private Secretary is generally looked upon as the special preserve of the Civilian; and to let it be encroached upon by a technical man is to bring down two principles by a single stroke of the pen. . . To speak frankly, there is plenty of excuse to think that it is not in the interests of the public service, but solely in the interests of caste or communal interests that Mr. Puttayya has been pitchforked in the new position; and we cannot think that the change would be agreeable to him—apart from its financial aspect—or serviceable to communalists or partisans, for he is, to our knowledge, free from venom and vulgarism of all sorts. . . An appointment lending itself to such unedifying interpretations must occasion a genuine pang of regret in the hearts of all sincere lovers of the State; and we cannot help wishing the officiating Diwan had shown a little more firmness in standing by the principle of 'no communal representation'—the upholding of which principle was perhaps his most notable performance as a Councillor."

Justice, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The Diwan of Cochin.

15. Justice, of the 19th February, observes:—"Cochin is a small Native State, smaller in size than the adjoining British taluk. But Cochin's Diwan is great. There is more excitement associated with the selection of the Diwan of Cochin than with the election of the President of the United States. . . There was a time when Cochin enjoyed Home Rule, when the Cochin State was able to furnish its own Diwans. We remember the happy days of Cochin under the Diwanship of Messrs. Sankunni Menon and Govinda Menon. Since their days, while British India has been creeping towards Home Rule, Cochin has been moving backwards like a crab and losing the little Home Rule that it did possess. . . Now, if we can credit all that we hear on this subject, Cochin is about to slip back once more and accept a Brahman Deputy Collector as its Diwan. The phenomenon is all the more interesting as the degenerative process is about to take place at a time when the educated Cochinites, or at all events, a majority of them have developed into greater Home Rulers than their colleagues in British India. Cochinites, we are told, are enthusiastic about Home Rule for British India. We have never heard anything about their state of mind regarding Home Rule for Cochin itself. . . The credit of bringing about such an appointment, if such has been brought about, will undoubtedly rest with the wirepullers and friends of the future Diwan. The usual court intrigues which used to be such a familiar feature of Oriental courts would have to be conducted by these wirepullers. They have to assure the Madras Government on the one hand that the Raja has set his heart on securing the services of this particular Brahman Deputy Collector, and on the other they have to assure the Raja that the Madras Government would not spare the services of any officer except those of this particular Brahman Deputy Collector. . . We do not feel sorry for the educated people of Cochin, for however active they may have been about discussing Home Rule for British India, we are not aware of their having done anything to advance the political future of their own country. And therefore the arrival of a Brahman Deputy Collector to boss over them may not be an unsuitable tonic to them."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

News about Germany.

16. The Desabhaktan, of the 13th February, observes:—The authorities that administer the Government of Germany at present appear to state that they agree to the conclusion of peace only on condition that the words "the allies have won" are not used. Moreover, we understand that the Germans have not yet carried out the terms of the armistice. Now Von Hindenburg is said to be mustering an army of six lakhs strong. It is not known whether this is done to resume hostilities with the allies.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The German colonies.

17. Referring to Mr. Lloyd George's statement in the new Parliament that the Peace Conference decided that, in view of the world's safety and the welfare of the colonists, Germany should forfeit her rights to these colonies, the Desabhaktan, of the 15th February, observes:—We admit this to be a just procedure. But will not the Prime Minister consider the question whether the Indians in the colonies under the British Empire are treated impartially like the Europeans? Perhaps he is under the impression that the Indians are being governed in the same way as the British subjects in accordance with the Queen's proclamation!

Swadesamitran, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The League of Nations.

18. Dwelling at length on the articles of the covenant of the League of Nations, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th February, observes:—There is no doubt that every one will appreciate the arrangement now made by the League to secure liberty for those nations, who, as a result of the war, ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which were governing them before. But it is not stated what provision has been made for the progress of other weaker nations who during the war continued to be under the same sovereignty as before. However, we trust that the condition of such nationalities will in no way be inferior to that of those under the tutelage of the League of Nations.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

Asking whether India will find a place in the Executive Committee of the League of Nations, the Desabhaktan, of the 18th February, questions why India has not been permitted to be one of the signatories to the League's Covenant.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

Rules of the League of Nations.

In its leaders under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th February, observes:— . . . There are many more defects in the draft rules of the League of Nations. We think that they will be soon set right. Only big nations have been allowed representation in the Executive Committee. . . The omission to extend this privilege to smaller nations is sure to give rise to many complicated issues in future. . . Small nations can no longer be vassals under big ones. . . There is another difficult problem to be solved by the League of Nations. . . The position of colonies has been very much exalted owing to the status of independent powers which has been accorded to them. It is clear that suitable arrangements have not been made with regard to dependent races. Some races are now being liberated from the domination of Germany and Turkey. In deciding their status, the rules of the League have not displayed much foresight. . . It is better that the League itself assumes the responsibility for the administration of those countries. If that responsibility is to be handed over to another big power, it will be difficult for such countries to have the necessary training in self-government, for she will only have new masters in place of the old. As the interests of the ruling race naturally receive prominence under such an arrangement, those of the ruled will not be so respected. . . Though President Wilson urges that those appointed as trustees, tutors and advisers should use their power for the benefit of the ruled, it will be difficult to carry it out in practice. There is no good of pious intentions. The freedom of many nations has already suffered on account of the so-called Imperial responsibilities. There can be absolutely no good of pursuing the same policy in future also. If the League of Nations should abolish subjection among the several races hereafter at least, and encourage feelings of brotherhood and co-operation among them, the peace and prosperity of the world will stand on a secure foundation. Otherwise, this important defect will be a source of ill-will among the different races and will give rise to quarrels among them. May the Peace Conference consider this matter deeply, set right this important defect and endeavour to establish justice.

The League of Nations.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 15th Feb. 1919.

In an article under this heading a writer in the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 15th February, observes:—We were so joyous and confident of the League of Nations proposed by President Wilson that it would had to the destruction of all the deadly armaments of modern warfare and had thought President Wilson to be possibly an incarnate being. We now see that it was all a mere delusion. The discussions at the Peace Conference reveal the fact that President Wilson and others are after all only ordinary human beings with all the limitations of common men, and that they preach rather than practice calmness and forbearance. Only a just settlement can secure a true peace. In practice however some of the parties to the Conference are seeking their own individual supremacy, though they profess perfect equality. This jugglery can be of no avail. If a person wants to preach morals to the world and be a libertive himself, there will be some one or other to chop off his head. Are they fit to rule who do not understand this? Unless everybody gives up high-handed action, another terrible war will break out before the Conference closes. It is a mistake to think that the Germans were vanquished in this war. They decided to join the League of Nations proposed by President Wilson, evacuated all conquered territory, and without making any conditions said they had surrendered themselves to the League of Nations. They now state that they will renew fighting if that is not done. They say therefore that if the leaders of the Allies establish a League of Nations to ensure the happiness of the whole world, there will be universal peace; else, revolutionary attempts might spread over the whole world and devastate it entirely.

Indians in South Africa.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

19. Hoping that the resolutions of the Congress of the Indians in South Africa will receive the attention of the British Government, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th February, observes:—Though one or two laws and regulations which could not be endured by the Indians were repealed through the efforts of Mr. Gandhi, many cruel laws which are a hindrance in the way of the Indians exercising their natural rights as British subjects have not yet been repealed. If the Union Government should still turn a deaf ear to the resolutions of the above Congress in this respect, that Government will be causing injury to the British Empire itself. If the Government of South Africa really wishes for the good of the British Empire, it must give up disgracing India which shines as an unparalleled jewel to the Empire. The repeal of repressive laws being all that the Indians in South Africa demand, is it not necessary that the colonies should comply with this demand seeing that the Indians have fought shoulder to shoulder with the colonial armies for the defence of South Africa and the British Empire?

Indians in South Africa.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

Andhrapatrika, of the 15th February, writes under this heading:—The grievances of the Indians in South Africa cannot be set right until India gets self-government. The Indians living in the Transvaal, the Cape Colony and Natal held a meeting and passed resolutions urging the repeal of such unjust provisions against Indians as the one which forbids them to go from one province to another in South Africa. . . They passed a resolution that the German South-West Africa should not be handed over to the South African Union, unless it repealed its severe laws. . .

Russia and the Allies.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 18th Feb. 1919.

20. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th February, writes:—The Allies want to crush the Bolsheriks. They help to create disunion among them. . . If those that seek to crush the enemy by creating party differences should take a leading part in the League of Nations, the latter, too, will, after all, be only a powerful party and not a real League of Nations. Although Germany and Russia are chiefly responsible for this great war, it cannot be said that the British and the French are not also responsible for it.

MALABAR ISLAM, Cochin, 24th and 31st Jan. 1919.

The future of Turkey.

21. The Malabar Islam, of the 24th January, gives an abstract in Malayalam of Mr. Yakub Hasan's speech at the mass meeting of Mussalmans, held at Madras on 17th January, and a translation of the resolutions passed thereat. In its issue of the 31st January, the same paper remarks that the Mussalmans of India are very solicitous about the future of Turkey, and expresses the hope that the British Government, whose Moslem subjects are greater in number than those of any other empire or government in the world, will not deal with Moslem powers in a way calculated to cause pain to the whole Moslem world.

MALAYALA MANORAMA, Kottayam, 15th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the agitation set on foot by the Moslem world that the future of Turkey should be settled agreeably to their wishes and adverting to the resolutions passed at a Moslem meeting recently held at Madras, the Malayala Manorama, of the 15th February, points out that in view of the Turkish misrule of alien people, such as the Armenians, Arabs, Jews, Greeks, etc., and atrocities committed such as were unknown and unheard of in any other part of the world, and of the desirability of keeping Armenia, Palestine, Arabia and Mesopotamia independent of Turkey, it is not likely that in future these will be entrusted to the care of the Government of Turkey.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

Mussalmans and Turkey.

22. The Qaumi Report, of the 4th February, in a leader writes:—To-day Reuter gives a summary of the opinion of the famous Westminster Gazette which proves that Mussalmans in London have submitted a petition to Mr. Balfour for careful consideration. It is a matter of great gratification that the paper has not dealt a death blow to wisdom and justice.

It writes:—The way in which Mussalmans have sided with the Government in the war has acquired for them a special right, and it is our duty to have regard to their religion and history.

Mussalmans only want this much. If, in spite of present occurrences, Mussalmans regard the Turkish Empire as acquainted with their religion, it is left to them to do so. The fate of Constantinople should be decided in accordance with the desires of the city and the colonies.

The editor of the Qaumi Report applauds the English paper and says that it is quite just in its remarks. This is what is wanted by the Mussalmans of India—that regard should be had to their religion and history and that the Moslem Khalifate should not be dismembered. The fact is, religious reasons are so strong that Mussalmans cannot deprive the Sultan of the Usmania Khalifate.

The Qaumi Report hopes that the British Government will not accept the opinion of certain foolish friends as regards Turkey, and that it will have regard to the general aspirations of the Moslem world. We have no sympathy with the fighting power of the Turks but we are friends of their historical and religious greatness. We support the Khalifate and cannot approve its decline.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 10th Feb. 1919.

Another attack on the question of Constantinople.
Mr. Welby's heart-rending remarks

23. The Qaumi Report, of the 10th February, referring to the opinion of the Anglo-Indian Press and especially to Mr. Welby's criticisms, viz., "that even the warmest friend of the Turk must acknowledge that he is incapable of ruling non-Turkish peoples," observes:—We consider this to be a barefaced lie and no philosophy of the world can bear out the assertion that a ruling nation cannot govern its subordinate peoples.

Mr. Welby has in the issue of the Madras Times of the 8th idem given a very amazing account of his personal observation in which he says that it is the Turkish nation alone that cannot rule non-Turkish peoples. If the observation which he makes is one that has been seen through the spectacles of envy and rebellion, or through the telescope of prejudice and malice, we care little about it. Or if he has deprived the Turks of that power through some journalistic spell, we shall drop the argument; otherwise neither we nor the entire Muhammadan community of the world can hold other than that the Turks also are human beings and are capable of doing what another human being does.

Mr. Welby remarks that the Turks fail as practical administrators. This is also one of the questions of his mischievous false reasoning. On the other hand there are several forces in the world whose administrative capability has been questioned and several hundreds of such instances exist in ancient as well as in modern history. We know that the fate of Turkey depends on Mr. Welby's decision. He and some of his co-thinkers who are the national foes of the Islamic Government and do not wish to see Islam in ruling garb may wait patiently for this affair is in the hands of some independent English statesmen and we are sure that they will not err in the matter.

They know that it amounts to ignorance to accuse the Turks of incapability and consider that Muhammadan opinion in this matter deserves more consideration. Mr. Welby and his co-thinkers desire to easily secure two or four provinces for the British Government, but the Muhammadans wish that the world may reap the fruit of independence and the British Government may secure loyal friends. The object of the British Government in participating in the war was neither to rule Constantinople nor to appoint Mr. Welby the Governor of Mesopotamia.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Royal speech.

24. The Qaumi Report, of the 15th February, referring to His Majesty's speech, delivered at the opening of the Parliament, in which the King-Emperor expressed his joy at the termination of the war and appreciation of the peace proposals, and the services of the Indians rendered in the war stated that an Act on Reforms will be submitted during the Parliamentary sessions, writes:—

Undoubtedly the King's speech is not a political address which may be subjected to criticism, particularly King George's speech, unlike President Wilson or the Kaiser's pompous speech, is very simple and plain.

His Majesty's present speech has no bearing on the affairs connected with oreign countries, otherwise it used to contain always a few clauses in connexion with the Turkish and other nations. Probably this phase of it has been dropped on account of the inimical relations created by the war. It is, however, amazing to find that the King, under whose shadow the largest Muhammadan population exists, has not hinted at or touched the subject in any way. We know that King George is extremely well disposed towards his Muhammadan subjects, and he has often given expression to his friendly feelings. This policy had been in vogue during Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Asquith's ministries, but perhaps it appears that Mr. Lloyd George did not suggest to the King to make definite mention of Muhammadans, but contented himself with the mere mention of India. Whether it is a fact or no, we extremely regret to find that the old policy laid down by Peel, Burke, Beaconsfield and Gladstone is now being greatly neglected, and men of the present regime seem to take delight in defeating the designs of the ex-Minister, Mr. Asquith.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

The C.I.D. Police.

25. The Desabhaktan, of the 14th February, observes:—Though it is more than three years since Mr. Chenchayya was kept in custody under the Defence of India Act, still the Government have not explained the resons for so keeping him. Now he is in the prison house at Delhi. The object of frequently moving him from one place to another is not apparent.

The paper then publishes an extract from a letter written by him from Delhi to his brother describing the treatment given to him in the jail and remarks:—A perusal of this letter will certainly lead to tears of blood flowing from the eyes. We strongly suspect whether it is the practice with the C.I.D. officials to urge an innocent person to admit the commission of a crime. If the offence of which a person is convicted is first explained to him, and then he is asked to state whether he actually committed it, there is some appropriateness about it. But without doing so, if an innocent person is caught and repeatedly urged to give out the truth, what reply can he possibly give? Why does not this enter into the mind of the C.I.D. official? The Rowlatt Committee have based their report on the statements of such officials. Alas! We do not know how many more innocents are suffering like Chenchayya in prison. When is their salvation to come?

(d) Education.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, Jan. 1919.

National education.

26. The annual supplement of the Hindu Nesan, published in January 1919, contains in English an article on this subject by Mr. G. S. Arundale explaining the object of the society started for the promotion of national education in India, in which the following observations find place:— . . . "The educational system obtaining in India is foreign in origin, foreign in control, foreign in spirit and foreign in aim and objective. It came over from England in the early years of the nineteenth century, and is less up to date than any other system in the civilized world. . . The interests of Britain, especially those of Lancashire, have combined to make industrial, commercial, technical and agricultural education almost a farce. The policy of the Government is to observe a so-called religious 'neutrality,' which is seen in the fostering care bestowed on missionary institutions and in the maintenance of an official Christian Church establishment out of Indian funds. Patriotism is everywhere discouraged, and sycophancy insisted on through innumerable devices. . . Since the Government of India remains indifferent to modern tendencies in education and their application to India, it behoves lovers of India to do all in their power to remedy the situation until a Home Rule Government does justice to the Indian child. . . Even the boy-scout movement was forbidden to Indian youths, until the action of a few Indians, headed by Mrs. Besant, by establishing the Indian Boy Scouts Association, forced the Government of Madras to start a rival movement lest our influence grow too pronounced, and perhaps, out of very shame! . . . India's system of examinations is disgraceful in its cruelty, and the Senate House, where many of the examinations take place, is popularly known as the slaughter-house. . . Again, the education of girls is for the most part in the hands of missionaries. Profound dissatisfaction exists with missionary methods and missionary objectives. In mission institutions, the girls are definitely denationalised. But, for want of organization, missionary influence has been allowed to dominate Indian education for over a century. . ."

The same paper contains a Tamil version of the above article.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 10th Feb. 1919.

Education in India.

27. In an article contrasting the condition of education in ancient India with that of the present day, contributed by a correspondent to the Vaisyamitran, of the 10th February, the following observations find place:—Till recently they were extracting the juice out of India and leaving only the refuse. Now they think that even this refuse contains some new materials and are consuming it also gradually. When one compares our greatness in all respects in ancient days with the injurious consequences of the western civilization, one cannot help feeling a sense of regret.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

Government Medical Schools.

28. The Hindu Nesan, of the 17th February, observes:—It appears that the Medical School at Calicut is to be transferred to Coimbatore. It is no doubt beneficial to have a Medical School at Coimbatore. But why should Calicut be deprived of a school on that score? An additional school at Coimbatore cannot be a superfluity for this Presidency which is big enough. Though there is a great demand at present for lady doctors, the number of women receiving instruction in medicine has gone down considerably. It is but natural that, under the present arrangement in which female students in medicine have to receive instruction from men and in the same school along with male students, their number should go down. It has been talked of for a long time that a school should be specially opened for female students with lady teachers in Madras. We do not know when this will be accomplished. We request that the Government will be pleased to start one ere long without grudging the expenditure involved.

29. Reviewing the report on Medical Colleges for 1917-18, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th February, writes with reference to the Medical School at Vizagapatam :—. . . The proposal of Rao Bahadur Chandrasekharam Mudaliyar that admission into the school may better be limited to the students reading in Intermediate classes, cannot but cause unnecessary difficulties to the Andhra students. We, therefore, request the Government not to accept it. . . The school is working satisfactorily and is attracting students; but it is losing much of its usefulness for want of sufficient accommodation. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Medical School at Vizagapatam.

30. In an article under this heading, the Kistnapatrika, of the 15th February, says in reply to a correspondent :—. . . . It may be asked if the Indian Christians should not step into Hindu schools. It is our determined opinion that they should not in the present circumstances . . So long as the Indian Christians turn their faces to the west and look upon the westerners alone as the fathers of their spiritual wisdom, they will not have any wisdom to contribute towards their own advancement or to their country or to the world, and they cannot have any place in Indian traditional nationality.

31. The Swadesamitran, in its issues of the 10th and 12th February, publishes in Tamil, in parts, the abstract of a lecture recently delivered by Mr. A. Rangaswami Ayyangar on this subject under the auspices of the Ryotwari Landholders' Association.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 10th & 12th Feb. 1919.

Land revenue problems in Southern India.

(j) Salt and Abkāri.

32. The Vartakamitran, of the 30th January, observes:—Though the existence of this evil is thought of in India, still attempts to crush it appear only in words and not in action, inasmuch as the British Empire has to be administered in view to England's progress. If innumerable casks of alcoholic drinks are manufactured in the big factories in England and Scotland, which country in the Empire is to buy the quantity in excess of the consumption by England? In regard to this matter colonies such as Canada and Australia are following America. So it is only India that should consume the surplus. Further, in India large revenue is derived from the manufacture and sale of such drinks and from the import of foreign spirits. While even during the time of peace, Indian revenues are not adequate to meet Indian expenditure, is it possible to forego this huge sum now? Certainly not, because the Government are intent more on the revenues than on the welfare of the people. If they only seek the health of the public, why should there be any delay in following the American States? These States are privileged to adopt any measures suitable to them, while we depend on the permission of the foreigners for doing so. This is the main cause for the delay.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 30th Jan. 1919.

The drink evil.

33. In an article on "Drunkenness and Government's income", the Manorama, of the 14th February, points out that the income from the liquor trade has been steadily increasing during the last seven years, and says :—Though the Government derive a large income from the Excise Department, the Government should try to completely prohibit the use of intoxicating liquor as it is harmful to the people. In America a Bill has already been passed prohibiting the use of liquor, and the loss to that Government resulting therefrom will certainly be considerable. The passing of such a measure in spite of the heavy loss to the Government must certainly be attributed to their desire for the welfare of the subjects. If the Government of India too should be pleased to pass a similar measure it will be hailed with joy by the people. But is India fortunate enough for that?

Indian Boy Scouts' Association.

34. Referring to an invitation sent by His Excellency Lord Pentland to the boy scouts in the several secondary schools in Madras to meet at the Government House on the 8th February 1919, a correspondent writes to the Swadesamitran, of the 12th idem, as follows:—While European scouts and certain other scout parties that are being trained under Mr. Baden Powell's method, had been invited, the Indian Boy Scouts' Association alone was not invited. Why was no invitation sent to this party that has trained more than about 200 scouts? The Government have thus offered insult to the very first scouts' association started in Madras (Adyar). There is no reason to think that the Indian Scouts' Association takes part in politics. We have to infer that this association was not invited merely because it is not one conducted under the patronage of Government.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Indian Boy Scout movement.

The Swadesamitran, of the 15th February, publishes a letter of Mr. K. Sanjivi Kamath about the advantages of this movement, which begins with the following observations:—A highly critical juncture is going to happen in India. Popular leaders are everywhere giving the warning that we should make suitable arrangements to enable us to come out of it successfully. It is only heroic and valiant persons that can be of any use at such times, and the scout movement will contribute greatly to producing such men.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1918.

A highhanded act.

35. Referring to an incident in Calcutta in which the Principal of a College is said to have thrown into the dust-bin an image of Goddess Saraswati belonging to the students, the Swadesamitran, of the 12th February, observes:—Many are under a fix without knowing what to do in regard to the strong political unrest and agitation existing in India. The indiscreet and unconstitutional way in which some Europeans and some Principals of Christian Colleges act and slight the feelings of the Indians is one of the main causes of such unrest and agitation.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the same incident, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th February, writes:—Some Europeans when they come out to India become insolent and haughty and begin to commit highhanded acts according to their sweet will and pleasure, thereby wounding the feelings of the Indians, wantonly. Such arrogant Europeans are generally to be found among the Christian Missionaries and merchants and among the bureaucrats. There is nobody to question or control them. But everybody expected that their evil propensities and iniquitous acts will wane away in course of time, but, as bad time would have it, we see that they are on the increase. The improper and highhanded act of the European Missionary at Calcutta will certainly be revolting to every Indian mind that happens to hear or read of it. Are not these wicked acts the cause of unrest and discontent in India?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Montagu-Chelmsford reforms.

36. Observing that, at the instigation of the moderates, some of the vakils in Madras have issued a manifesto discarding the resolution of the Delhi Congress, the Swadesamitran, of the 12th February, says:—The action of these vakils in taking this step, holding that the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms would be a definite initial step to responsible government, only indicates their contempt for the national assemblies. Further, it will be a matter for great astonishment even to Mr. Montagu that these should have ventured to state that the establishment of a duel government is only in keeping with the spirit of the pronouncement of the 20th August 1917 and that, without such a splitting, the introduction of a responsible form of self-government, step by step, as stated in that pronouncement will be impossible. Perhaps some of our leaders were deluded into the glamour of these reform proposals because of the hope that this duel government will afford a scope for some Indians to hold high offices as 'ministers'. But our Viceroy has by a sudden stroke awakened them to shake off this glamour. What are the benefits likely to result from the duel government? Will the ministers be responsible to the people, or will they at least have extensive powers? The statement made by the Viceroy the other day shows that these ministers will only be figure-heads without even the power of exacting work from the officials subordinate to them. They can only direct the head of a department subordinate to them to do a certain work, but the latter can obtain the permission of the Governor for not doing that work. Thus the ministers will find themselves in an awkward and helpless predicament. So it is only such persons as covet handsome salaries for conducting their household with ease, that will be glad to accept these posts.

37. The Desabhaktan, of the 12th February, publishes, from the pen of a lady correspondent, a communication in which the following observations occur among others:—It has become usual for everyone to be desponding within oneself from morning to evening about the severity of famine, disease and unjust laws. The time is near at hand when women too should feel the pinch. Probably this is the time for us to exhibit our heroism. It may be possible to put restraints on the acts of a person, but not on his soul-force or faith. Many countries which rendered help in the shape of men and money during the last four years are now getting the sweet fruit of swaraj, while India alone is being regarded as a wilderness infested with wild beasts, instead of a country peopled by civilised human beings. God only knows whether all this is justice and fairplay becoming the benign Britishers. In spite of our cries and remonstrances and of the aid rendered by us forgetting even our poverty, we are offered the option of accepting a fruit all rotten in the interior, with the stipulation that, as a preliminary to it, a small quantity of oil (Rowlatt Bills) will be poured on the fire kindled in us by the bureaucratic deities and that, if we escape from being burnt away, we can enjoy happiness. Alas! it passes the height of patience. The time to part with our greatness is perhaps near at hand. No use in desponding any longer. We should boldly seek measures to ward off unjust laws. We should realise that the present condition is but a dream and that our being the daughters of the heroic mothers in the land of Barata is a reality and induce the springing up of many Varadarajulus. The present sufferings are only caused by God to test whether we have the fitness to attain the beatitude of swaraj. So it becomes the foremost duty of every true woman born in India to become convinced that virtue will be victorious in the end and rouse her brethren.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The present situation.

38. The Desabhaktan, of the 12th February, observes:—Two points have not been referred to by the Viceroy in his lengthy speech at this meeting. One is about keeping Mesopotamia as a dependency of India and the other is about the levy of the Excess Profits duty. As regards the first, all the Indian Moslems were eagerly expecting that the Viceroy would relieve their anxiety in the matter. But their expectation was not fulfilled. As regards the second point, the Viceroy has not spoken a word. Perhaps it has been decided not to levy this tax in consideration of the hue and cry raised by the European commercial community. There is room to suspect that the Viceroy who has introduced the Rowlatt Bills against the wishes of the Indians, has given up the levy of the Excess Profits tax in compliance with the request of the European Chamber of Commerce.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

Commenting upon the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy the Hindu Nesan, of the 12th February, observes:—The tenor of this speech does not appear to be exhilarating to us. Is it fair for the Government to think of resorting to tyranny regardless of the loyalty and the noble ideals of the Indians? We deeply regret to see the Viceroy speaking as if the Indians cannot be set right by means of proper administration. His advocating the adoption of repressive measures in the present condition of India does not speak well of his sound statesmanship. Is it a natural law that peace cannot be secured except through tyranny? Has any civilized Government resorted to such a repressive measure?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

39. Dwelling at length on the propogandist work to be done by the Congress Committee in London, the Desabhaktan, of the 12th February, observes:—It is quite erroneous to think that the British democracy will now pay heed to our request even if our demand is legitimate. Judged from the present circumstances, it is as patent as anything that the British Government will not attend to us whether we entreat them or threaten them. The fact that the Prime Minister has secured a seat in the Parliament as a result of the exhilaration in England consequent on the defeat of the Central Powers in the war sufficiently indicates the trend of the times. At a time when England is immersed in joy at her victories, we should approach her with great caution and tact. Hereafter at least, responsible members of Parliament should endeavour to wipe out the reproach that "England is governing India by the strength of her arms". Is it fair that England should be talked of in this strain at a time the Peace Conference is held? England has secured enough of strength for governing India. It is only after recognizing that military strength and repressive laws are indispensable for the peace and safety of India, that the British Government have entrusted these with the Government of India. The bureaucrats as well as others not posted well in Indian matters, are misrepresenting facts to the British public about the condition of India and the latter believing all the untruths to be gospels, wrongly decide that it is not fit to grant liberty to India at present.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

Congress Committee in London.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

The meeting of the Provincial Legislative Council.

40. The Hindu Nesan, of the 13th February, observes:—The resolutions brought forward by the non-official members, however urgent and important they may be, are all opposed by the official members in a body and are lost. Acts and Regulations appear well enough on paper. It is stated that Indians are to be granted greater liberty and that their opinions are consulted in the administration of the country. But a closer inspection of the actual state of affairs discloses something unsatisfactory. The Honourable Members who represent the official party do not appear to endeavour to win their cause by means of argument. They silence the non-officials by saying that there is no need for the proposed amendment at present and that all that can possibly be done in the present circumstances is being done. The observations of the Director of Public Instruction at the meeting were very curious. He probably came to the Council with the resolve of giving one stereotyped reply to all the interpellations. What could he do? He came to hold that office only recently and has not had sufficient time to be well posted in the details of the Educational Department. The Government approved the suggestion to open a medical school in Bellary. But, though the deity was in favour of the suggestion, it did not find favour with the priest—the Surgeon General; and the suggestion fell through. Sir Alexander Cardew then said that, in course of time, a medical school would be opened at Bellary, by which it is clear that there are no obstacles or inconveniences to opening a school there. We wonder why it did not strike Sir Alexander that, if a school can be opened there some time hence, it can as well be opened even at present. In regard to the proposal to allot funds for providing boarding houses for the students among the depressed classes, the Director began to ask which class of people came under the term 'depressed classes'. He says that, to the best of his knowledge, this term has not been defined. But whose fault is it? It appears he has not glanced through the pages of the administration reports of the Educational Department of the previous years. His Excellency resorted to quite a different means to defeat this proposal, apparently because he recognized the inappropriateness of the Director's argument. The Honourable Members of the Council can only suggest that such and such a measure is necessary for the welfare of the people and that it is likely to entail an approximate expenditure of a certain amount. But it is not possible for them to study and explain to the Council all the working details of the scheme proposed by them. If all this work is to be done by the members of the Legislative Council themselves, we fail to see the need for having Government officials.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

Capitalists and labourers.

41. Adverting to the labour strike in different parts of the world at present, the Dravidan, of the 13th February, observes:—The condition of the labourers of our country, who have not the least facilities for receiving education, is indeed pitiable. Our patriots, capitalists and politicians, and the Government should relieve the unbearable misery of these labourers, who are suffering from hunger and ameliorate their condition by establishing schools to impart adequate industrial education to them on modern lines. It is only when this is done, our country can progress in industry and flourish like the western countries and the extreme poverty of the labourers can be removed.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 6th Feb. 1919.

The Indian aspirations and the Anglo-Indians.

42. Remarking that a consideration of the events transpiring in India at the present time when the whole world is being remodelled after the confusion caused by the European war, is likely to cause wonder and laughter to every one endowed with keen intellect and sound judgment, the Vartakamitran, of the 6th February, observes:—As the education that is imparted in this country is based on a foreign system, we, forgetting our past, speak of our forefathers as lacking wisdom and civilization and characterise all their ways as one-sided. As a result of western education our youths no longer consider themselves to be Indians. The westerners also do not regard them as men, and the people of this country have now come to realize this fact. The bureaucracy apprehend that their high position might be affected if the Indians, who were in stuper till now, should get awakened All the Indians, moderates or extremists, wish that England should govern India. It is only those that are hostile to India's progress that make vain attempts to oppose this truth. It is only the Anglo-Indians and those that have fallen into their snares that create dissension between the people and the Government. All that India seeks is economic progress, to be attained by being permitted to utilize her resources in her own industries without any foreign competition. This is revolting to the Anglo-Indian industrialists and bureaucrats. Further, according to the saying when people "ask for bread they are given a stone," it is not consistent with British administrative policy and British equity to enact a law threatening with imprisonment those that talk freely, especially when we demand that facilities should be afforded for the development of education, agriculture, industries and trade in this country. Both the Governments of India and England should note that the Anglo-Indians, out of an imaginary fear that their own interests will be affected by the grant of privileges to the Indians, interfere and influence the bureaucrats to act prejudicially to the interests of this country.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

The Reforms.

43. The Desabhaktan, of the 13th February, observes:—As time advances our ideals too are receding farther and farther away from us; and what we will attain at the end will be nothing but the shadow of liberty. The Anglo-Indian bureaucrats have very artfully succeeded in drawing to their side a few of the political agitators. The Anglo-Indians feel jealous of the proposal to reform the administration and to treat the people of this country with kindness. In their opinion the pronouncement of the 20th August is venomous in character. We are aware how they reviled publicly the Secretary of State, the Viceroy and some others. The bureaucrats were at first working from behind the screen, but subsequently realising that this method will not be successful have now come out openly to revolt. The Indian Civil Service officers unjustly hold that not a shred of liberty should be granted to the Indians. It behoves those authorities who are interested in the welfare of India and of the British Empire, to pay more attention to the Indian Civil Service movement than to the alleged anarchical movement in India. The Viceroy, forgetting the fact that he has promised along with the Secretary of State to grant responsible Government to India, has now given an assurance in the Legislative Council to help the bureaucrats and the Anglo-Indian merchants. It need not be pointed out that this help will surely be prejudicial to the welfare of India. It is regrettable that a responsible officer like the Viceroy should have acted in this manner as regards the Indian Civil Service rioters. He should have either treated their movement with contempt or reprimanded them for their meanness. We wonder what the nature of the responsible Government we are going to get, will be, if the Indian 'Ministers' have no power to control the officials subordinate to them. It appears the European merchants will be exempt from provincial taxes, but their representatives will have seats on the Provincial Legislative Councils. We have read in history that there can be no representation without taxation, but this maxim will probably be reversed at a time when we are to get responsible government. We have learnt by experience that an Anglo-Indian officer, however responsible a position he may be holding, is inclined to act against his own words. So it is but natural for the Viceroy to stand against India's welfare out of consideration for that of his creed. But true Indians cannot brook this. We should offer a united resistance to his attempt to subject us to the bureaucracy. We have to learn one thing from the Viceroy's speech, and that is, the Indian Civil Service officials can continue to disregard public opinion as before with impunity.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

Who are patriots?

44. The Desabhaktan, of the 13th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article in which the writer detailing the several advantages, which in his opinion will result from the formation of the samaj of patriots, makes the following observations among others :—Patriotic service in any country at any time is beset with difficulties. One engaged in such service should renounce all kith and kin, and boldly preach against the commonly accepted views. The difficulties in the way of a patriot's work in India which is under a foreign yoke are indescribable. This service is never easy in the commencement anywhere.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

His Majesty's speech in Parliament.

45. The Dravidan, of the 14th February, reproduces in Tamil almost the same sentiments as the Justice, of the 13th idem, appreciating the speech of His Majesty the King-Emperor.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

Expressing its satisfaction at this speech the Desabhaktan, of the 14th February observes:—His Majesty speaks in support of the constitution of the League of Nations. There is no doubt that this will conduce to beneficent results in the world. Our view is that only after dealing swaraj to all the countries in the world that do not now enjoy it, the League should be formed. As long as one nation lords over another, it is certain that the League cannot succeed in realizing its objects? Many cruel wars like the recent European war will have to be waged often. We trust that the British people who acquiesce with President Wilson in his views in the matter of the formation of the League of Nations will be intent on granting swaraj to India which has been under their sway for the last 150 years.

Referring to His Majesty's observation that the Indian Reform Bill will be brought before the Parliament during its present session, the same paper observes:—Though this message is pleasing to the Indians, still their grief is overwhelming. Is it likely that His Majesty is ignorant of the fact that in India repressive Bills, that are murderous in effect, are about to be passed into law? Or is he keeping silent being aware of it? In former times it was usual for His Majesty to ascertain and rectify the wrongs done by the Viceroy in India, whereas at present there is none to question the acts of the Viceroy or to correct him.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

The European Association, Calcutta.

46. Referring to the statement of this association that the Rowlatt Bills when passed into law will not cause any harm to the people, the Swadesamitran, of the 14th February, observes:—Perhaps Europeans say so with the confidence that the introduction of any kind of laws and regulations will not affect them in any way. For slightest mistakes or no mistakes at all, hundreds of Indian newspapers and presses have become the victims of the Press Act. But the authorities have stated that the Press Act could not be applied against an Anglo-Indian paper, which insulted the religious feelings of our Muhammadan brethern and thereby occasioned a great disturbance resulting in loss of lives. How would an Indian newspaper have fared in that plight? At this time when many urge the importance of devising means for the Europeans and Indians living in friendly relations with each other, the Europeans are raising their voice against the unanimous opinion of the Indian public. They raised a cry against the pronouncement of August 1917, and are forming a compact to oppose the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. It is not known how these Europeans who thus act and speak quite in opposition to the Indians can maintain friendly relations with the Indians.

47. In dwelling at length upon this subject, the Hindu Nesan, of the 14th February, makes the following suggestions in view to the stability of the Indian sugar trade in this country:—At least for a few companies to be started in the beginning, the Government should render financial assistance. The Government should lease out for nominal rent, to the companies dealing in sugar, the land required by them. They should, besides permitting free irrigation from tanks and channels, issue orders to have the newly opened companies supervised by Agricultural officers.

Sugar industry in India.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

48. The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 15th February, publish at length in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held in Madras on the 14th idem under the presidency of Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao, to protest against the memorandum said to have been prepared by the members of the Indian Civil Service with reference to the reform scheme, and the speech of the Viceroy in connexion therewith, while the Hindu Nesan, of the 15th idem publishes in Tamil only a summary of the speech of the President.

The Indian Civil Service Association.

SWADESAMITRAN & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

Remarking that the powers and privileges enjoyed by the Indian Civil Service officers in India are unlimited and that by their wily acts in some of the provinces they should be deemed to be acting against the Government, the Swadesamitran, of the 15th February, comments as follows:—It is this very Viceroy, who, a few months ago, was a party to the drafting of the reform proposals. In that report he has stated that the present system of administration is not suited to the times and that the aspirations of the Indians should be fulfilled. He now contradicts himself when he encourages the civilians. Mr. V. P. Mathava Rao, an ex-Diwan of three Native States, pointed out that in Japan when the Samarai class, who conducted the executive administration, wanted to improve the country, they surrendered, as a first step, all their powers to the people. But the Samarai there were also Japanese, which is not the case here. The party conducting the administration belong to one class, whereas the people belong to a different class here; so it is not natural for the ruling class to give up their powers for bettering the condition of the country. But the Government who should not make any distinction between the Indians and the members of their own nationality are bound to force them to renounce their powers into the hands of the Indians. In view of this, the Viceroy should have chastised the Civil Service party at the recent meeting of the Council. Without doing so, his coming forward to promise their protection creates apprehension among the Indians. The meeting only voiced forth the country's opinion so far as the resolution referred to the protest against the civil servants' movement. We can infer from the Viceroy's speech that the civilians will make the reforms ineffective. So their privileges should be wrested away and recruitment of officers needed for India should be made in India itself. We have no objection to the Europeans holding office like the Indians. Such a reform is bound to come at a time, for which we should agitate from now. If the influence of the civilians is wrested away, the other Europeans who are ever depending on their support, will be powerless to do anything prejudicial to us.

49. In an article contributed by a correspondent to the Desabhaktan, of the 15th February, the following find place:—There is the custom obtaining in India from a very long time to adore the great officials. The people have not recognised that all officials from the Viceroy down to the talaiyari are the servants of the public. In India a man becomes arrogant the moment he becomes a public servant, irrespective of the pay of his appointment. In the rural tracts there are restrictions binding on the washerman and the barber to do gratuitous service to the officials and on the villagers to provide a free supply of fowls and vegetables to them. The stronger the talk about Home Rule, the nearer is the doom for the excesses of the authorities.

The authorities in India.

building societies, the Desabhaktan, of the 15th February, observes:—To the best of our knowledge there are only four building societies in the Madras Presidency, though it is about 15 years since the Co-operative Credit Department was established here. This is highly regrettable. The Government of Madras do not pay any heed to this matter. Most of the societies in this Presidency are only credit societies and there are not many agricultural, industrial or other societies. Even the small number of the existing societies are not working properly. We can definitely assert that the work of the Co-operative Credit Department in this Presidency from 1910 to 1917 is not quite satisfactory. We trust that hereafter at least the Government of Madras will establish many societies other than credit societies and make arrangements for the people getting sufficient facilities therefrom.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 10th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

51. The Vaisyamitran, of the 10th February, observes:—All that takes place in the Legislative Council is in accordance with the wishes of the officials. The term 'non-official members' is only a misnomer. They are powerless to join together and get a resolution of theirs passed in the Council. If they appear to say anything in the interests of the public, they will at once meet with an opposition that what they say is wrong. Until the number of representative members is increased and Indian affairs continue to be under the supervision of foreigners, there is no good of finding fault with them.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The Legislative Councils.

Remarking that the Rowlatt Bills and the Madras City Municipal Bill are being rushed through in the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils respectively in spite of the protests of the public and contrary to the views of the representative members, the Lokopakari, of the 17th February, observes:—These show that the existence of the Legislative Councils and of representative members on these Councils is quite unnecessary. The Government may as well enact laws as they like and the large expenditure incurred on account of these Legislative Councils may be avoided! It is indeed strange that the authorities in India have come forward to pass a law quite against the unanimous opinion of the public in India which is subject to the British Empire that is intent on granting the right of self-determination to every community in the world.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

Referring to the last session of the Madras Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th February, remarks:—. . . There are no facts which deserve special notice in connexion with the last session of the Council. Though the Budget discussion took place in February instead of in March, the proposals made by the elected members have, as usual, been rejected. . . The prevention of diseases among plants and trees is, no doubt, recognized as urgent and beneficial, but the authorities have been entrusted with arbitrary powers. . . Even Doctor Nayar had to admit that the Municipal Bill cannot be conducive to the growth of the local self-government. As has been already pointed out by us, local self-government may show signs of decline instead of development under the new Bill which cannot satisfy any of the citizens. As Doctor Nayar has remarked, when new Legislative Councils are formed, it will be necessary for the elected members to pass another Bill which will promote the progress of local self-government.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 9th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

With reference to the proceedings of the last Madras Legislative Council, the Hitakarini, of the 9th February, observes:—. . . The rejection of the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapati Raju for the curtailment of expenditure on the Police Department by 10 lakhs and for the utilization of that sum for the improvement of education causes the greatest regret. The reason for such a heavy expenditure on that department is the unique kindness of the Government which it enjoys. Be it as it may, the resolution has been rejected like the many above. . . Sir Alexander Cardew said that the drinking of country spirits and toddy showed a decrease on account of the high taxes imposed on them. Every one has powers of argument. And in addition thereto, Sir Alexander Cardew has got the power of his office and the support of the Government. His word is gospel. As the official members are the subordinates of His Excellency the Governor and President, their argument is acceptable to him. . . The Government will do well to accept the suggestions of the elected members on the drink question as there is difference of opinion on it between the rulers and the ruled. . .

The Legislative Council, Madras.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 7th February, referring to the discussion on the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Yaqub Hasan that the sum of fifteen thousand rupees that have been sanctioned for the Madras Muhammadan College may not be utilized for a new college but may be given to the Vāniyambādi Muhammadan Educational Society in the shape of a grant-in-aid, writes:—The Hon'ble Muhammad Aziz-ud-din Husain Sahib spoke against the resolution, and the resolution was lost.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 7th Feb. 1919.

The Hosur Taluk Villagers' Conference.

52. The Desabhaktan, in its issues of the 11th and 14th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the proceedings of this Conference held in a village in Hosur taluk on the 8th idem, in which many resolutions are reported to have been passed, some of these being to the effect that the Conference endorses the views of the Indian National Congress in all political matters, that the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals should be modified to suit the requirements of the country and given effect to without any delay and that the Rowlatt Bills, which, in the opinion of the Conference, are capable of doing great harm to the Indians, should not be passed into law.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th & 14th Feb. 1919.

A 'Londoner' and Mr. Montagu.

53. The Dravidan, of the 14th February, reproduces in Tamil some of the sentiments expressed by a 'Londoner' in his letter to the Englishman on his impressions of Indian politics, commenting adversely on the fitness of Mr. Montagu to hold a high office in the State. Extracts from this letter are published in Justice of the 12th idem.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

The Viceroy's speech.

54. Reproducing a statement of Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao to the effect that "no Government can last long which has no moral force to sustain it," the Desabhaktan, of the 15th February, comments as follows:—We entreat Lord Chelmsford to note this statement. The Rowlatt Bills and the Indian Civil Service movement are the two things that are causing much anxiety to the Indians. In spite of the statement of Mr. Montagu, Lord Chelmsford and Sir William Vincent that the Indian Civil Service officials would give a hearty support to the reform proposals, these officials act quite in opposition to them and cause trouble to all It is highly regrettable that Lord Chelmsford without condemning the action of the Indian Civil Service officials for their unconstitutional agitation has come forward to espouse their cause. It, however, pleases us in a way that he, without joining with them in their cry, preferred to console them. The Viceroy expressed his sympathies with the Anglo-Indian merchants as well. In this he has proved the truth of the adage that the "birds of a feather flock together." It is regrettable that His Excellency has failed to recognise the truth that, even as he wishes for the welfare of his own creed the Indian representatives seek the welfare of the Indians. What we should do hereafter is to start a huge agitation which should check the evil deeds of the Indian Civil Service party. Therefore O Indian brethren! Arise! arise! The darkness of the war has gone and the sun of liberty is rising. The clouds of the Rowlatt Bills and the Indian Civil Service movement prevent the rays of that sun from falling on India. These clouds should be dispelled promptly. So, brethren, you had enough of sleep. Awake. The heroic drum is sounding. Mother Bharata is summoning you.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

55. Remarking that, at the last meeting of the Madras Legislative Council, no attention seems to have been paid to the present dearth of foodstuffs, the Desabhaktan, of the 17th February, observes:—The food situation in this Presidency is growing worse day by day. The prices have been rapidly rising for the last one month, without the slightest hope of any reduction therein. The cruel symtoms of famine are more marked even at the beginning of this year than last year. When the whole presidency is being afflicted by famine, should not the Government adopt some relief measures? Is it fair for them to keep quiet resigning themselves to the philosophical position that "what will happen is bound to happen"? Sound statesmanship consists only in taking precautions against danger. When the food situation is creating grave anxiety even at the present time of harvest, how pitiable will be the condition of the people in June and July next? Till now there was a hope of getting rice from Burma, but that too was blighted by the intimation recently received that there also the outturn was not quite satisfactory. We do not know whether this attracted the attention of the Government. Sir Alexander Cardew, while opposing the motion in the last meeting of the Council to abolish the post of the Director of Civil Supplies, remarked that the present food situation in this Presidency caused anxiety and that he could not say what this situation would be a few months hence. Does not this statement show that the Government of Madras are acting without forethought? Should we point out that it is regrettable that Sir Alexander Cardew, a responsible officer who can influence the administrative policy of the Government of Madras in the way he likes, and who boasts that the members of the Indian Civil Service, himself included, have come out to India to protect the poor people of India and to watch their interests, should have spoken in this irresponsible and childish manner without forethought.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

Referring to the increase in the prices of food-stuffs, the Lokopakari, of the 17th February, observes:—Though it is three months since the war ended, still no facilities for shipping and railway transports have been afforded and the hardships of the people are on the increase. It is the duty of the Government to relieve such distress. But it is said that the Government are indifferent and that consequently the merchants are raising the prices as they like. It is possible to check the excesses of the merchants only if the prices are regulated by the Government. In spite of the great hardships experienced by the people on account of the high prices and the scarcity of foodstuffs at present, the authorities refuse to recognize the existence of famine. This only makes us think that they are ignorant of the true condition of the country and its people. It is but natural that persons drawing salaries by thousands are unaware of the famine conditions.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

In a lengthy article on this subject dealing with the high prices of food stuffs and the scarcity of kerosine oil, the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th February, echoes almost the same sentiments as the Desabhaktan of the same date and observes:—The stress on account of high prices is spread all over the Presidency. This is the best time to see to the proper distribution of the stock of articles on hand among the various places and take necessary precautions to guard against the increase of hardship later on. Sir Alexander Cardew says that it is hard to get steamers for transporting rice bags from Burma and that the chief cause for the increase of prices is the want of shipping facilities. He seems to be unaware of any other causes for the present situation. We should secure sufficient shipping for our province besides a reduction in the rates of frieght. Though it is necessary to transport war materials, is it not equally necessary to provide ships for averting the hardships of the poor people immersed in misery without livelihood? Let the Government realise this need at least now and immediately adopt the necessary measures with sufficient forethought.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

Mr. Tilak.

56. Extolling the virtues of Mr. Tilak and remarking that, if the Rowlatt Bills are passed into law, the Police officials may begin to suspect and harass those that make obeisance to him, the Desabhaktan, of the 17th February, observes:—At present thousands of patriots who revere and love Mr. Tilak and follow his advice shine as Tilaks, and this creates a fear in the minds of the bureaucrats. Until the bureaucrats begin to administer British justice they will be suspecting the patriots and will be in constant dread of their actions. It is not explicable why the British justice sought after by the patriots appears to be sedition to the bureaucrats. It is worth considering why the cobra is in hiding. Those that forget Mr. Tilak out of fear for the bureaucrats will be guilty of the heinous sin of ingratitude. Mr. Tilak is no ordinary man. There is no theist who does not realise that Mr. Tilak is an incarnation specially sent by God to establish the liberty of British rule getting rid of the bureaucratic system of administration which is afflicting India in several ways. Such a great person has, by sacrificing his body, soul and wealth for our sake and entering the prison house, not once but thrice, been intent on safeguarding our birthright. No true patriot will forget sage Tilak in spite of the most barbarous law which may prohibit anybody revering Mr. Tilak openly. The followers of Mr. Tilak should swell in numbers as soon as the Rowlatt Bills are passed. The day on which these Bills become law should be celebrated as the Tilak day with all grandeur. . . The Rowlatt Bills have appeared only to establish that Mr. Tilak is of divine birth.

57. The Swadesamitran, of the 17th February, publishes in Tamil, as reported by a correspondent, the resolutions passed at a public meeting held in Negapatam on the 12th idem protesting against the passing of the Rowlatt Bills and the attitude of the members of the Indian Civil Service with reference to the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

58. Giving a list of the members of this committee, the Desabhaktan, of the 18th February, observes that it need not be mentioned what advantage India would derive from the inquiries of this committee, as it is evident from a perusal of the names of the members.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

59. Adverting to a suggestion of the Times that a committee should be appointed in England for ascertaining true Indian views and characterising the same as narrow-minded, the Desabhaktan, of the 18th February, asks what became of the inquiries hitherto made, and remarks that it has become the business of the Anglo-Indian papers to suggest frequently the appointment of committees and commissions at enormous expense of India's money but with no benefit.

A suggestion of the London Times.

60. The Desabhaktan, of the 18th February, publishes a cartoon, in which Mr. Montagu and Lord Sinha are represented as making efforts to break the shackles of Mother India, while the bureaucrats knowing this put on new fetters to her hands and feet in the shape of Rowlatt Bills.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

61. Referring to the recent proscription of the lecture of Doctor Ansari, the Swadesamitran, of the 18th February, observes:—If as viewed by the authorities the lecture is really objectionable, why should they not take steps through a court of law and get the matter decided, as people will then have great confidence in that decision besides the defendant being in a position to argue his defence well. That this direct path should be given up and action should be taken by the executive is indeed objectionable. No lectures delivered in national assemblies have hitherto received this treatment.

The Press Act.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

62. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 5th October, gives vent to his repentance for having attended the Bombay Special Congress, as it had cost him the respect shown him by his district authorities and won for him the 'attentions of the Police' and 'a place in the sacred records of the Criminal Investigation Department'. To make amends, he proposes to join the moderates who, he says, are in the good books of the Government, but fearing that the Government may only find in them extremists in disguise, finally makes up his mind to become a member of the "South Indian Liberal Association, so well-known for its loyalty and for the favour it enjoys at the hands of the Government."

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 28th Dec. 1918.

A short resumé of the history of Indian Commerce.

64. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 28th December, writes:— . . . Owing to the invention of machine power, the demand for our articles in England not only fell down enormously but the arts and industries in our own country also began to decline, owing to unequal competition. . . From that time, the Directors of the East India Company prohibited the employment of Indian lascars in ships on the ground that they were unfit for voyages to distant countries with a cold climate. Since they were all powerful they could pass such an order. Though they could not help us, they would have done us considerable good, if they had not stood in our way. . . In consequence of the above order of the Directors, our articles ceased to go to England on our ships. . . When railways were laid in the time of Lord Dalhousie, they brought iron and iron materials from England instead of working out the iron mines in our country and producing the articles required here only. They are pursuing the same policy even now. They have thus lost a fitting opportunity to revive this industry.

In this way, we have not been able to get an opportunity to re-learn the arts once known to us. We had to forget those we had known already, and all have turned to agriculture. . . Our extensive export of raw-products and the non-employment of our craftsmen soon robbed our country of her life and made her a prey to frequent famines . . The value of our imports in 1913–14 amounted to Rs 1,91,74,79,570. It will be difficult for our country to make any progress, unless the Government protect our agricultural and other industries. The advocates of free-trade in England have been obliged to prefer protection on account of the war. In our country, the duties on Lancashire cloth have been increased 4 per cent during the war. A precedent has thus been laid for the adoption of protection in preference to free-trade in our country. . . And how can the Government, having fought out the war for the sake of justice, raise their head before foreign nations, if they do us injustice? Do they not know that justice makes no distinction between black and white races? . . . The Government should encourage our merchants to invest their capital in industrial concerns, by undertaking some industries themselves and thus setting an example to be followed by others. . . They who take such pains for the spread of education, should soon establish commercial colleges and introduce other reforms, thus laying the foundation for the future prosperity of our country.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 4th Jan. 1919.

The National Congress.

65. With reference to the last Delhi Congress, the Andhravani, of the 4th January, remarks:—We are extremely glad to note that the last congress which met at a very critical juncture has discharged its duty in a worthy manner by fearlessly expressing the opinion of the people. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 4th Jan. 1919.

The coming visit of His Excellency the Governor.

66. Referring to the coming visit of His Excellency the Governor to Ganjām, the Andhravani, of the 4th January, observes:— . . . We request His Excellency not to rake up the question of dividing the Ganjām district hastily at this time, since there is much difference of opinion on it and since it is not possible to give equal opportunities to the both sides to press their respective arguments at such short notice.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 11th Jan. 1919.

Self-respect.

67. In the course of some verses under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 11th January, observes:— . . . Has the West forgotten the greatness of our India, which has given birth to such eminent men? Alas! how can moon-light be great to the eyes of a cat? Let our rulers treat us without love, though they belong to our government and live in our country; let them eating our salt and wearing our cloths fail to win our love; let them drinking our water and breathing our air neglect our progress; let them, who have no other refuge than our mother's grace, turn a deaf ear to our cries; let our rulers take no thought of us in the infatuation of power. It is enough if the fair name of our mother India, respected all over the world, continues to shine untarnished. We shall be satisfied with that much !

68. Advocating national education, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 11th January writes under this heading :— . . . Our defective education seems to be the chief cause for the failure of all our public movements. . . The agitation that has been started in the country for the spread of national education is enough to show that the present system is not suited to our national temperament and that it is doing us more harm than good. Srimati Sarojini Devi also wrote to the effect. . . "The system of education introduced in India by England is not only unsuited to our national genius, but also opposed to it. . . It has kept three generations of young Indians in a state of blind intellectual serfdom, and sold them away to Westerners." Mr. Gandhi observed :—"Our faith in the necessity for learning the English language has made as slaves. We, the English-educated, have stood aloof from the masses. A wide gulf separates us from them. The best heart of the nation has been imprisoned in a cage. . . This is a national tragedy unprecedented in history". . . It is a good sign that our countrymen have realized the importance of national education now at least. All our movements have been doomed to be short-lived for want of national education which, it should, therefore, be our endeavour, to spread broad-cast so that our efforts at national regeneration may be crowned with success.

The problem of education.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 11th Jan. 1919.

69. Referring to the appointment of Sir S. P. Sinha as the Under Secretary of State for India and other current topics, the Andhravani, of the 18th January, writes under this heading :—. . . Though we do not share the political views of Sir S. P. Sinha, we can boldly say that he will hold his new office with ability. Though he is a moderate, there is no doubt that he is a man with very liberal views. Elated by the titles with which he has been decorated by the rulers, he has never betrayed the popular cause. The views he gave expression to, while in England in connexion with the Imperial War Conference, are in proof of this statement. . .

The situation.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampore, 18th Jan. 1919.

70. Referring to the conviction of Mr. Varadarajulu Nayudu, the Andhravani, of the 18th January, says under this heading :— . . . It is highly regrettable that repressive legislation and the punishment of Nationalists should show no signs of abatement, though the war has come to an end. Mr. Darsi Chenchayya, born as he was in the Andhra country which is such an utter stranger to all political crime, is still undergoing his internment, and Mr. Varadarajulu Nayudu is on his way to the jail. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampore, 18th Jan. 1919.

71. Referring to the Indian Civil Servants and their recent memorandum, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 18th January, writes under this heading :—. . . We believe that it is the English officials who have always been the open enemies to our national progress. Whenever a high-minded ruler granted us reforms, they have invariably created untoward obstacles to them as if they bear a grudge to us and want to pay it off. We know the fate of the reforms granted by Lord Morley who may be called the Bhishma of the British Empire. We know that it is the Indian Civil Servants who say that they have a birth-right to rule over us and who have, by all sorts of obstructions, tried to prevent Indians coming to responsible positions in the service of State. . . The memorandum which they have recently published in violation of the conditions of service will only show how self-interested they are, and how, receiving such fat salaries as are not known anywhere else in the world, they bear a grudge to us and want to keep us down. . . They cannot tolerate the idea of being told about their duties by Indians whom they have till now treated with scant courtesy. Racial pride is the only reason for this. . . They want to intimidate the Government by asking for facilities to resign their service, whenever they feel their official prestige compromised. I believe that the Government will comply with their request. The sooner they resign their offices, the better will it be, it is needless to say, for our national prestige. No one that looks down upon Indians need stay in this country. . .

Our open enemies.

The Moderates.

72. Referring to the recent Moderate Manifesto issued by Mr. S. N. Bannerjea and others, the Andhravani, of the 25th January, observes in its leader under this heading:—

. . . On careful consideration, the moderation of these men seems to be bereft of thoughtfulness or foresight. It is also doubtful if they have properly understood the present situation at least. They have been abusing from the very outset the congressmen as extremists bent upon wrecking the 'Montford' Scheme. Apart from this, they do not seem to have taken any trouble to oppose those local Governments or the Indian Civil Servants that are opposed to the very idea of reforms, trying to defeat Indian aspirations in every way by creating disunion among the sons of the soil. . . No patriot can approve of the conduct of these moderates.

The Government are going to introduce in the next session of the Imperial Legislative Council for discussion new repressive measures based on the recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission, which resemble the Defence of India Act. Knowing how the Defence of India Act introduced chiefly as a war-measure for taking action against anarchy has been unjustly and illegally employed against nationalists carrying on constitutional political agitation during the last two years, that they should not express even a word of disapproval, in their manifesto, against the proposed Bills, shows the nature of their moderation. It is clear that this is the spirit of 'To Hukum' to please the authorities rather than any moderate policy based on real political insight. . . Their policy that we should be content with what has been given and should not ask for more, may be appropriate in the case of mendicants. It is highly regrettable that they cannot understand the simple fact that the nationalist demands freedom as his birth-right and does not beg it as a matter of charity.

The Delhi Congress had laid down the line of action to be followed by the country. The members of the deputation which will soon leave for England on its behalf will boldly represent the wishes of their country men to the British public. It is well and good if the latter listen to those representations and grant our wishes. If not, it is equally good.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampore, 25th Jan. 1919.

News.

73. Referring to the recent visit of His Excellency Lord Pentland to the Ganjām district, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 25th January. writes under this heading:—

. . . The respect shown to the Andhras in the Darbar is unbounded for sooth! From the way in which distinction was made in sending invitations, there seems to be no doubt, though we cannot say it for certain, that His Excellency came specially for the Uriyas. The Raja of Parlākimedi may send invitations, only to those whom he likes. But when the Collector issues invitations on behalf of the Government, it is not understood why some should be invited and others not, . . . Another point. While opportunity was given to the Uriyas to present addresses, why were the Andhras denied it? It was said that the Governor's arrival would be private. How could the Uriyas know it then? . . .

The Madras University Students' Club: a Brahman manager.

74. Taking objection to the advertisement for a Brahman manager on Rs. 75 for the newly formed University Students' club, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 12th February, requests His Excellency the Governor, who is the founder of the club, to interfere in the matter and see that there will be no occasion, at least in future, for such distinctions.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

The speech of Emperor George.

75. Commenting on the speech of His Majesty George V, while opening the new Parliament, the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th February, writes:—. . . There is no doubt that the speech of the Emperor is full of liberal sentiments. . . Our readers can readily understand what difference there is between the attitude of the bureaucracy in India and that of His Majesty. . . The following lines from the Emperor's speech show his liberal view of the labour situation in England. . . A comparison of that picture in England with ours in India will reveal the contrast between the two. Like Labour men, Indians also have rendered commendable service in the war; and unlike them, they have not created any unrest after the war. But what is the result? No repressive measures whatsoever have been introduced in England. They are using gentle means to put down the Labour unrest there. Though peace is spreading in India, coercive measures are going to be introduced here. Such a contrast cannot but appear strange. . . The authorities in Britain are requested to pay heed to the representations of Indians and see that unrest does not grow in India.

76. Regarding the reform of the India Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th February, remarks:—There is no good of reforming this Council. It had better be fully abolished. This is the firm opinion of the people of India. A Committee under the presidentship of Lord Crewe has been appointed to enquire into the working of the Council. . . It is the duty of Indians to pass resolutions immediately urging the complete abolition of the India Council and the introduction of responsibility in the Government of India. There cannot be the least good of making small reforms.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

The reform of the India Council.

77. In its leader under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 14th February, observes:—. . . The present delay of the Germans in fulfilling the armistice conditions is causing misgivings to the French who are suspecting them of some bad motive, perhaps not without reason, as they are not demobilising their forces so briskly as the Allies. . . It appears that the Allies will do well to be on their guard.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

Peace preparations.

Will there be an end of war and strife after the conclusion of peace? If this object is not achieved, the great sacrifices made by the nations of the world would really be all in vain. . . M. Leon Bourgeois has moved an amendment at the Peace Conference to station some military force in France. . . It is strange that America should increase her navy, when it is expected that every country in the world will reduce its army and navy after the conclusion of peace. . . If Sir John Jellicoe's suggestions be accepted, Britain also will have to increase her navy. If every nation tries to increase its forces thus, there will soon be an occasion for disputes. . . From the information given by the Washington correspondent, it appears that Japan has threatened to declare war on China, should China reveal the secret treaty she had concluded with Japan. The attitude of Japan is causing anxiety to the Allies. . . It remains to be seen how the Japan-China question will be solved. The Russian problem has not yet been solved. . . From this, it appears that taming the Bolsheviks is no easy matter. . . Internal affairs like the labour question, the Irish situation and the Indian problem await a satisfactory solution soon after the conclusion of peace. There is no need to be disheartened by the many difficulties now present before us. Success is sure and certain, when all civilised countries are seriously thinking together over the reconstruction of the world. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

Bezwada Taluk Ryots' Conference.

79. The Andhrapatrika, of the 14th February, writes under this heading:—The speech of the Viceroy has added to the anxiety created by the memorandum of the Civil Servants. Local self-government has been under their control, ever since it was started; but it has shown no progress. If self-government be placed in their hands, while it grows, it cannot thrive. This is the principal objection against the scheme of Mr. Montagu. If the responsibility is placed in the hands of the people, success and failure are equally beneficial. People correct their blunders by experience. It cannot be expected that the Reform Scheme will meet with success in the hands of the officers of the Civil Service who complain that their prestige goes down as popular power rises. The memorandum of the members of the Civil Service will dispel any doubt that may linger about this point. His Excellency the Viceroy has, instead of admonishing them that it is not proper on their part to obstruct the progress of the people, has only encouraged them. It will appear from the Viceroy's speech that the civilian officers will not properly carry out the orders of the ministers. This speech confirms the misgiving that the scheme does not advance popular power. The duty of people becomes clear. On the one hand, the reforms appear to be inefficacious. On the other, repressive laws are being enacted. People have to fight against both these evils. They have to rely on their self-effort and must be every now and then giving a clear expression to their firm determination. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The speech of Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao.

80. Commenting on the speech of Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao, C.I.E., who presided over the public meeting held in the Gokhale Hall on the 14th instant to protest against the Indian Civil Service memorandum, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th February, observes:—The speech which Mr. Madhava Rao delivered last evening about the Indian Civil Service memorandum decisively voiced forth the popular opinion. He has said: "In case the authority of the Indian Civil Servant is to continue in future, we had better inform the Parliament that no reforms are needed". . . He asks what necessity there is for the Viceroy to give assurances to the Indian Civil Service officials, and thinks that he has not adopted a proper course. The minds of Indians which were already agitated by the Indian Civil Service memorandum have been still further agitated by the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy. The Indian Civil Servants will have to work hereafter as servants of the country and not as its masters. The attempts of the Indian Civil Service officials will have the effect, Mr. Madhava Rao remarked, of frustrating the announcement of the 20th August. As has been pointed out by Mr. Wadia, the Viceroy's speech is opposed to the Montagu scheme. If the authorities in England do not give a suitable assurance, the disappointment that will prevail among the people will be simply unbounded.

Lord Willingdon and officials.

83. Commenting on the speech of Lord Willingdon about the work of the Servants of India Society under the auspices of the East India Association in London, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th February, writes under this heading:—. . . He said that the authorities would be able to do even more good to the people, if they give up unnecessary suspicions about the actions of those authorities. . . Is it the people or the authorities that show this distrust? Lord Willingdon said it was the people. If so, whose distrust is responsible for the introduction of the Rowlatt Bills? Whose distrust is responsible for the passing of such repressive Acts as the Press Act? If the authorities give up their distrust towards the people, the people also will show their strong confidence in them. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The Imperial Press Conference.

84. With reference to the next Imperial Press Conference which will meet in Canada, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th February, remarks:—. . . In no other part of the Empire, the Press is fettered with so many bonds as it is in India. The orders of the authorities passed under the Press Act cannot be questioned even in courts of law. Nowhere else are papers conducted on more fair and sober lines than in India. A perusal of the writings in such English papers as the Nation will make this contrast clear. Our papers are unable to express the opinions of the people fearlessly on account of the restrictions placed on them. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The policy of Imperial Preference.

85. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th February, writes:—. . . It is clear that the Coalition Government is openly favouring this policy. It behoves the people of India to declare at once that this policy causes loss to their country.

86. With reference to the reported increment in the salaries of British Medical officers by 30 per cent of their present salaries on account of famine, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th February, says:—. . . It will be proper if the Government spend enough money to conduct the Medical Service Examination in this country alone, to utilise the services of the people in the country on an extensive scale to encourage the Unani and the Ayurvedic physicians and to afford greater protection to the public. But it is disappointing to note that they, on the other hand, increase the salaries of British officers which are already high. The people cannot but ask in wonder whether these are the results of the Public Services Commission.

The British Medical officers.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

87. The Andhrapatrika, of the 17th February, gives in Telugu an extract from the India dealing with demands of the Delhi Congress for immediate complete Provincial autonomy, for full responsible government within fifteen years and for non-official representation at the Peace Conference, which contains:—. . . These resolutions show that the Anglo-Indian bureaucrats have forfeited the confidence of the majority of the thinking men in India. They have been committing many blunders, displaying a narrow spirit, and oppressing the people. Indian statesmen urge, therefore, that the government of their country should no longer be in their hands and that a government responsible to the people should be established as early as possible to suit the present conditions. . . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

88. Referring to an article contributed by a correspondent to New India, giving an account of the visit paid to the Philippines by Sir William Meyer, former Finance Minister of India, the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th February, says:—Though the speech of Sir William Meyer at Manila gives expression only to the ordinary views of the authorities, the utterances of the editor, the Philippine Review, on that occasion are characterized by a liberal spirit. The editor gave Sir William Meyer very good advice. He distinctly stated that the only means to develop commerce in the eastern countries was to give independence to dependent countries. He said that in order that commerce may be carried on between the eastern and western continents, both of them should occupy an equal position and one should not depend on and be an object of enjoyment to the other. The narrow and antiquated views of Sir William Meyer would not have pleased the Philippine leaders. The editor of the Philippine Review has, in his speech, clearly explained to Sir William Meyer what he ought to do. We trust that Sir William Meyer will, after a short stay in the Philippines, change his views and recognize that it is supremely necessary for the advancement of India that the aspirations of the Indians are fulfilled. If, in future, he does not waste his time in ridiculing the nationalists but helps to advance their interests, he will be doing the greatest good to the British Empire.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

89. The Andhrapatrika, of the 18th February, says:—The London Times is of opinion that it is not desirable that deputations from the Congress, the Home Rule League and the Moderates' conference should go to England. The Times and other papers are trying to see that the Indian view of political questions is not placed before the English people in England. It is not well that these attempts should be allowed to be made now when there is no war going on. Messrs. Tilak and Baptista have stated that the English people are prepared to give satisfactory self-government to India. The only obstacles in the way are those placed by the bureaucracy. The Indian leaders should at once proceed to England and acquaint the people there with the aspirations of the Indians. As, in reply to a question of Mr. Rees, Mr. Montagu said that the Reform Bill would be introduced this session, there should be no more delay in the deputations visiting England.

90. The Andhrapatrika, of the 18th February, refers to the encouragement given to the Ayurvedic system of medicine by the Government of Travancore, and remarks that such encouragement by Native States will be productive of much good to the health of the people, secured in accordance with the old system of medicine.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 15th Feb. 1919.

91. The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th February, says under this heading :—The prices do not fall in spite of the endeavours of the Government. The Government themselves are in a fix. The prices of grains other than paddy have also risen considerably. As these other grains are not so very unavoidable for the sustenance of man, the Government may not interfere with their prices. But we submit that when the yield is low in the district, and when the imports from other parts have stopped, it is not proper on the part of the Government to permit the export of the little quantity available. As for cloth, it appears that in certain territories, the authorities get cloth woven in the Bombay Mills and have it sold at cheap prices. But we do not see the reason why the Madras Government are dilatory in this respect. Had the District Collectors properly intimated to the Government the clamour of the people in their districts, the Local Government would have been awakened. We hope that at least our District Collector will make haste to write to the Madras Government and see that cloth is got from Bombay. The difficulty felt in securing kerosene oil is beyond description. . . To remedy this state of things, we make the following suggestions for the adoption of the Government if they deem them proper :—(1) The price of grain should be fixed at Rs. 65 per putti. This price will in the present circumstances be acceptable to all. (2) Export licence-holders should be directed to sell some bags of rice every day to the poor at 8 seers per rupee. (3) Other grains than paddy should not be allowed to be exported. If possible they should be imported from other localities. (4) The Madras Government should be communicated with and Bombay cloth got and sold. . . (6) Arrangements should be made with kerosene oil companies for a large supply of kerosene oil. If these things are not carried out at an early date, the suffering of the people will become unbearable and the peace of the country may be disturbed.

Famine prices.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 15th February, says :—The price of rice has not come down. The Government does not admit the existence of famine. Each gives his own explanation for this state of things. The rumour is afloat that some merchants have written to the Director of Civil Supplies stating that there are five lakhs of rice bags at Bezwada and the surrounding villages. But no one knows how far this is true. What could the Director of Civil Supplies do ? He has to listen to the words of the Collectors on the one hand and those of the people on the other. Since statistics were taken of the grain stored up by the merchants, times have changed for the better. The war has come to an end and the ryots are not now in fear of being pressed for money for war purposes. We suspect the accuracy of the figures given by the merchants before the termination of the war. Many say with one voice that there is a large stock of grain and rice in the Delta districts. His Excellency the Governor should take personal interest in the matter and send for all the Collectors to Madras and also the merchants and the ryots, to inquire as to what the several districts have in stock and what they require as to what they can export and also as to what yield they expect from the new crop. Unless this is done, it is difficult to get over the present crisis. It cannot be said that the information hitherto gathered by the Collectors is accurate. For this the merchants and the ryots are to blame and not the Collectors. . . We hope that the Madras Government will arrange for the Conference of Collectors suggested by us.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 15th Feb. 1919.

92. The Kistnapatrika, of the 15th February, says :—His Excellency the Viceroy stated that though one branch of the administration is transferred to Indian Ministers, arrangements will be made to see that the rights, powers and the self-respect of the bureaucracy working in the transferred departments are not at stake. It is self-contradictory to say that the rulers give independence to the Indians preserving at the same time the independence of the bureaucrats intact. The British merchants are clamouring out of fear that changes may take place which may endanger their self-interest. What is the reply of His Excellency Lord Chelmsford to this clamour ? He says that he has placed the Department of Industries under the Government of India so that the interests of the British merchants may not be injured, and that the Governors were given the power of veto, for fear that injustice may be done to them in the provincial Governments. What more is wanted !

His Excellency the Viceroy and the British interests.

93. A correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 17th February, says :—On account of the failure of crops and the abnormal prices in the Gunnavaram taluk, the people have become discontented, and are given to despair. It is feared that, if no precautions are taken, they may have recourse to outrageous acts. The Government should therefore make arrangements for the sustenance of the people of the taluk. . . The difficulties of the ryots are daily on the increase. The highhanded acts of the bureaucracy such as the attachment ofthe property of the ryots in villages where the crops have failed, and the introduction of the new Criminal Law Amendment Bills have excited a new spirit in the ryots and have been a source of unrest and agitation. It is feared that this may lead to some disaster to the country.

94. A correspondent of the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th February, writes: —The British are a just people, as a rule. But no one is free from the greed of wealth, women and lands. Many of our people do not seem to understand fully the methods employed by the Englishmen who have come to this country and their progeny to appropriate all the wealth to themselves and to keep the Indians in abject servitude by means of every possible trick they can think of, chiefly by creating disunion among the people through caste hatred.

95. The Vrittanta Patrike, of the 20th February, writes:—Salt is prepared in the Madras Presidency under the contract system according to which the contractor gets a remuneration of Rs. 13-12-0 for every 3,200 Madras seers of salt which is slightly bigger than the Mysore measure). This means that the cost of producing a seer of salt is even less than a pie. And yet, salt is sold at 2 annas a seer in the Madras market. We do not know whether it is the Government or the middlemen or the retailers that make such an enormous profit on this article. Salt being a prime necessary both to man and cattle and equally essential for agriculture, it behoves the Government to make it as cheaply available as possible.

The dearness of salt.

VRITTANTA PATRIKE, Mysore, 20th Feb. 1919.

96. The Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 19th February, hails with great joy the news that His Majesty the King Emperor made express reference in Parliament to the early introduction of the Reform Scheme for discussion, and remarks that India must deem herself exceedingly fortunate that her affairs are being considered despite the other great problems which now engage the attention of the Parliament, and the fact that the Indian problem was referred to even before the more pressing problem of Ireland was touched upon shows the depth of His Majesty's interest in India's progress. The paper next remarks that His Majesty's reference to industrial expansion shows that India may expect a bright future both politically and industrially at the same time.

Indian Reforms in Parliament.

VOKKALIGARA PATRIKE, Bangalore City, 19th Feb. 1919.

97. Referring to the intention of Government to introduce a Bill in the Imperial Legislative Council to enable them to maintain the Indian Defence Force for sometime longer and to consider the desirability of compelling the Europeans in India to undergo military training, the Manorama, of the 14th February, observes:—It does not take much thought to find out what it is that induces the Government to make military training of the Europeans in India compulsory. It only proves that the Government have no great faith in the Indians. We have been fighting with a view to put a stop to conscription in all countries. Why then should it be considered necessary to continue in India a state of affairs which, it is thought, should not be continued in any other country?

officers, dwells upon the desirability of granting them such an allowance or a batta as prayed for by the village officers of South Kanara in their recent memorial to the Revenue Board, and thinks that though most of them are landowners their present condition is really very pitiable.

The Madras Budget for 1919–1920.

100. While expressing satisfaction at the presentation of the Madras Budget for 1919–20 in the local Legislative Council a little earlier than usual, so as to give the members an occasion to criticise the same, as well as at the sound condition of the finances of the Government, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 12th February, observes that considering the fate of the resolutions moved by the non-official members, it must be said that unless these Councils are reconstituted agreeably to the recommendations of the Montagu-Chelmsford Scheme, the opinions of the Honourable Members, i.e., of the people whom they represent, will be presented in vain, and that it is quite evident that in the present state of affairs their representation in the Councils will not bring the public any perceptible advantage.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 12th Feb. 1919.

Mappilla riots.

101. The Kerala Sanchari, of the 12th February, gives an account of the recent Mappila riots in the Mankada-Pallippuram amsom of the Walluvanad taluk, and congratulates the District Magistrate as well as others whe took part in quelling the riot in two days.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 14th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the recent Walluvanad riot, the Yogakshemam, of the 14th February, points out that this is not the first occasion on which armed fanatics have murdered innocent people in the Walluvanad region. That the fanatics have been killed, is no consolation to those who have suffered. People trust a Government for the protection of their person and property. To know that that protection is impotent and to have to pass one's days in perpetual fear is worse than solitary imprisonment. This is the fate of all those who have to live among the Mappilas of Ernad and Walluvand. . . It is confidently expected that the Government will do the needful in the matter and try to prevent such occurrences in the future.

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Director of Fisheries.

102. "Look at the caste bias of the Madras Government," exclaims an editorial note in the Samadarsi of the 15th February, which takes exception to the appointment of Mr. Hornell, who knows nothing about fisheries, to succeed Sir Frederick Nicholson as Director. Mr. Hornell, perhaps, knows how to receive and spend the fifteen thousand rupees a year which he will get as the pay of this post. What need for any further qualification? Mr. V. V. Govindan is Assistant Director and the Government have recognized his ability. But the protestations made in the Legislative Council that Mr. Govindan may be placed in sole charge of the department were of no avail. If, however, the Government were not willing to make a dark man head of the department, it was suggested that the Fisheries Department may be placed under the Department of Industries. This was not heeded either. Mr. Hornell must be provided for. The flood of his fortune must wash away before it, Mr. Govindan's ability and claims and public opinion. That is all.

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 15th Feb. 1919.

Civilians and the Reform Scheme.

103. An editorial note in the Samadarsi, of the 15th February, states that the Civilians are trying to construct a dam against the flood of Indian Reforms. The Viceroy saw this and called out to them that they need not bother, as reforms will be introduced only in such a way as not to injurie their prestige and dignity. Most of the Civilians are the white men from England. They constitute the foreign bureaucracy of India. If the dominating power of this bureaucracy will not be shaken in the least, "who wants such reforms." Some believed that these Civilian subordinates will be reprimanded by the Government for criticizing the scheme and memorializing the Government. But those that believed so are the people that have erred. "What is this Government of India? It is only these same Civilians grown old and ripe"

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 6th Feb. 1919.

A glance at the budget.

104. The Qaumi Report, of the 6th February, referring to the budget estimate for the year 1919–20 submitted by the Hon'ble Sir Alexander Cardew at the Legislative Council, writes:—Undoubtedly the Honourable Member has very carefully, sympathetically and with great consideration and perseverance prepared the scale of the income and expenditure and in the present circumstances it is impossible to increase or decrease the scale.

The editor, in giving a detailed list of the amounts sanctioned under different heads, observes:—It is regrettable to find that no special attention has been paid to Muhammadan education, nor has any provision been made in the budget for its expenditure. Muhammadans have in every way been left unprovided for.

MUSHIR-I-DAKHAN, Hyderabad, 6th Feb. 1919.

A further increase in telegraphic rates.

105. The Mushir-i Dakhan, of the 6th February, referring to this subject writes:—It was thought that as the Armistice was signed and the terms of peace were being settled, the rates, duties and prices of those articles which had risen during the war would be restored to their normal condition. We had expected that a reduction would primarily be made in the enhanced telegraphic rates and railway fares which were connected with the war. But it is astounding to find that a notification of the Indian Postal Department regarding the enhanced rates in the telegrams has been published to the effect that from the 1st February 1919 the rate of the ordinary telegram consisting of twelve words has been increased from twelve annas to one rupee and that of the express telegram for the same number of words from one rupee to two rupees.

In short this increase is extremely hard considering the present prevailing dearness of all articles. The Government should necessarily show special consideration in fixing rates, and duties on articles that are connected with the Government, so that it may afford at least some facility to the public.

One rupee and two and a half rupee notes.

106. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 8th February, commenting on the public criticisms on the issue of these notes writes:—When one rupee and two and a half rupee notes were issued by the British Government, the public was under the impression that the Government were replacing silver coins by paper money, which leads us to infer that the Government silver stock is being exhausted.

The people, however, were lacking in foresight, for no one raised such an objection when hundred rupee, ten-rupee and five-rupee notes were in circulation before the war. Hence there is no reason why they should give expression to such ideas at the issue of the new notes.

Four objections are being raised at the new notes in circulation—

(1) That they get soiled very quickly.

As regards this objection it is stated that the Government has issued orders to post offices and treasuries to receive back such soiled notes and to issue fresh notes instead. Thus this objection is renounced.

(2) That one rupee and two and a half rupee notes cannot be hoarded or hidden under ground like silver coins.

It is true but the procedure here is different, e.g., if a person wishes to safeguard his wealth he should deposit such notes in a Post Office Savings Bank when the Government will be its custodian and his money will be more secure than if placed in the earth. He will also be in receipt of interest from the Government and whenever a person demands the return of the full amount, it will be returned to him with interest. Thus this objection is met.

(3) That notes cannot be melted like silver coins that are used for making silver ornaments.

It is true, but it should be remembered that the Government condemns melting of gold and silver coins and that people who do so are liable to severe punishment. Such objection prevails in England also and no one may consider that the order is restricted to India alone.

This objection also fails.

(4) That the issue of one rupee and two and a half rupee notes is a new practice.

Although new practice is introduced in India, no such practice exists in other countries. This objection can easily be removed if all Indians knew that notes of small denominations are in circulation in other countries also.

JAMIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

A health association.

107. The Jeridah-i-Rozgar, of the 15th February, referring to His Excellency Lord Pentland's speech delivered at the Senate House on the 13th idem regarding the preservation of public health and the care of infant life, writes—

His Excellency's speech is couched in suitable terms and based on well-founded arguments.

His Excellency's advice regarding the care of infants is prompted by profund solicitude for the welfare of the young.

The editor requests his local contemporaries to try their best to see that the proposal meets with general approval so that the association may receive all possible encouragement.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

Disappointment to Muhammadans.

108. The Qaumi Report, of the 11th February, commenting on the disappointment caused to Muhammadans by Government not granting the right of separate electorate to Muhammadans for their representation at the municipal council, remarks:—We have the least hesitation in saying that the Government has committed a serious blunder and Hindu brethren have acted exceedingly unjustly in the matter.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

Municipal representation.

109. The Qaumi Report, of the 12th February, writes:—The Government of Madras has refused to grant the Mussalmans the right of representation. We should not on this account be disappointed and discouraged but be more urgent in our demands and more zealous in our endeavours We should give neither ourselves nor the Government any rest.

The Government thinks we Mussalmans are seeking some seats in the Corporation and that we may be satisfied if two or three be conceded. We should prove that this is an erroneous idea. We are demanding the right of national representation, and that until we are not able to elect our own representative it is not likely that we can be satisfied.

It is now advisable that we should appeal to the Government of India and invite the attention of the Viceroy to consider the demand before passing the Bill. Apparently the Madras Government has acted in accordance with the opinion of the Government of India and hence the question should be introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council so as to ascertain as to whether the Government of Madras is right. It is a disgrace to Mussalmans to sit quiet and disheartened at the defeat. We must try again and we may succeed if God wills.

III.—LEGISLATION.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

110. Observing that the second of these Bills too has been referred to a Select Committee in spite of the opposition of the non-official members, the Desabhaktan, of the 12th February, writes:—We never expect that the bureaucrats, who by the exercise of their influence and different kinds of powers conduct the administration in the way they like, will meet with discomfiture. Why will not they, who are accustomed to assert themselves disregarding public opinion, carry on the administration in an irresponsible manner? The Government should note that this irresponsible system of administration will only aggravate the existing unrest and discontent in the country.

Referring to a provision in the second Bill penalising the possession of a seditious publication, the same paper observes:—It is also provided in the Bill that the person possessing this publication should prove that he keeps it with him for a legitimate purpose. When the all-knowing executive officers are accusing a man and harassing him, how will it be possible for him to prove that he has the publication with him only for a legitimate purpose? Even if he succeeds in proving to that effect, will that be acceptable to the authorities? If a person, through ignorance, keeps such a publication in his possession, is it not cruel to charge and punish him for the same? It is needless for us to state that, on account of this provision, both the educated and the uneducated, the wise and the ignorant will suffer alike at the hands of the Police. We repeat again that to pass the second Bill, which contains a cruel provision like this, is both unjust and unfair.

Referring to Rowlatt Bill No. 1, the same paper remarks that some members of the Imperial Legislative Council got entangled into the snare of the bureaucrats in spite of their previous knowledge of the devices of these bureaucrats and observes:—Why should this be passed into law even as a temporary measure? What material difference does it make whether it is in force only for three years or for ever? What guarantee is there that it will not be made permanent later on? Though the Honourable Members are well aware of the attitude and nature of the bureaucrats, they feel elated at the statement that Bill No. 1 will, when passed into law, remain in force only for a short period.

The Dravidan, of the 12th February, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments expressed in the Justice of the 11th idem pointing out the misapprehension of the scope of the Bills and the need for enacting them. DRAVIDAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 12th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an account of a meeting of the People's Association at Arcot held on the 30th January 1919 in which various resolutions are reported to have been passed the chief of which being that protesting against the enactment of these Bills. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 13th February, publishes in Tamil the resolutions passed at a public meeting held in Salem on the 12th idem, strongly protesting against the enactment of these Bills and exhorting the non-official members to withdraw from the Select Committee and even resign their membership if the Bills were passed into law. SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

Remarking that, in the administration of this country, the policy of "rallying the moderates" is now being successfully adopted by the bureaucrats, and quoting as an instance the proceedings of the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Swadesamitran, of the 13th February, observes:—Has Sir William Vincent given any assurance that this law will not be renewed after three years? If there are reasons to justify its enactment for three years at present, what is the certainty that these will not exist at the end of the three years? It devolves on the Government to make out a case necessitating legislation. When the Government have not done so, why should the non-official members agree to this measure? If a stray case of sedition should occur anywhere during these three years, the authorities may urge it as a reason to have the term further extended. Further they may say that they have received some information from the Secret Police justifying its renewal. Or if at the expiry of the present period they were to say that the conditions which obtained at the beginning of 1919 obtain then also, what will our representatives do? By quoting the analogy of Ireland in which a law was enacted only for a period of three years in the beginning and then renewed, Sir William Vincent perhaps indirectly indicated that the present measure also might be renewed subsequently. Does our history show that any Act passed to suit the conditions existing at a time was revoked when these conditions changed? The Regulation of 1818 is alive with all its vitality even in 1918. So, we have no reason whatever to believe that this law will not be renewed at the end of the three years. There is little doubt that those that have accepted to serve on the Select Committee to consider these Bills, whether they be moderates or nationalists, are clearly acting prejudicially to the interests of the country. Though the Government have the power to pass these Bills, whether the non-official members serve on the Select Committee or not, they will not venture to use that power against the unanimous wish of the Indian members. The very fact of their courting the assistance of the moderates shows this. So the Honourable Members out of respect for the country's wishes and to safeguard the rights and privileges of the peoples should without caring for any privileges, preferment, good will or anything that can be obtained at the hands of the Government, oppose these Bills with one unanimous voice. If their attempts are of no avail, they should in a body secede from the council.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Referring to the statement of a Delhi correspondent to the Amrita Bazaar Patrika to the effect that the authorities asked the non-official members in private to accept these Bills in view to their own interests and said that the new Legislative Council to be SWADESAMITRAN, Madras. 14th Feb. 1919.

formed as a result of the reforms would not approve them, the Swadesamitran, of the 14th February, observes:—Surely the Legislative Council which may be formed as a result of the reform scheme will not accept such Bills. It is, therefore, ludicrous that on this score the present Council should approve them It is professed that these Bills are intended to save the people from the cruelties of the wretched anarchists and that, if they are not passed into law now, they can never be passed hereafter. It is but usual for the authorities to say that any law which is enacted by them is only intended for the people's welfare, and it is alike usual for the people to suffer in consequence of such laws. If it is a fact that these Bills will be productive of good to the people, why will not the new Council accept them? Is it proper to establish a Council that is certain to oppose Bills which will surely benefit the people? If the coming Council is to be representative in character and if it refuses to approve these Bills, then it follows that the Bills are not countenanced by the people. To attempt to pass such Bills into law somehow by securing the consent of a few is not consistent with the political principles of the present day.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 15th February, makes the following observations among others in regard to these Bills:—This rare union among the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council presenting a unanimous opposition was exhibited only in regard to these Bills. There were instances of such opposition in regard to matters relating to education, budget, etc., but not in matters concerning repressive measures, in which the authorities would try to secure a few to side with them. For instance, when the Press Act, the Seditious Meetings Act and the Defence of India Act were introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council as Bills, only a few non-official members boldly objected to them, while the authorities by patting the others who lacked in boldness and common sense won them over to their side. Even the official members who then spoke about these Acts seem to have spoken without fully understanding the evil consequences likely to result from them, because the authorities then assured the people that no harm would result from these laws. But all their assurances have since proved to be empty words. What should the Government understand now from the united opposition of the Indian members to these Bills? They should clearly realize that they are acting against the wishes of the people in enacting this law by compulsion. They should also realize what the consequences will be of such an act. Will the people's representatives be responsible for these consequences?

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 10th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Adverting to an observation in the Viceroy's speech in the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council that these Bills are essential for the peaceful conduct of administration in India, the Vaisyamitran, of the 10th February, observes:—There is no doubt that every Indian who hears this will grow despondent. Wherever the bureaucrats are allowed to have their own ways, there will always be unrest. The rulers should understand that unrest can never be put an end to by repressive measures unless the grievances that cause the unrest are redressed. It is unnatural to repress the rights of man and no one can succeed in going against nature. The westerners think that they can surely succeed in doing anything by the strength of their will power. There is a limit for everything which it is impossible to exceed. . . The Indians are suspected in vain and suspicion necessitates more repressive measures. If, on the other hand, their rights and privileges are granted and they are permitted to adopt the policy of self-determination, there will be no need for any repressive measures at all. To rule a country without trust is altogether impossible. If the rulers happen to be foreigners, they will never confide in the natives. However heartily the Indians may strive hard, they can never create confidence. The cry raised by India against these Bills has become a cry in the wilderness. Let the Indians hereafter at least realise their condition.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 18th February, observes:—The Government are capable of passing any Bill into an Act and they have referred the Rowlatt Bills for the consideration of a Select Committee in spite of the united opposition of all the non-official members. As regards what Indian members should do at this juncture, many important political associations in the country have suggested that they should give up serving on that committee. But Mrs. Besant suggests that they should, on the other hand, remain in the committee and oppose every provision of the Bill, and that, if their opposition turns out futile, they should secede from the Legislative Council. A correspondent to the Capital observes that the Government have resolved to entrust all the liberties of the people in British India into the hands of the Police. This is true. Government by legislation will be supplanted by Government by the Police, if the Rowlatt Bills should become law. Can the people's representatives have the least connexion with such Bills? Would the Government venture to proceed further if the Indian members decline to serve in the committee? If they have the boldness, why should they yield one step by proposing to reduce the duration of the law to three years? They would never venture to use the strength of their votes against all the Indian members. So, there might be salvation only if our members either refuse to serve on the committee or oppose the Bill as a whole. If, without doing so, they begin to oppose the Bill provision by provision, opportunity would arise for the Government to win some of them to their side. For if the Government yield to the views of some members in respect of certain provisions, these members will, in showing their gratitude to Government, support them. Under these circumstances, it is the duty of the Indian members, whether they are moderates or nationalists, to refuse to serve on the committee and oppose the enactment completely and thus withdraw relinquishing all responsibility in the matter.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Swadesamitran, of the 13th February, publishes in extenso the speeches of the President, the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar, and Mr. Satyamurti at a meeting held in the Madras Beach opposite to the Presidency College on the 12th idem, to protest against the Rowlatt Bills, in the course of which the President, after explaining the cause of his leaving the Council Chamber at the recent meeting of the Provincial Legislative Council, pointed out in strong terms that the Rowlatt Bills, which affect the fundamental rights of man, would render free communion of people impossible and subject many to imprisonment, while the second speaker, questioning the competency of the Government of India to enact these Bills, said that these 'barbarous' Bills were being forced on the Indians in return for the help rendered by them in the shape of men and money in the war on the plea that there were anarchists in India, that if measures intended for the suppression of anarchism were foolishly passed without any consultation with the people, they would not have the desired effect and that the words of Sir William Vincent with regard to the proper application of this law could not be depended upon as such promise in the case of the Press Act proved false. He is also reported to have mentioned that the non-official members should share no responsibility in the matter of passing these Bills.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 13th February, publishes an abstract of the proceedings of this meeting, which contains also an observation made by Subhrahmanya Siva, one of the speakers, that since the day on which these Bills are passed a vow should be taken to exclude foreign articles.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 14th February, contains in its leader extracts from the speeches made at this meeting.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 14th February, reproduces the comments, of the Tribune suggesting the course to be adopted by the non-official members in the Select Committee, during the consideration of these Bills, while the Desabhaktan, of the 15th idem publishes in Tamil the views of Mr. Sayyid Hassan Imam about the Bills.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 14th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Referring to the Sedition Bills introduced by the Government in the Imperial Legislative Council as recommended in the Rowlatt Commission Report, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 12th February, points out that, at this juncture, when India is rejoicing at the success of the British arms, these two laws are not necessary for safeguarding the person and property of the people in general, which it says could well be done by the existing criminal law, and that these two Bills, which allow Government servants to arrest and imprison persons on suspicion of sedition, to conduct private inquiries without jurors and assessors and to deal with them as these officials please, without allowing the accused any right of appeal, will not only be a stain on pure British justice in India, but will also serve as extremely sharp instruments for cutting away the freedom of the people. If, in consequence of the inquiries conducted and punishments inflicted under these laws, the people are driven to despair, will not that despair engender sedition and anarchism which the Bills are intended to prevent? The paper thinks that such offences cannot and will not be committed in countries which are under Governments like the British Government, that any law which will conduce to the welfare of the people will not meet with opposition, and that it is only the abuse of such laws by those who administer them that gives occasion to opposition, hardships and despair. There is reason to apprehend the possibility of abuse of these laws, as long as there are some high officials in India who are not particularly fond of India nor particularly sympathetic of its aspirations.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 12th Feb. 1919.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 14th Feb. 1919.

The Yogakshemam, of the 14th February, says that there is no anarchism in India at present. What there was in the past, was due to administrative evils, which the Government are now diligently trying to rectify by the introduction of reforms. Anarchists should naturally have troubled the Government when the Government were being sorely tried by the perils of the war. But during all that time India stood by the Government, forgetting the evils of administration. His Majesty the King and the ministers have stated that India's help exceeded all expectations. Though the non-official members of the Legislative Council pleaded, with one accord, the inadvisability of passing measures which on the very face of them indicate diffidence of Indians who confided in the Government and loyally helped them, measures intended against the disloyal but drafted in such a way that it may trouble the loyal subjects of His Majesty too, and will become in the hands of impetuous officers of Government a veritable instrument of torture. Yet their pleadings were in vain. In the opinion of many, the course of the proposed measures is an excellent proof of the fact that when the Government makes up its mind to do a thing, it does not care very much for public opinion. . . Any way the opinion is gaining momentum as the days pass by that the proposed measures are such as would destroy the freedom of the people.

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum, 15th Feb. 1919.

A note in the Samadarsi, of the 15th February, severely criticises the Rowlatt Bills and observes that experience shows that the arming of the authorities with such terrible legal weapons for the preservation of peace will only produce contrary results. Repression has never and nowhere succeeded. Repression will only agitate the people again and again. If the Government of India which is aware of the fact that popular agitation was first started in India when Lord Curzon set his hand to partition Bengal in the teeth of public opposition, now begin to proceed again counter to public opinion how can such action conduce to peace? . . . The Bills will certainly be passed and will become a halter round the neck of patriotism and love of freedom. We can now only hope and pray that the law may not become so severe as to make the people desperate beyond all bounds.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

111. The Dravidan, of the 13th February, publishes in Tamil the sentiments contained in Justice of the 12th idem, advocating the passing of this Bill.

The Intercaste Marriage Bill.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

112. Remarking that almost all the non-official members of the Provincial Legislative Council opposed this Bill and the provisions thereof, the Desabhaktan, of the 18th February, makes the following observations among others:—It is regrettable that, without realising it to be their duty to give proper answers for the objections raised by the non-official members, the Government members and the Governor opposed all their proposals obstinately. The Government have completely lost sight of the obvious fact that the capacity of the Indians for taking part in the administration of the country depends upon their training and experience in local self-governing institutions. The Government find fault very often with the Indians that they do not evince much interest and enthusiasm in municipal affairs, but refuse to grant them freedom in this respect. . . Sir Francis Spring proposed an amendment that it would suffice if all the buildings and lands under the Port Trust Board are assessed at 4 per cent of the annual income derived from them. This was accepted by the Government and the reason for doing so is not known. We ask why the Government should render any help to the Port Trust Board who are growing rich from provincial revenues. It is unjust on the part of the Government to have declined to accept even the modification proposed by the representative of the Chamber of Commerce to increase the rate to 5 per cent. It should be noted that by this concession, the Corporation loses an income of two lakhs of rupees a year. We painfully state that on the whole the way in which the Government conducted themselves when the Bill was discussed in the Legislative Council was loathsome.

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

The Dravidan, of the 17th February, reproduces almost the same sentiments on this Bill as Justice of the 15th idem, commenting unfavourably on the utility of reforms on the lines adopted in this Bill and remarking that a good deal of time of both the official and non-official members has been wasted in the discussion of its provisions.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 18th February, observes:—It is not satisfactory to the people that certain provisions in this Bill should become law without being amended, chiefly those relating to the levy of taxes. If the Bill becomes law as it is, the people will not accept it cheerfully. According to the Bill graduates will no longer have the voting franchise. This only shows the apathy for graduates and the failure to appreciate their work and services. Graduates had votes till now, not because they owned houses and other properties in the city, but because they were considered to be intelligent and fit to espouse the public cause with a liberal heart. Depriving graduates suddenly of this privilege is certainly a great loss to the country. The number of people's representatives on the new Council will increase. But European representatives, though few in number, are very powerful and these together with the members nominated by the Government may form a majority and act against the elected members. We consider that even those that till now were a party to the enactment of this new piece of legislation will not appreciate it in its present form.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

The Agricultural Pests Bill.

113. Observing that the Government have passed this Bill without the slightest consideration for the suggestions of the public to effect certain alterations and corrections in the provisions thereof and remarking that the action of the Government in this matter is regrettable, the Hindu Nesan, of the 18th February, says:—How far this Act will be conducive to the interests of the agriculturists of this province remains to be seen. The arguments advanced by the representative members are sound enough. It appears that big European planters in this Presidency were in favour of this Bill, but they do not seem to care for the welfare of the uneducated villagers. The benefit of this Act very much depends upon the way in which the object of the Government in passing it is explained to the ignorant ryots. Though the amendments suggested by the non-official members may not be carried out, still we trust that the Government will become convinced of the expediency of their suggestions while enforcing this Act.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

Disappointment: the Congress deputation.

114. Referring to the rejection by the Government in the Imperial Legislative Council of the Hon'ble Mr. Patel's resolution asking for the cancellation of the prohibition order regarding the Congress deputation, the Andhravani, of the 5th October, observes:—The rejection of this resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council is highly regrettable. . . The Secretary of State and the Viceroy have both expressed their readiness to consider any popular representation or criticism on the Scheme of Reforms. But the Government do not really seem to be in right earnest to consider public opinion. There is none in England to represent the aspiration of the Indian people. The members who proceeded in April on behalf of the Home Rule League, were ordered to go back. The Bombay censors stand in the way of our communicating our real opinions by means of letters and newspapers. The misrepresentations circulated in England by the Sydenham party with Dr. Nair to keep time to their tune are causing despair to Indians. As for the scheme of Reforms, Indians are not prepared even to look at it, unless many modifications are made therein. It is not proper for the Government here as well as for the Cabinet in England to treat so lightly the opinions of the leaders of those people for whose benefit this Reform Scheme is published and whose future greatness depends on the reforms contained therein. . . To refuse passports to the Indian representatives at such a favourable critical juncture as this cannot at all be statemanship. . . We request that the British statesmen who are well known for their love of justice and for their championship of the right, may revoke their orders and earn the gratitude of the 300 millions of Indians by fully complying with their wishes. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampore, 12th Oct. 1918.

Recommendation of the Rowlatt Commission.

115. Regarding the rejection by the Government of the Hon'ble Mr. Khaparde's resolution in the Imperial Legislative Council to put in abeyance the consideration of the recommendations made by the Rowlatt Commission, the Andhravani, of the 12th October, remarks. . . Since the Defence of India Act is only a temporary measure, the Government want to make some permanent legislation on that model. It is not proper for Indians who have tasted sufficiently well the evil consequences of such laws to be silent at this juncture. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampore, 1st Feb. 1919.

Are repressive laws our new political reforms?

116. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 1st February, writes under this heading:— . . . It is nothing but ridiculous for Government to talk of granting self-government to Indians who have not the fundamental rights of human beings. . . Perhaps, these Bills constitute the first step in the new scheme of reforms. . . The Rowlatt Commission has stated that sedition in India had its origin in the Chitpavan Brahman community of Mr. Tilak, and that the speeches and writings of Swami Vivekananda, the great Hindu religious worker and disciple of Sri Ramakrishna Paramahamsa, have largely contributed to its growth. . . It has likewise expressed its thoughtless opinions on many debatable points. . . Indians should hold meetings in every town and village and express in unequivocal terms their disapproval of the attempts made by autocratic rulers to destroy their inherent rights. . . Some of our rights as men have been already stamped out by the bureaucracy. There is no freedom of speech. There is no freedom of the press. There have already been repressive provisions to imprison boys, nationalists and such others who may criticise the bureaucracy. The Government should be able to understand with the very little foresight they have, that these new repressive Bills cannot have any other effect than creating unrest among the people of India, who seem to think wrongly that they have still some rights, despite so many coercive laws already in existence. . . Is it a principle of British administration of justice to coerce the whole of India for the punishment of a few anarchists? . . . It is as highly regrettable as it is most shortsighted that the Government of India should think fit to inaugurate new repressive measures on the eve of the new era when greater cordiality should prevail between the rulers and the ruled. The Government will not refrain from doing what they want to do. But let them think of resorting to this despotic action, after realizing with a clear insight how the future condition of the country would be under these Bills. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampore, 1st Feb. 1919.

Repressive laws.

117. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhravani, of the 1st February, writes in its leaders under this heading:—. . . It may be said that the new Bills beat out the Defence of India Act itself in point of severity. . . The people know how the Government apply repressive laws. Those laws will render national service impossible, enhance the influence of the Police, and leave no refuge for the people from the abnormal acts of the bureaucracy. It will be an offence according to the new Bills to agitate for reforms as at present. The freedom of the people will be curtailed in every way and bureaucratic power will raise its head. Such coercive measures were not deemed necessary, even when India was in a most turbulent condition. . . There does not seem to be any special reason in the condition of the country calling for the enactment of measures which are even more drastic than the Defence of India Act. . . The Government have failed to carry out the promise made by them at the time of passing the Defence of India Act, that they will make it only a temporary measure and apply it discreetly. . . The people of India have never expected that the Government, instead of repealing the repressive measures already in force, will try to embody in the permanent statute book, laws of even a harsher nature, based upon the recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission. They are asking in shame whether this is the reward for the thoroughly loyal services rendered by them to the Empire. . . While the whole civilised world has accepted the principle that the burden of proof should lie on the prosecuting party, the amendment to the current Indian Penal Code throws that burden on the accused. . . By the second Bill, the people will have no facilities to question the conduct of the executive, even though they behave in an autocratic way. Statesmen are anxious that the autocratic measures already adopted by the Government have estranged the rulers from the ruled. To estrange them further cannot be far-sightedness. . . The Government will introduce the new Bills in the Imperial Legislative Council in the first week of February. The elected members should then express their disapproval with an undaunted voice, and make the Government give up their attempts. May the people convey to the Government their disapproval by holding public meetings in time, and thus uphold the honour of their country!

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

118. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th February, writes in its leader under this heading :—It is clear that the first of the Rowlatt Bills is more dangerous than the second. While the second Bill only confers some extra-ordinary powers on the Government, in emergent cases, the first proposes amendments to the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, which permanently upset law. . . The newly proposed section 124-B in the Indian Penal Code is opposed to the principles of British justice. . . The man in whose possession a seditious document has been found will have to prove that he has kept it with him in good faith. Lawyers know how difficult it is to prove such a fact. . . How is it possible to know which newspaper or which book contains sedition? Will it be possible for one who has not gone through a book to find out which part of it is seditious. So many books will be sent to newspapers for review. Who can know whether there is sedition in them all or not. As has been pointed out by Pandit Malavya, if such documents fall into the hands of students, can they be expected to exercise proper discrimination? Even grown up people find it difficult. Sedition has not till now been defined, and there is difference of opinion about it among the Judges of the High Courts. The section of the repressive Bill is even more stringent than the corresponding section of the Defence of India Act, for the latter enables the people to know what documents they should not possess by clearly specifying the prohibited ones. The new Bill, on the other hand, throws on the people the burden of deciding which documents are seditious, and keeps them in a state of fear by affording room for doubt. Besides section 2, there are many others like 510 (a) and 565 (a) which are fraught with evil consequences. . . Such drastic provisions will disturb the peace of the country by calling forth unnecessary agitation. It is the highest duty of the popular leaders to protect the country from such a calamity. The new Bills are retrograde and do not help progress. Writing to the Bengalee on these Bills, Mr. A. C. Mazumdar has expressed his anxiety in the following terms: ". . . The provisions of these Bills are fit for countries which have been newly conquered and placed under martial law. . ." . . . Whatever be the number of our representatives going to England, all that they can do is to represent the wishes of the people, which will be crowned with success only when the people firmly express their opinions and are ready to make the necessary sacrifices.

The crisis.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Feb. 1919.

119. Referring to the discussion on the Madras City Municipal Bill in the Local Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th February, observes:—. . . It looks improper that the bureaucracy should introduce this narrow Municipal Bill before the introduction of the scheme of self-government in the country. . . The amendments proposed by the Hon'ble Mr. Rajagopala Achariyar with a view to still further narrow the report of the Select Committee, are accepted. . . Local self-government cannot progress, so long as it is in the hands of the authorities. . . According to the new Bill, the authority of the President of the Corporation becomes nominal while that of the Commissioner increases. . . Similarly, the Hon'ble Mr. Spring moved an amendment prohibiting the Corporation from levying taxes on the buildings of the Port Trust. By this amendment, the Corporation will lose two and a half lakhs of rupees out of its income. Instead of increasing the income of the Corporation, the new Bill only makes it still smaller and multiplies the Corporation's responsibilities. Self-government cannot but look ridiculous in these circumstances. . .

The Madras City Municipal Bill and Doctor Nayar's speech.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and the European Association.

120. Referring to the resolution of the European Association on the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th February, observes in its leader:—. . . What is the advantage in having the Bills made temporary? People know from experience that temporary measures would be retained as permanent. Though the Seditious Meetings Act was intended to be in force for only three years, it has been made permanent subsequently. The Press Act has not been made temporary in spite of the promise made by the Government in deference to the request of the non-official members. When once a repressive law has been passed, it will be difficult to have it abrogated. . . Though Lord Chelmsford may be inclined to have these Bills as only temporary measures, it cannot be said with certainty that his successor will respect such a promise. When it is a matter of obstructing the birth-rights of the people, three years is not an ordinary period. It will be hard upon the people to forego their rights for so long a time. Leaders like Mr. Bannerjea no doubt expressed their pleasure on hearing the fact that the Government mean to pass the Bills as only temporary measures; but such a sentiment cannot prevail among the people. It is the duty of every Indian to see that such coercive Acts have no place among the laws of the country. That the European Association should express, in these circumstances, its disapproval of the attitude of the Government in making the Bills only temporary is in keeping with its traditions. The reasons advanced by it are quite ridiculous. . . The European Association deserves our thanks for speaking out its mind without reserve. Its main object is to see that the reforms will not be of the least use and that repressive acts are freely promulgated. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The leaders we have lost in the Legislative Council.

121. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th February, gives in Telugu an extract from the Amrita Bazar Patrika, regarding the attitude of some Moderates in the Viceroy's Council towards the Rowlatt Bills which contains:—It is thus clear that these gentlemen (the Moderates) have renounced their principles and views in order to please the authorities. . .

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The City Municipal Bill.

122. Referring to the discussion of the City Municipal Bill in the Legislative Council, the Andhraprakasika, of the 17th February, says:—The Government believed the opinions of the Select Committee as gospel truth and have rejected every amendment proposed by the non-official members. . . The Hon'ble Diwan Bahadur Rajagopala Acharyulu, a member of the Select Committee, may have obtained a sufficient knowledge of local self-government from books. But what is the use of it? It can shine only after being polished on the whetting stone of experience. Again he is a high-placed officer and as such he could not run counter to the views of the Government. It may be supposed that the Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar also had the same difficulty. From the discussion of the Bill, it will appear that the Government are not evincing any interests in the matter of local self-government. We do not see any difference between the old and the new law. The new law does not relax the interference of the Government to any the least extent. Should the people obtain the permission of the Government even in insignificant matters connected with finance? How can the people be trained in responsible local self-government in such a case? How many centuries will it then take for them to obtain responsible self-government? We do not understand this persistence on the part of the Government. Are they acting under instructions from the higher authorities? Or, what could be the reason for the Government invariably considering as unfair those matters which the peoples' representatives consider just? It is unfair that the authorities who think that the people are to some extent fit to have self-government, should themselves throw obstacles in matters relating to local self-government. We submit that the Government should know that it would be well to entrust the Indians with greater responsibility as they gain more and more experience.

Well-done! Mr. Narasimha Ayyar!

123. Congratulating the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar on his walking out of the Council and contrasting his conduct with that of the Hon'ble Mr. M. Ramachandra Rao on a similar occasion at Ootacamund in May 1917, the Hitakarini, of the 9th February, writes under this heading:— . . . Could it be that such a course of action did not strike the Hon'ble Mr. Ramachandra Rao then? As he is a cold tempered gentleman, he has swallowed his indignation and sat silent. That is why the name of Mr. Ayyar has not had the fortune of having any titles tacked on to it while Mr. Rao has been promoted from Rao Bahadur to Diwan Bahadur. . . It is his own gentle disposition and not any desire on his part to win the favour of the authorities that has prevented Mr. Rao from walking out of the Council like Mr. Ayyar.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 9th Feb. 1919.

The Imperial Legislative Council.

124. Referring to the recent Delhi session of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Hitakarini, of the 9th February, observes:— . . . Many important topics have been discussed in the Viceroy's speech, but those that are favourable to the popular aspirations are very few. . . It will be no excuse for Government to neglect to concert measures for the prevention of epidemics on the ground that they are due to defective sanitation. His Excellency the Viceroy freely lavished his sympathy on the Indian Civil Service officials who receive thousands of rupees every month but who seemed to him to be special victims to the ravages of famine. Has he failed to realize the condition of those poor people who have no house to live in, no bed to sleep on, no food to eat and no rag to wear? Would he not otherwise express some small pity for the poor in their misery?

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 9th Feb. 1919.

It must be said that the way in which he has spoken of the reforms and the Rowlatt Bills which are now agitating the public mind is disappointing. He gives ample assurance to the Indian Civil Servants who are crying that they will be reduced to the position of 'serpents deprived fangs.' . . It appears that only those who have recognized the services rendered by these officials and their readiness for co-operation will be appointed as ministers. . . Why will not the Viceroy look at the obstructions which the bureaucrats are causing to the aspirations and freedom of Indians and to the Home Rule movement with the same eye? Where will his liberality go then? Water always flows down but does not go up. When an Indian happens to be the Viceroy, will the situation be like this? But blood is thicker.

The Viceroy's statement made in defiance of the opinions of Moderates like Sir N. Chandravarkar, that the Rowlatt Bills should be at once passed into law is as surprising as it is regrettable.

. . . On the whole, the Viceroy's speech from start to finish lands the people in a world of despair. . .

The Sedition Bills.

125. The Hitakarini, of the 9th February, reports the Amrita Bazaar Patrika to have written:— "The Maharata says who will be responsible that the Rowlatt Bills will not be abused like the Press Act and the Defence of India Act? We cannot sell our privileges and birthrights for even a hundred schemes of Mr. Montagu". . . No Indian will approve of the Bills without being a traitor to the country.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 9th Feb. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

126. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 14th February, in the course of a leading article criticizing the Criminal Law Amendment Bills, observes:—The Bills have been condemned alike by moderates and extremists, Hindus and Moslems, and we wonder why the Government should be so resolute in its endeavour to override such overwhelming public opinion. Has sedition spread over the country like the influenza epidemic or the furious famine of which we see signs everywhere in the country, or is it spreading like the strikes among the labouring classes which have resulted from the greed of the capitalists? The reason for the persistence of the Government in passing these laws is to be found in the imaginary fear of the Government that the sudden withdrawal of the strong measures enacted during the war might lead to untoward results. If there were signs of anarchist tendencies as a result of enemy intrigue during the war, would it be right to perpetuate such hard measures which take away all individual liberty against a whole nation of such steadfast loyalty? It is not foolish to go about in the streets brandishing swords even after any tigers that may have strayed into the city have been killed? Nothing can be so stupidly absurd as to impose such hard laws on a whole nation in order to control a handful of anarchists. Sir Vincent thinks that the proposed measures will affect only the anarchists. But it is easy to see that the dog that is let loose on these handful of anarchists will pounce on others as well. Those who argue that the measure will not harm loyal citizens do not seem to have comprehended the dreadfully comprehensive nature of its provisions which repress all popular liberty of speech and writing. It is indeed a strange fate that prompts the bureaucracy to hang these mill-stones of the Rowlatt Bills round the necks of a loyal people, just at a time when England herself has the garland of victory round her neck. The reason of this is to be found in the fact that the bureaucracy wants to ensure that no harm comes to its own selfish interests and authority. When the Government is determined to pass these laws in the face of such unanimous opposition from the popular representatives in the Council, what can the meek masses do beyond entering their mere verbal protest?

In another article on the subject, the same paper observes:—The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent with a view to sunder the extremists from the moderates and win the latter to his side, tactfully suggested that the members may suggest amendments. Poisoned sweets cannot alter their poisonous nature and become edible by taking away a portion from those sweets or by adding some new constituents to them . . . The attitude of the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nayar in connexion with this measure cannot be reconciled with his attitude as President of the Congress in 1897-98 when he criticized the law relating to sedition.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 17th Feb. 1919.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 17th February, writes:—The Government have decided to keep the Rowlatt Bills in force for three years after the conclusion of peace. We have to suppose that there would be no arm if innocent persons remain in jail for three years and act accordingly.

A correspondent of the same paper, writes:—In England the Government is responsible to the people. But here all the protests of the people proved unavailing. The Government want to rule like nawabs by providing an official majority in the Imperial Council. Thus the democratic methods which obtain in England have no place in the administration of this country. It is suggested in some quarters that the non-official members of the Imperial Council should resign in a body. When will the Indians gain that manliness and straightforward manner? They are destined to remain in servitude. How can a people steeped in class and religious hatred acquire British traditions and British unity? So long as the majority of our people are without the power of sacrificing even their lives for the sake of their rights and liberties, and remain engrossed in petty quarrels among themselves, it is better that our Government should be nawabs over us. It is no use regretting that the innocent among us may have to suffer punishment as offenders. What cannot be cured must be endured.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 18th Feb. 1919.

A correspondent of the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 18th February, writes:—Many of the farseeing among the Indians feel troubled by the thought that a section of the white men in India have resolved that the Rowlatt Bills should be passed into law, whether the Indians give their consent or not, and that the new law will give the white men autocratic sway over India, and keep the Indians in utter servitude, that it will help the white men to obtain all the wealth of this country and make the Indians suffer from want of food and clothing, and that it will make it possible to put into prison without trial all those who complain of such suffering and to punish them more severely. The rulers are the final redressers of popular grievances. Our rulers are the British public—the British Parliament Some of the self-seeking white men are trying to weaken us by increasing our caste and religious hatred, in order to prevent us from realizing even our just ambitions. If the Indians are careful not to fall victims to the tactics designed for creating differences among themselves and expose the jugglery of these men before the Emperor and the Parliament, our grievances are sure to be redressed.

The Mysore Star, of the 16th February, after referring at length to the discussions in the Imperial Legislative Council, remarks :—Though the Government had never before heard such strong protests against their action, their calmness and patience in listening to them were equalled only by their statesmanship. The same kind of protests had been made when the Defence of India Act was about to be passed. And yet, everybody was subsequently glad of the good it had done to the country. All the bombs, dacoities, and anarchist conspiracies which were so frequently heard of before were nearly warded off by that measure. Who will dare to say that the withdrawal of that measure will not lead to a reappearance of similar crime ? The people ought to trust the promises of the Government that care will be taken to see that the new laws do not do harm to the innocent. They should support the Government in their attempts to ward off crime and not look upon the Government as a kind of step mother.

MYSORE STAR, Mysore, 16th Feb. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

In an article eulogising Sir N. G. Chandavarkar's articles in the Times of India, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 20th February observes :—If the Government should follow Sir Chandavarkar's suggestions British sovereignty in India will be established more firmly than ever. But the authorities are naturally fond of autocracy and indifferent to democratic methods. A tiger which has tasted human blood is seldom satisfied with animal blood. Autocratic Anglo-Indians are altogether averse to democratic methods. This was made clear in the Imperial Legislative Council. The proposed measure will be approved by the Select Committee and assented to by the Viceroy. This will make it evident that British justice can have no place in India. The people will seal their lips. They will not give utterance to dangerous words. But that will not prevent them from cherishing treachery at heart. The attempts to put down anarchist tendencies will thus serve only to increase them. Though Sir Chandavarkar has not said this so explicitly, he has said as much as he could without giving offence to the British authorities.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 20th Feb. 1919.

A correspondent of the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 20th February, subscribing himself R. K. Venkataramayya, Searchlight, Patna, writes :—The Government are offering liberty with one hand and are trying to snatch it back with the other. How would God like it? How are the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, which propose to take steps towards responsible Government, consistent with measures of this kind ? Do we not see with our own eyes that so many lives are needlessly lost every day in consequence of measures of this kind ? How many Editors and Printing Presses, aiming at the enlightenment of the people, are being ruined ! To say that so much wealth is being drained out of India to England every year is sedition. To have a copy of Lajpat Rai's Young India is association with sedition ; and it means arrest or fine that very instant. If such laws are passed one after another, how can the country prosper at all ? . . . Is it not deplorable that the Government should propose measures like this in the face of the fact that India has helped in the great war with men and money beyond her means, although at least 48,000 of her own people are so poor as not to be able to have one full meal a day ? Is human memory getting so short that India's part in the war is to be forgotten as soon as the curtain is dropped on the tragedy ? Oh, Compatriots ! Do you not see or hear that meetings are held in every city in India to show that if the bureaucracy should go on in this manner, Mother India will not be able to bear it a minute longer ? Should you not save Mother India by likewise holding meetings in every village, by enlightening the people and by protesting against such measures ?

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 20th Feb. 1919.

The Vokkaligara Patrike, of the 19th February, after publishing a portion of the above letter, remarks :—The Government have to enact measures from time to time in order to punish the wicked and protect the good. The present Rowlatt Bills also come under the same class. Those who are never guilty of sedition in mind, word or deed have nothing to fear from these laws.

VOKKALIGARA PATRIKE, Bangalore City, 19th Feb. 1919.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

127. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 4th February, in a leader on the marginally-noted subject, writes:—We have not hitherto commented on the Bill for the special reason that we have been anxious to see what the public and the Ulama have to say about it. We now find that concerned voices are being raised from every nook and corner of South India. Among Mussalmans there are a few persons who regard the question of legislation a secular one, and the Hon'ble Mr. Yaqub Hasan as well is trying his utmost to make it appear so. To defeat the end of this small party a very large section of the Mussalmans of South India has prepared itself. The small one is trying to give the Bill a secular colour whereas the big one is endeavouring to prove it as against the Muhammadan law.

The Registration of Marriages and Divorces Bill.

We have taken the arguments of both the parties into consideration and have come to the conclusion that the matter is a religious, and not a secular, one.

Hence it is, we respectfully bring to the notice of the Government "that the late Queen Victoria, the late Emperor Edward and the Emperor George V have reiterated by means of proclamations that the Government of India shall have no power to interfere with the religious and secular affairs of any."

The question being a religious one, the Government should avoid interference.

We are astonished to see that the Secretary to Government has announced in the Fort St. George Gazette the receipt of only 23 petitions. Those important meetings that do not appear in the list have been reported on in the local English and Urdu papers and intimation of which has also been given to the Secretary, Legislative Department. God alone knows the secret of the omission. Most astounding is the fact that only a few of the meetings held against the Bill are mentioned, and hence we give below the names of a few of those important meetings.

Name of the meeting.	Place.	Name of Chairman.	Date.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 2nd Feb. 1919.

128. The Qaumi Report, of the 2nd February, in a leader on this subject, writes:—The Government of India is now determined to frame two preventive laws against sedition. For example the two Bills have been published with a hope that the people of India will welcome them. We do not understand the necessity that leads our Government to draw up some drastic law or other every year. People say that India is making advancement in education and civilization, and the Government in their report very proudly and conceitedly assure the world that they have inspired education and art in the Indian people and have raised the inhabitants of India to a very high standard of civilization and progress. But we plainly ask, can the country, where a severe Press Act exists, or the Government which has framed several strict laws, or the land upon which internment, transportation and imprisonment without trial exist, claim to have inspired education and civilization in the human community? These drastic laws are dealing a death blow to educational and moral prestige and the enforcement of such laws is spreading feelings of alarm and distrust among the people.

Two Acts on sedition.

Only recently the most dreadful world-wide war has ended, when India has given such a genuine and grand proof of its loyalty that even the enemy has recognized the fact that officers from the Premier down to the Commissioner have appreciated the patience, perseverance, sympathy and loyalty displayed by India. This is perhaps its reward for which the two laws are being framed, and it is proved to the world that India is very turbulent and anarchical, and drastic law is necessary to reform and rectify it.

The 20th day of August 1917, the auspicious day in the political history of India, has just passed when the necessity for a responsible government for India was announced, when the Reform Scheme is being circulated far and wide and India is expressing its joy and gratitude at the preservation of its rights, when the Peace Conference is still considering the question of granting freedom to the world and when the ruined nations are being revived, two more laws are being enacted, which are proclaiming that we cannot be trusted and we are worthy of a severer treatment.

The Rowlatt Commission's Report has decided that the germs of sedition and agitation are spreading in our country and the Government has, on its decision, resolved to add certain sections to the Indian Penal Code and to confirm the temporary measures of the Defence of India Act.

Some Anglo-Indian papers taunt us by saying if we are cordially loyal and are really opposed to sedition, why should we fear such preventive laws. We submit that we are not afraid of the effects of the law, but we consider its very name detestable, for we know that a country where drastic laws are constantly passed cannot be worthy of appreciation and we cannot have any credit in the eyes of the public. Surely we wish that mischievous and turbulent people should be punished and those who are rebels to their mother country should be summarily dealt with. But the hand of the law extends so far that it generally involves innocent people also, and the law forms a sort of weapon in the hands of the authorities who commit mistakes in discriminating between right and wrong and between the innocent and the guilty.

If, however, we are given the assurance that a just and free treatment of law will always be extended to us, we have not the slightest objection to the introduction of not only two but thousands of such laws.

The editor in conclusion asks if it is not possible to postpone the amendment until Peace is signed, and to see how the Reform Scheme is dealt with.

129. The Qaumi Report, of the 9th February, in a leader on the marginally noted subject writes:—As regards the new Bill relating to sedition at last the expected thing has happened in the Imperial Legislative Council. At ballot time all non-official Members were against, but all official Members were for, the Bill, and hence the obnoxious and unjust Bill has been referred to a Select Committee.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 9th Feb. 1919.

The stubbornness of the Government of India.

The same will be the case in the Select Committee and the Bill will be passed into law.

This state of affairs opens our eyes to the fact that our freedom is a figment of the imagination, our existence unreal and our voice a vapour.

The Government does whatever it likes and can do so without the opinion of the subject races, nor is this all, it does whatever it likes to do against the will of people. This is due to the predomination of official element.

We are not afraid of the sedition law, nor are we afraid of its effects, because no law can nullify the truth. An oppressive law can convict an innocent man and sentence him to punishment, but it cannot destroy innocence and falsify truth.

The political practice, in which in spite of the opposition of non-official Members a measure is carried out by an official majority, is absurd.

IV.—Native States.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

Mysore.

130. The Andhrapatrika, of the 18th February, refers among other things to the decision of the Mysore Government to appoint a committee of scientific experts to advance the spread of scientific knowledge and to make researches in regard to the economic condition of the province, and remarks:—We see indications of advancement in the province of Mysore. If, in addition to this, the Government habituates the people to the responsibilities of self-government, the province of Mysore will set an example to the other Native States.

ENGLISH PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

1. The Commonweal, for the week ending 21st February, says:—"The most terrible disillusion among all the disillusions of the war is the so-called League of Nations. . . . The proposed League is not a League of Nations, but a League of White Nations, who are to give each other mandates to manage the affairs of the coloured nations of the world. It is an alliance of white races against the coloured, the subjection of the huge coloured majority to the white minority, the beginning of the most terrible war that the world has known, not the end of war. For the moment Japan is admitted into the League, because the white nations dare not exclude her, but the aim of Japan in Asia is not consistent with the objects of the League. . . . The League declares 'the mandatory'—chosen by the League, not by the people—is to be responsible for the administration, for order and 'morals'—presumably on white lines—for the prevention of fortifications, military bases, and the confining of military training to police purposes and defence of territory; that is, they are to be disarmed as India is, and to be helpless in the grip of their armed white masters. Moreover, the mandatory is to 'secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the League'. In other words, the unhappy coloured races are to be exploited for the benefit of the white."

2. The following appears in the West Coast Spectator of the 20th February:—"It is very likely that a motion will be made in the Legislative Council for the appointment of a committee of officials and non-officials to inquire into the periodical outbreaks of 'fanaticism' in the Ernad taluk. Outbreaks come and outbreaks go; the local officials send a report after every outbreak, and there the matter ends; but so far nothing has been done to eradicate the evil. A committee of officials and non-officials will certainly probe into the matter and prescribe remedies. It is no longer politic to fight shy of an open inquiry and to disguise the real issues although these issues might be unpalatable."

Fanatical outbreaks in Ernad.

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 20th Feb. 1919.

3. The West Coast Spectator, of the 20th February, observes:—"The fiat has gone forth from the Throne of Theosophical Grace that the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council should oppose the Rowlatt Bills tooth and nail; in fact they should obstruct them at every point. The message expresses the hope that Sir Sankaran Nayar would resign and head the opposition. Now that the mandate has gone forth, every moderate and every extremist should cry amen, kiss the hem of the High Priestesse's garment and loyally go forth to battle. But, will Sir Sankaran Nayar bow before the mandate and play lieutenant-general to the great Goddess of War?"

Mrs. Besant and the Rowlatt Bills.

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 20th Feb. 1919.

4. New India, of the 22nd February, remarks:—"It seems sometimes to be forgotten by our rulers that it is one thing to make concessions on paper but quite another thing to carry them out in fact. . . . But India has at last discovered that promises by no means herald performances. . . . But the India of 1919 is not the India of before the war. India has learned from western civilization the value placed upon solemn obligations and treaties. She knows that a treaty stands only so long as may be convenient or expedient. She also knows that on but few occasions has Great Britain been true in the performance of her own solemn promises with regard to Indian reform. If the Montagu-Chelmsford Promised reforms and broken pledges.

New India, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

Scheme goes the way all other schemes have gone, if it has already been decided what exact proportion of the scheme shall be allowed to become law, no matter what India may say, an India far different in temper from the India hitherto known will have to be reckoned with. Even patient, long-suffering India will grow tired of camouflage."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

Bolshevism and Rowlattism.

5. New India, of the 25th February, concludes a leader under this heading with the following:—"It is, we think, idle to deny that a serious revolutionary movement at one time threatened this country. But if the danger was averted, it was not because the Government was wise but because the responsible leaders of public opinion were able to turn the tide of India's restlessness under bureaucratic mismanagement—to use no stronger term—from the channel of revolt into the channel of constitutional agitation. If India stands true to Britain—and there is no question that she does—it is in spite of the Government, not because of it. India from the lips of her own trusted leaders has received the message that her greatest and noblest destiny is within the Empire, not outside it. By that message she stands. But we warn those in whom power resides that Rowlattism is the road to Bolshevism, and not the road to a strong contentment resting upon the sure foundation of justice and goodwill."

WEST COAST SPECTATOR, Calicut, 25th Feb. 1919.

Mrs. Besant and rowdyism at meetings.

6. Referring to Mrs. Besant's complaint of rowdyism at meetings, the West Coast Spectator, of the 25th February, observes:—"We can very well understand Mrs. Besant striking this doleful note. She is tottering on her throne; she has to be very careful and do everything in her power to avert a calamity. But pray who taught these young men irreverence to elders? Mrs. Besant sowed the wind, and she is now, necessarily, reaping the whirlwind. We very well remember how she used to attack both on the platform and in her papers, our old respected leaders, in fact everybody who had declined to swallow her nostrums, and the Moderate leaders especially were her anathema. Was it not she who coined the word 'yesterdays'? Nemisis has overtaken that old lady. When she was indulging in her diatribes against the old leaders she little thought that chickens would one day come home to roost."

HINDU, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Mrs. Besant and the Hindu.

7. The Hindu, of the 26th February, writes:—"In an article on 'Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal and before' and an editorial note in yesterday's New India, Mrs. Besant has honoured the Hindu and its editor with copious references and accusations. Our first impulse was to let the lucubrations alone but it is perhaps desirable to make a brief reference to them. . . The proximate cause of the explosion of Mrs. Besant's anger against the Hindu seems to be due to its editor having presided at the first of Mr. Pal's lectures in the Gokhale Hall on the subject of the Delhi Congress and after. . . Regarding the accusation that the policy of the Hindu is to insert all insults except against its own favourites, and that it is sedulously fostering divisions ruinous to the country we wish to say nothing more than that we are content to stand by the cool judgment of the Indian public in preference to the emanations from the heated brain of Mrs. Besant."

JUSTICE, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Women and politics.

8. Justice, of the 26th February, states:—"The fact that about half a dozen women have taken into their heads publicly, impatiently and hysterically to agitate for complete Home Rule for India, proves nothing. The Hindu and Muhammadan women of India remain where they are, and till at least a reasonable fraction of them shake off their traditional orthodoxy and superstition and become enlightened enough to take an active part in the political life of the country, it is absurd to ask for the right of women to be elected to Legislative and Municipal Councils being legally recognized."

JUSTICE, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal.

9. Justice, of the 26th February, says:—"There is an old saying that when a certain class of people fall out honest men come by their own. These reflections occurred to us on reading a report of a speech delivered by Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal about Mrs. Besant. . . Yesterday the word of Mrs. Besant might have stood against the world, and now lies she there, and none so poor to do her reverence, except Mr. C. P. Ramaswami Ayyar. Mr. Pal thinks that the spiritual eminence of Mrs. Besant is immeasurable, especially as he does not possess a theodolite for carrying out the estimation of the height of that spiritual eminence. But last year Mr. Pal was apparently going about with theodolites and sextants and other mathematical instruments for estimating not only the spiritual but also the political eminence of Mrs. Besant. Perhaps, the extraordinary amount of heat generated by the Delhi political discussions has deranged these instruments of precision, or, perhaps, these instruments are now required for measuring the political eminence of Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal himself, as the meeting of the citizens of Madras held on the sands of the seashore has expressed its unabated confidence in the leadership of that gentleman. . . What a fall was there my countrymen, when the uncrowned queen of India who thrice refused the kingly crown at the Gokhale Hall (or was it Adyar?) does not now find a place even among the trusted leaders of India! Can human ingratitude be more unkind? That the school boy crowd that used to shout and cheer and join in the triumphal processions of Mrs Besant should now flock to the sea sands to hear the puny Bengalee jeer at the spiritual eminence of the great White Mahatma is a subject for tears."

Reuter's agency and the Tilak libel case.

10. The Hindu, of the 28th February, remarks:—"It is now several days since the news was received through private agency of the result of Mr. Tilak's libel action. Elsewhere we publish Reuter's telegram conveying the same news. The Indian public at any rate is not more interested in, for example, things that M. Clemenceau did not say or in the soulstirring fluctuations in the prices of tea and silver than in the fate of this important case. . . One of these days we shall perhaps have Reuter parading out as an exclusive item of news the lamentable demise of Her Majesty Queen Anne."

HINDU, Madras, 28th Feb. 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. Cadell on the Arms Act.

11. The following appears in the Hindu of the 28th February:—"We are not among those who admire and would eulogise a fighting spirit for its own sake. In civilised life it is as well that the spirit of combativeness and truculence should remain dormant, and that it should ultimately disappear as a survival of barbarism, but we cannot agree with Mr. Cadell when he makes the sweeping generalisation when he said: 'In this connexion, it may be pointed out that the suggestion that the absence of arms makes the nation effeminate and cowardly is not borne out by the experience of this war. Building such conclusion on the foundation of facts furnished by a few traditional brave Mahratta castes is erroneous and unwarrantable. Prohibiting a whole nation of free men to bear arms and exempting the ruling class and the Anglo India (new style) community from the molifying, degrading, ungenerous and, shall we say, pusillanimous prohibition cannot but react on a people in a manner calculated to sap the fighting instincts and to suppress the spirit of independence. . . We contend that bravery is the monopoly of no nation or community. The fighting instinct is implanted in every human being, and it needs arms, self-respect and opportunity to assert itself. . . To turn round now and talk of the military instincts of particular classes as if all the rest were cowards, and to generalize on the prohibition just when the Government of India and the Secretary of State have determined to remove all racial difference in administering the Arms Act, appears to be as ungenerous as the facts are most certainly and wholly erroneous."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The League of Nations.

12. Referring to the seventh article in the covenant defining the qualifications for membership in this League, the Hindu Nesan, of the 19th February, observes:—We are disabled from representing our grievances to the League of Nations, because we have no right of self-government. Unless the British Government are graciously pleased to grant this to us soon, there is no salvation for us.

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The League of Nations.

In its leader under this heading, the Kistnapatrika, of the 22nd February, observes:— . . . The present is a commercial age, an age, that is to say, with money-making as its main aim. The wealth of other countries is being exploited in every way on the pretext of political connexions. Machines, factories, companies, etc., are all accompaniments of this commercial age. Looked at from the commercial point of view all human beings are but creatures with hunger and thirst. "How to live?" is the life-problem. The struggle for existence is the chief work of life. . . Ambition increases proportionately with money-making. Just as the pouring of oil increases the flame, the acquisition of wealth multiplies the desire for enjoyment. Who can check this desire? Where are mines to dig and carry away their contents? Where are countries, to establish new markets in? How should schemes be matured to facilitate the largest sale of our own articles? Such are the burning questions of the day. . . Though the wonderful cry of self-determination is echoed in one corner, we find a syndicate in America, an association in Britain and a company in France formed for the purpose of devising the best way of exploiting the resources of Persia. How is it possible to prevent mutual jealousies in these circumstances? There is no use of trying to deal with the root causes of dispute superficially without applying a radical cure. Quarrels, competition, and schemes will be cropping up, so long as the wound exists inside. It will be ridiculous to ask now whether this party or that is responsible for all this blood-shed which is really the result of the present commercial age. By means of such leagues of nations, they may prevent blood-shed. But mere blood-shed should not be treated as so dangerous after all. It is this commercial spirit which is more dreadful than that, which constantly tells upon the society, which weakens other countries, which reduces our fellow-men to slaves and drowns humanity in sensual enjoyment. . . These leagues, rules and treaties can be absolutely of no avail, unless this havoc of factoriess, machines and steam-engines, this hankering after money is counteracted from within. If blood-shed is prevented this disease is bound to reappear in a new and yet more dangerous form. Guns can only destroy the body while factories will kill not only the body but also the soul and will thereby foster demoniacal spirit. Can the League of Nations root it out? To say, while encouraging the desire to amass money, that there should be no mutual jealousies is as strange as pinching a person and then asking him not to cry.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Republican move in South Africa.

13. Referring to the movement of the nationalist party in South Africa to secure the old republican form of Government, the Swadesamitran, of the 19th February, draws attention to the statement of Mr. Malan to the effect that those born and brought up in democracy will not relish much to be connected with the British Empire.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

Referring to this movement and observing that a new sprit has sprung up in South Africa which is characterized as divine and as one which cannot be suppressed by anybody, the Desabhaktan, of the 20th February, writes:—The South Africans demand a republican form of Government, and Ireland threatens England that it has established one. Who can foresee what the other colonies such as Canada, Australia and New Zealand, are going to demand of the British? All these want to secede from the British. But what India requires is nothing more than responsible government under the British Empire and that too not the whole of it but only a part. For this, the British threaten the Indians. The Anglo-Indians raise a loud cry against this and the Indian Civil Service party are endeavouring to enact cruel repressive laws whereby they can keep the Indians for ever under subjection. What can the Indians do under these circumstances? It will be fair and proper for the British statesmen who are credited with a far-sighted policy and mature consideration to realise the trend of the times and satisfy the Indian aspirations in a liberal manner.

Republican move in South Africa.

The Dravidan, of the 21st February, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments contained in the Justice of the 20th idem under the heading 'South African Nationalists', commenting adversely on the nationalist movement in South Africa and elsewhere.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Indians in South Africa.

14. The Desabhaktan, of the 21st February, observes:—The whites in South Africa have brought into force many cruel laws with a view to oust the Indian merchants from there. We are witnessing the disparaging treatment which the whites accord to the Indians, in spite of the repeated assurances of the British Government that the Indians will be treated in the same way as the other subjects of the Empire. It is not apparent why the British Government are indifferent to the low condition of the Indians in Africa. The South African Union Government have resolved to oppress and enslave the foreigners. When will the hardships of the Indians there come to an end?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Indians in South Africa.

Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st February, writes:— . . . The difficulties of Indians in South Africa have not yet come to an end. The Indian merchants are now to face new obstacles. The President of the Transval British Indian Association has sent a cable to the Bombay Chronicle that attempts are being made to exterminate Indian commerce. The Indians in South Africa, therefore, request their brethren in this country to help them and avert such a danger. But the people of India will not be in a position to help their brethren in foreign countries until they themselves secure an efficient system of self-government. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Indians in British East Africa.

15. The Swadesamitran, in its issues of the 12th and 14th February, reproduces in Tamil, in parts, the gist of a lengthy article by a correspondent appearing in the issue of the Modern Review for February 1919, detailing the hardships suffered by the Indians in British East Africa.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th & 14th Feb. 1919.

Self-determination.

16. Regarding the right of India for self-determination and for representation in the League of Nations, the Andhravani, of the 8th February, writes:— . . . It is but just that India should have separate representation in the League of Nations. The efforts of the London branch of the Indian Home Rule League to place the matter before the Peace Conference for consideration are very commendable. They have recently published a pamphlet proving the fitness of Indians for the right of self-determination. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 8th Feb. 1919.

The end of the war.

17. Referring to the cessation of hostilities between the Central Powers and the Allies, the Andhravani, of the 16th November 1918, observes:— . . Will they accord to us along with other countries the right of determining our Government? There is no wonder if they accord it. Our country also has fought for the establishment of this right along with the Allies, and triumphed. Are they going to deny her what she has established? Will they not be ridiculed, if they do so? While destroying autocracy in Europe, will they not destroy it in our country? It will be just that they destroy. The Montagu-Chelmsford report was prepared during the war. The Congress, the Moslem League and even the Moderates have suggested many modifications to those reforms, as they did not suit the then existing conditions at least. The recommendations in the report are too inadequate to meet the present requirements. What we now want is real democracy. In its absence, we shall be obliged to say that the Allies are supporting in this country with their left hand the very thing which they are rooting out with their right in Europe. Let there be no occasion to say so!

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 16th Nov. 1918.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The Peace Conference.

18. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 22nd February, writes:—The Allies gave their support to President Wilson's fourteen points, because when the war was continuing they were afraid that Germany might win and gain supremacy over the whole world. Now the Allies have become more powerful. The Germans have gone down in power. Hence the thought whether they should still adhere to justice and be controlled by the League of Nations and be one like the rest, giving up the excellent territory which Providence has thrown into their hands. This thought has arisen in the minds of some of the Americans too. It is believed in some quarters that President Wilson has come to to the Peace Conference owing to the fear that his fourteen points might not be adhered to, that he is even ready to give up the friendship with the Allies in case these points are overlooked, that if this should happen the discontented might all unite again and that America, too, might join them, so that eventually truth and justice might be upset. These things are not likely to happen. The British are a democratic nation. The majority of them are just-minded. That is why they won and agreed to Doctor Wilson's terms. We can hardly believe that they have not the foresight to see the calamities that would follow in case they go back on their word.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

The draft constitution for the League of Nations.

19. The Qaumi Report, of the 18th February referring to the subject, observes:—From a cursory glance at the draft it appears that section 19 needs a careful consideration and its effects are beyond imagination. We consider that the draft will become as detestable and difficult in its practical scope as it appears to be interesting and simple on paper, and we are afraid that the ideas of the league cannot attain success while such sections are in force.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

The problem of countries and colonies.

20. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 18th February, in giving an extract from the 19th clause of the League of Nations as regards the future of countries and colonies which requires a careful examination, writes:—The proposal has in view the freedom and benefit of those nations that have been liberated from the yoke of their respective Governments by this war. From this it is quite clear with what courage and ability the League of Nations has taken upon itself the task of securing an everlasting and universal peace.

Every civilized or half civilized nation may choose its own Government and obtain advice in the administration of the country as necessity arises. Uncivilized nations are privileged to enjoy their personal and religious freedom without any interference by any Government. Both friends and foes derive benefit from this law. It contains no favouratism nor anything to prejudice the claims of any. Owing to the difficulty arising in the practical working of this scheme, the President has declared that any secret agreement or peace will not be looked upon by the Peace Conference as legal and binding.

The Turkish nations and the Arab tribes are left the masters of their own destiny. The duty of every civilized nation is to assist its neighbour in its difficulty and in stamping out political unrest. The bond of union that will be created by this arrangement will be an earnest of everlasting and abiding peace in the world.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Northern Russia and its occupation by the Allies.

21. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 19th February, has a leader on the subject written by the British Rear Admiral Camp, a retired officer from Northern Russia, contradicting the views of the majority of the Liberal Party, suggesting the exclusion of the Allies and the withdrawal of their forces from Northern Russia, and remarking that:—Besides the oppressive acts, the vote that will be given in support of the Russian Bolsheviks will, perhaps, be worthy of being called a strong weapon for disturbing the peace of the whole Europe; in which it observes:—"We concur in the experienced officer's views and assert that it will be unsympathetic and unjust on the part of the Liberal Party to strongly support an act calculated to spread further restlessness in Europe."

II.—Home Administration.

(a) Police.

22. The Desabhaktan, of the 24th February, observes:—We are sometimes driven to consider that the British rule is getting to be more and more a police rule. The police in many cases set at naught British righteousness and justice. If the evil acts of the police are then and there brought to the notice of the Government and they are requested to see that the culprits are punished and steps taken to prevent such occurrences, their reply is highly disgusting . . . The Government are still in ignorance of the fact that discontent and unrest are in the increase in India, only on account of the wicked acts frequently committed by many in the Police Department.

The excesses of the police.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

(b) Courts.

23. In a leader in English, the Desabhimani, of the 8th February, takes exception to the extension of the term of this court for another year for the following reasons, viz.: That there is already a temporary Sub-Court which is likely to become permanent in course of time, that the District and Sessions Court of the district has been one of the lightest courts in the Presidency, that litigation has, as a result of the war, appreciably decreased in all courts, that there being no institution of suits or appeals in the additional court, it is no source of revenue and so it does not justify its existence from a financial point of view, and that the existence of an additional court will not facilitate speedy disposal of cases inasmuch as sub-courts are not empowered to receive appeals directly from the parties. The paper then expresses its surprise at the Government finding funds for expenditure like this, while they are pleading want of funds even for applications for small grants for improving village sanitation or village education.

Travelling allowance to civil prisoners on release.

Kerala Sanchari, Calicut, 19th Feb. 1919.

(d) Education.

25. The Vaisyamitran, of the 17th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, the latter portion of an article on this subject in which the following finds place among others:—If our civilization and learning are to be preserved, we should hold views contrary to those of the westerners. What are the several points in which we should differ from them? The foremost is our language. . . If, at the very beginning, we had put a check upon the spread of the English language properly, our vernaculars would have been spared their present predicament. . . There are statistics to prove that India is in a comparatively low condition in point of education; because vernaculars are not the medium of education here. The prohibitive scale of school fees is the chief cause for education not having widely spread in this country at present. It is evident that in former times there was no system of payment of school fees, and students were also getting free boarding at the houses of their teachers who were under the protection and patronage of the benevolent public and of the righteous Government. Further, the fees paid by the poor students are at present expended on several unncessary items. Large sums are being utilised on school buildings and furniture. Sitting on benches is no sine qua non for acquiring knowledge. For Europeans unaccustomed to sit crosslegged, these articles of furniture are indeed necessary, but we had none of them in our ancient pial schools, which are the best suited for our civilization and learning.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

Vernacular schools.

26. The Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd February, says:—Principal Vaswani (sic) has stated clearly in the New Times that if national reconstruction is to be effected, education should be imparted through the medium of vernaculars. An education that has not for its foundation the ancient civic and literary traditions will not help on the development of the nation. Such an education will separate the educated from the masses. Only vernacular schools can help to encourage the vernacular languages and literature.

MUKHBIR-I-DAKHAN, Madras, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Madras University and the educated Mussalmans.

27. The Mukhbir-i-Dakhan, of the 12th February, has a lengthy leader on the marginally-noted subject which is briefly to this effect:—In our opinion the University is in need of oriental scholars in connexion with Arabic, Persian, and Urdu. The paper, in commenting at length in support of this assertion, speaks highly of the attainments of Moulvi Muhammad Abdur Rahman Shatir, and thinks that his opinion will prove beneficial as regards those languages in prescribing texts for the curriculum. Hence requests the Government to appoint him a Fellow of the University.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 16th Feb. 1919.

The Muhammadans and the question of Khalipate.

28. The Qaumi Report, of the 16th February, referring to the following announcement made by His Excellency Sir George Lloyd at a Darbar held at Karachi on the 14th February, viz.:—"The Muhammadans will necessarily be very uneasy with regard to the safety of their holy places. I have discussed this subject with the Viceroy, and I can assure you that the Government of India will take up your cause and place your views before the Peace Conference," writes:—The entire Muhammadan community is indebted to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay for his promise, but it is regrettable to find that His Excellency the Viceroy did not mention a word in the opening speech of the Council regarding this matter, but he dwelt at length in his speech in discussing and supporting European rights. It seems that His Excellency Sir George Lloyd, the Governor of Bombay, bears real sympathy with the Muhammadan and probably the reason for it is what he expressed at the Darbar, viz., "I have spent a great portion of my life in Islamic countries."

The question of the Islamic territories is not purely a political one, on the other hand it includes secular Islamic rights as well.

It should be the duty of the Peace Conference to have regard to the political and religious aspects of Turkey, and it should decide in a manner calculated to meet the approval of the Islamic world.

(e) Local and Municipal.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Corporation.

29. Observing that the European members of the Madras Corporation are said to have resigned their membership, because the objection raised in the recent sessions of the local Legislative Council by the Hon'ble Mr. Thonger and others to the provision in the Madras City Municipal Bill prohibiting contractors with the Corporation from being members thereof, was not accepted either by the Government or by Indian representative members, the Swadesamitran, of the 19th February, observes:—If the Director of any Company doing contract business with the Corporation happens to be a member of the Corporation it is but natural for him to look to the interests of the Company. So it was decided that such persons should not be members of the Corporation and a similar rule is in vogue even in Bombay and Calcutta. The contention of the Europeans, however, appears to be that they should not continue to be members of the Corporation, while their party was not supported by the Government. Is this not passive resistance? The moment the Indians think of resorting to this policy, they are condemned by many Europeans. The lessons to be learnt by our people from this action of the European members are twofold.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the same incident the Hindu Nesan, of the 20th February, remarks:—A good precedent has now been created for the Indian members of the Corporation and of the Legislative Councils, so as to enable them to follow, under similar circumstances, the example of the European members of the Corporation.

Adverting to the same subject with regret, the Desabhaktan, of the 20th February, observes:—What have the Anglo-Indian papers now got to say about the mean nature betrayed by the European members of the Corporation? Does not the nature of these Anglo-Indians, who always boast of their interest in India's progress, become patent by this act of theirs? Will the meetings of the Corporation come to a standstill on account of the resignation of these European members? Never. The Anglo-Indians in Madras are very few in number, while they have a large number of representatives for them in the Corporation. Madras is deriving ten times as much good from the European members of the Corporation as India from the Anglo-Indian members on the Legislative Councils!

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Corporation.

The Lokopakari, of the 24th February, comments almost in the same strain as the Swadesamitran, of the 19th idem, about the resignation of the European members on this body.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

Village panchayats.

30. The Panchayat, for August-September 1918, suggests that the Government should, by means of legislation, authorise village panchayats to dispose of civil suits in respect of sums below a specified amount, and remarks that this will not only make the ryots abide by the decisions of the panchayats, but will also induce the panchayats to be specially persevering in and enthusiastic over their work.

PANCHAYAT, Trichinopoly, Aug.-Sep. 1918.

To-day's meeting of the Corporation.

31. The Andhrapatrika, of the 20th February, says:—Diwan Bahadur Tyagaroya Chetti is to move in the meeting of the Corporation for an address to be presented to His Excellency the Governor on the eve of his departure from this city to England. Putting aside the question of ordinary administration, if we can see anything that His Excellency has done for the promotion of local self-government the Corporation will be justified in presenting him with a farewell address. The representatives of the people in the Legislative Council desired that the settlement of the question of local self-government should be left to the assemblies of the people's representatives to be formed after the introduction of the reform scheme and that the new City Municipal Bill might be suspended. But the Madras Government proceeded with the Bill. The amendments which the representatives proposed have been almost all rejected. The rejection of the proposal that Government property should not be exempted from municipal taxation and the acceptance of the proposal of Mr. Spring that no tax should be imposed on the buildings belonging to the Port Trust have resulted in a loss of Rs. $2\frac{1}{2}$ lakhs to the municipality. While the authority of the President to be elected by the Corporation has been made only nominal, arbitrary powers will be vested in the Commissioner to be appointed by the Government. Doctor Nayar himself, who may be said to be the right hand of Mr. Tyagaroya Chetti, opposed the provisions of the Bill, and suggested the introduction of a new Bill by the people after the introduction of the reforms. The Justice and the Andhra-prakasika have strongly criticised the Bill and the attitude of the authorities. It is a wonder that while the defeat of the representatives of the people in regard to the Municipal Bill are still fresh in our minds, Diwan Bahadur Tyagaroya Chetti proposes the presentation of an address to His Excellency. Again, the medical aid given by the Government while influenza was raging in the country was not satisfactory at all. The indifference of the Government towards Indian medicine is quite plain. It is needless to write much about the ordinary administration of the country by His Excellency the Governor. Our readers know about it quite well. We could not yet forget the contempt with which he treated the question of Home Rule in the session of the Legislative Council held in May 1917, the G.O. No. 559, which is aimed at students, the internment of Mrs. Besant and others, the stopping of the addresses of political bodies on the occasion of Mr. Montagu's visit, the Madura troubles, the scant courtesy he shows to the representatives of the people in the local Legislative Council, the disallowing of many resolutions being discussed, etc., are no indications of a liberal administration. It is hardly necessary to dwell on the development of the misunderstanding between the Brahmans and the non-Brahmans. The calumny against political agitators, which appears in the report on the administration of Madras, has provoked the indignation of the whole Presidency. In the last meeting of the Legislative Council, the Hon'ble Mr. Narasimha Ayyar asked for an opportunity to discuss the matters contained in this report. His request having been rejected Mr. Ayyar had to leave the meeting. The non-official members requested that the Collectors should be vested with discretionary powers to exempt very poor ryots from the expenses of removing the diseased plants. But His Excellency the Governor rejected the proposal with his casting vote. He also set at naught the unanimous resolution of the Corporation to stop the Park Fair this year. Under such circumstances, it will not be in keeping with public opinion and the self-respect of the people that the Corporation should accept the resolution of Mr. Chetti.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

The paper then quotes a passage from the Indian Patriot which attributes a motive to Mr. Chetti in proposing the presentation of an address to His Excellency.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

The European Commissioners and passive resistance.

32. The Andhrapatrika, of the 20th February, refers to the rejection of the resolution recommending the removal from the Municipal Bill the rule that those who are connected with municipal contracts should not be members of the Council and writes:—It appears that the European Commissioners resented this fair proposition and resigned their membership. It cannot but be strange that the Anglo-Indians who resort to passive resistance without caring for the welfare of the people, whenever their interests are at stake, should teach morals to others. The Indians should particularly note the persistency with which the Europeans accomplish their object.

(h) Railways.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Railway administration.

33. Adverting to a booklet by Mr. S. C. Ghose dealing with Indian railway fares recently published by the Government of India, the Hindu Nesan, of the 21st February, observes:—Mr. Ghose has clearly pointed out in his book, by comparing the rates of freight obtaining in various railways, that these rates are highly favourable for foreign trade and quite unfavourable to the progress of the trade of this country. For instance, in the case of foreign sugar arriving at Indian ports, the Indian Railways charge special rates for its transport besides taking the responsibility for all risk and damage during transit, while Indian sugar receives quite a different treatment at the hands of the Railway authorities. It is patent from the reports published by Government that jaggery is a foodstuff for Indians and the poor people take to it largely. The railway freight on this, however, far exceeds that on foreign sugar. The price of jaggery is in consequence enhanced with the result that the difficulties of the people increase. Not only sugar but also other commodities, such as oil seeds and flour, suffer on account of this partial treatment by the Railway authorities. Similarly, the freights on the raw products of this country intended for export to foreign countries are easy enough; so also the fares on these materials when they are received back in the shape of manufactured articles. These rates have been so fixed only with a view to crush the industry and trade of this country. Can this partiality be tolerated in any other country? This is punishable under the Railway Act in force in England. Though the Indian Railways Act has been enacted on the basis of the English Act, and the phraseology in both is the same, still there is difference between the two in the matter of this partial treatment. Mr. Ghose's book serves to afford information as to the particular points in respect of which amendments are needed in the Indian Railways Act. The defects and drawbacks pointed out in this booklet are sufficient to urge the necessity of making the Indians the proprietors of the Indian railways.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The Indian Railway administration.

Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 22nd February, says:—The income of the Railways in 1916–1917 itself was deemed to be unusual. In 1917–1918 the income increased by 14 crores. . . It is plain that all the profits that the Railways have earned have been from the third-class passengers.

It will, under such circumstances, be fair on the part of the Railway authorities or the Railway Board to provide the third-class travelling public with conveniences proportionate to the increase of rates at least. But the sufferings of the third-class passengers are beyond description. . . They are not provided with clean waiting rooms at the Railway stations. They do not have water and food conveniences at many places. The practice of allowing more than the fixed number of passengers in the third-class compartments is a source of indescribable trouble to the passengers going long distances. Mr. Gandhi, who personally witnessed their troubles, has given a heart-rending description of the same. There is no use gloating over the fact that the profits from Railways have increased. The Railway authorities have to see that they have duties corresponding to profits. It is unjust on their part to fail to discharge them. If the lot of the third-class passengers is to improve and the administration of railways to become efficient, the Government should take the management of railways into their hands, as has long been suggested by the representatives of the people. . . All those exercising authority over the Railway companies are in England. They do not know the grievances of the Indian passengers. So long as they get large profits, they will not see to the redress of the grievances, even though they may be represented to them. The Railway Board appointed to superintend the administration of Railways have not been able to discharge their duties. It is necessary that the Railways are handed over to the management of the Government now that self-government is at hand. The Parliamentary Committee has to consider this question along with the question of political reforms. . . The Railway Board is intending to construct 3,708 miles of railways in India after the war. But we recommend to Government to spend more money on irrigation than on Railway, as a safeguard against famine.

(j) Salt and Abkāri.

The drink evil.

34. In describing the measures adopted by the western countries, especially America, to put an end to this evil, there, the Desabhaktan, of the 21st February, observes:—The measures adopted by our Government to minimise this evil are very curious. The authorities are under the illusion that drinking can be curtailed by increasing the taxes thereon, by auctioning liquor shops, by reducing their number and by slightly raising the price of liquor. It is no doubt true that many toddy shops have thereby been converted into restaurants. But the abkāri revenue continues to increase greatly year after year and so also the consumption of liquor. Thus the authorities are in reality encouraging this evil all the time boasting that they are endeavouring to check it. Attempts to minimise drinking can never succeed. The authorities should begin to root it out, but as a preliminary to this, they should be prepared to forego the large revenue from this source.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

(k) General.

The Madras Legislative Council.

35. Referring to the change in the date of the presentation of the Budget before the Council, the Sirtiruttam, of the 5th February, remarks that the Government are, either on account of their fear for or sympathy with the political agitators, introducing certain petty changes, which are not productive of any good to the people, and, apprehending that this affects the regard the people have for Government, observes:—The withdrawal of most of the resolutions moved by the non-official members indicates want of careful consideration on their part. Such resolutions are brought forward merely to win popularity and fame among the masses. Neither the Government nor the members of the Council paid sufficient attention to several salient points, to the question of high prices of foodstuffs and to the condition of labourers, and this is due to the fact that suitable representative members are not on the Council. The subjects at present dealt with by the representative members lack the support of the people. The Government will not be against those proposals which have such a support. So we urge that, to obtain this support, the education of the masses should be improved and the Honourable Members should make tours in their electorates.

Sirtiruttam, Madura, 5th Feb. 1919.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Feb. 1919.

The Lokopakari, of the 17th February, echoes almost the same sentiments as those expressed by the Desabhaktan, of the 8th idem, and abstracted in the last paragraph on page 229 of Report No. 7 of 1919, regretting the failure on the part of the Government to render pecuniary aid for village sanitation as proposed by the Hon'ble Mr. K. Rama Ayyangar at the last meeting of the Provincial Legislative Council.

SOURASHTRA, Madura, 15th Feb. 1919.

The Sourashtras.

36. The Sourashtra, of the 15th February, while advocating the cause of the Saurashtra community, makes the following observations:—A very large majority of this community are uneducated, though they are paying numerous taxes to the Government. The number of employees under Government from among this community is also very limited, and even these get very low salaries. This is due to the indifference of the higher authorities towards those getting poor salaries and the caste distinctions observed by them. This deserves prompt attention at the hands of the Government.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The Bolsheviks and India.

37. The Swadesamitran, of the 19th February, contains the following:—According to the news from Moscow received by the Evening Standard, it is said that Russian Extremists called the 'Bolsheviks' propose to invade India in a body with a view to cause a revolution here. . . There are also many Indians among these Russian Extremists and they were staying in Germany before. The Indian authorities are hereby warned to be on the alert.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Present Indian political position.

38. The Dravidan, of the 19th February, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Justice of the 18th idem, under this heading, declaring both the Congress League Scheme and the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals to be unworkable.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Indian reforms.

39. Adverting to the criticisms passed on the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme of reforms in this country, the Hindu Nesan, of the 19th February, observes:—The course of events in England and the attempts of persons hostile to the interests of India afford us no reasons to feel buoyant in our spirits. The announcement in the London Times, which maintains friendly relations with the authorities and which may be considered to represent almost the views of the Government, that the reforms proposed in the Montagu-Chelmsford report will not be accepted as they are, blights all our hopes. Different political parties in India attempt to send to Enland their representatives to acquaint the British public with their own views in the matter of reforms. If the British people hear such divergent views in regard to Indian administration, they will only become confused and get staggered. The efforts of all will become futile and the contentions of those in England who are hostile to India's welfare will appear to be true. It is said that a committee from among the members of the two Houses of Parliament will be entrusted with the question of deciding the Indian administrative reforms. This committee will sit in England, and it is rare to find in England people who can advise the committee in the interests of India. People mostly to be found there are the retired officials from India, ex-Governors and old merchants and capitalists. Consider how far the reforms to be effected in consultation with these will be favourable to India. Let our moderate friends who were gaping wide expecting that all kinds of benefits would be secured by the Montagu Chelmsford reforms, ponder over the present situation.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Rice from Rangoon.

40. Adverting to the observation of a correspondent to Justice, that the Controller of Foodstuffs has acted improperly and partially in having issued permits to five European companies for purchasing from Rangoon about 12,000 tons of rice and allowed fifty Indian merchants who have already registered their names to export and distribute among themselves only about 8,500 tons, the Dravidan, of the 19th February, remarks:—It is essential that the Controller should, without making any invidious distinction among the merchants, issue the same kind of permission to every one of them.

Sedition and how to root it out.

41. Quoting Lord Bacon's words that, if the trend of the times shows signs of disloyalty, its causes, namely, extreme poverty and discontent should be removed, by such means as the curtailment of unnecessay expenditure, improvement of agriculture and industries and the regulation of the prices of articles, the Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, observes :—The administration of a country depends on the King and his subjects. If the King carries on a righteous administration according to the wishes of the subjects, the latter will lead the life of loyal citizens. If, on the other hand, he oppresses them, they will become disloyal. Disloyalty is thus engendered by the cruel acts of a ruler. On account of a foolish act of the King, it is usual for the subjects to suffer the pinch of poverty and take to seditious acts out of discontent. It is poverty that is the cause of sedition and anarchism. The best way for rooting out sedition is to redress the grievances of the subjects as pointed out by Bacon. It will be foolishness to resort to repressive measures for putting down sedition, as this will be only 'adding fuel to fire'. Most of the Indians are dissatisfied with the rule of the bureaucrats, because of their cruel deeds. It is to get rid of completely this rule of the bureaucrats and to obtain self-government under the British Empire, that the popular leaders have been making efforts for the last 35 years. All those that agitate to get rid of the bureaucratic administration so as to avoid any discredit attaching to the British Empire, are characterised by a high sense of loyalty. What to say of the bureaucrats who consider these to be seditionists and go on enacting cruel laws to put them down ? Ever since the commencement of the European war, poverty, disease and lootings are on the increase in India. Those benevolent persons, who witness these, agitate within constitutional limits for obtaining a responsible form of Government with a view to relieve the hardships of the poor. The bureaucrats attempt to curb them. When the Rowlatt Bills become law and begin to harass the popular leaders, who can prophesy what the condition of these bureaucrats in India will be ? As the actions of the bureaucrats in India are contrary to British justice, we fear that these, if permitted to continue, will indeed injure the British Empire. We put the bureaucrats in mind of the story of the wild beasts which were freely roaming in the forests delightfully suddenly becoming a prey to the fire caused by a thicket of bamboos. Let the bureaucrats do whatever they like. We shall serve our mother Bharata without causing any injury to the British rule and without fearing for and obeying the cruel laws of the bureaucrats.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The lesson from the late Mr. Gokhale.

42. Referring to the words of warning said to have been given to the Government often by Mr. Gokhale to the effect that it is improper for the Government to discard public opinion, the Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, observes :—The authorities have proposed to disregard this warning and stifle the spirit of liberty in the Indians by cruel repressive measures. Administration is still carried on with great distrust. The Government are thus attempting to increase the discontent and unrest among the people, but how far can this be considered to be a proper administrative policy ?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The Madras Mail and the Hon'ble Mr. B. C. Mitter.

43. Adverting to the fact that the Madras Mail invites the attention of those opposing the Rowlatt Bills to the remarks of the Hon'ble Mr. B. C. Mitter, the Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, observes:—We can understand the rare qualities and greatness of the Hon'ble Mr. B. C. Mitter without the assistance of the Madras Mail. We know him as a member of the Rowlatt Committee and every one knows what value should be given to his views, inasmuch as he has opined in the same way as the other members on that Committee. This Anglo-Indian paper asks us to note Mr. Mitter's statement that, as a result of the operation of the Defence of India Act, murders and thefts have decreased in Bengal. Even granting this to be the case, is not Mr. Mitter aware that it is only consequent on this Act that many innocents have been kept in custody and their families made to despond in misery ? Or, is he feigning ignorance ? Let the Madras Mail content itself with the opinion of Mr. Mitter. The Indian subjects will not pay heed to them at present.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

British India and Native States.

44. Referring with satisfaction to the progress made in Travancore in different directions as detailed in the opening speech of the Diwan at the session of the Srimulam assembly, the Hindu Nesan, of the 19th February, remarks that the value of this progress can be appreciated only by the Indians who feel the pinch on account of the absence of such progress in British India, and regrets that the efforts made in Mysore and Travancore for relieving the distress caused to the people by the scarcity of foodstuffs are not made in this Presidency.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 17th Feb. 1919.

A call to the youths of India.

45. Referring to the proposal that the allied countries will take over the control of all the industries handled by the enemy countries in India before the war, and to the fact that Japan is capturing the trade of this country in all possible ways. the Vaisyamitran, of the 17th February, observes:—What do you propose to do in these circumstances? Those who have been governing you for the last 160 years have, without the least consideration for the general good of India, been making India only a market for the whole world. Your ancient industries, unable to stand foreign competition, have all perished. India has not the capital necessary to start factories. It is not known how she is to fare in the question that the colonies should contribute to the Imperial war loan rateably. The Viceroy states that 100 lakhs of rupees are needed for the soldiers who served in the war. The Indians are now suffering ten times more than what they suffered during the war for want of foodstuffs, and there appears to be no means to relieve this suffering. No attempt has been made in our Indian Universities for industrial education and for scientific training in practical chemistry being given to us, and we have to expect industrial experts from foreign countries to give us the required training. We cannot even dream that these will teach us the industries wholeheartedly. Further you have to depend on the foreigners for all the machines you require. How will it be possible for you to reform and progress all on a sudden, while you have to depend upon others for everything? Have you the power to prevent the foreigners from capturing the Indian industries until you get reformed? Will the Government come forward to give you an assurance that they will guard your interests till then? It behoves you to work unremittingly in the cause of the country's progress without depending on others for help.

INDIA MITRAN, Madras. 19th Feb. 1919.

India's claim to war indemnity.

46. Remarking that, if any rateable distribution of indemnity is to be made according to the expenditure incurred by each country towards the war, India cannot be denied a share in it, the India Mitran, of the 19th February, observes:—Articles to the value of 150 crores of rupees are being exported from India every year. If the allied countries had purchased all the materials needed for the war from India at the enhanced prices, their expenditure would have swelled very largely. India has supplied plentifully the allied countries and the Indian troops in Mesopotamia with munitions for the war. By purchasing them at prewar rates the allies have gained to the extent of 120 crores of rupees. In other words in this matter alone India has foregone all this profit in view to help the British Empire. Further she has given a free contribution of 150 crores of rupees for the war, besides purchasing a portion of the British loans and sending ten lakhs of men to the field. As India has rendered help to such an extent, we trust that the British will not fail to see that she gets justice, when the question of indemnity is taken up for consideration.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

The censorship.

47. Referring to the words of Mr. Bonar Law in the House of Commons in connexion with the censorship of newspapers, the Swadesamitram, of the 20th February, observes:—We were deceived in our expectations that the allied countries would also follow President Wilson when he said recently that he had issued orders to discontinue censorship of communications to newspapers. We can safely infer from the words of Mr. Bonar Law that the public can get news only after being passed by the censor. This is likely to create misapprehension in the minds of the people. At a time when matters have to be publicly discussed without any reserve, we fail to see why the British are endeavouring to retain the censoring bother. We can say the sooner the authorities change their views, the greater will be the benefit.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

Are we fit for swaraj?

48. The Desabhaktan, of the 20th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, a long article under this heading, in which he quotes several instances to prove the fitness of the Indians for swaraj and in which the following observations find place among others:—The duties of one country cannot be satisfactorily discharged by the people of another country. It cannot be fully believed that the English people who hold their country to be different from a dependency of theirs will ever govern the two countries with the same principle and love. A little consideration of the benefits they have conferred on us and the facilities they have yet to afford us is quite sufficient to prove this statement. . . The British are well aware of the great mischief caused to them by the Romans in ancient days, and for them to repeat the same mistake here only betrays want of wisdom on their part. They recruited some Indians only for the purposes of the war which is now coming to a close, but in reality they have no mind to train the Indians as sepoys. Similarly in several administrative matters, they have not got a hearty desire to give us a training. . . It is simply ignorance to declare that we are not fit for Home Rule. . . Laying aside all the assurances given by Queen Victoria and her successors, they coax us and satisfy us by sweet words. The majority of the authorities recruit inexperienced youths with mere theoretical knowledge from England, Canada and Australia and appoint them as officers over experienced Indian officials. . . Very few of the English officers in this country take an interest in India's welfare and care to acquaint themselves with the conditions of the Indians. Even these few leave this country after a time and in their place fresh youths arrive to eke out a living and to acquaint themselves with the State secrets and laws. But no attempt seems to be made to carry on the work with the help of the talent available in India alone. . . Has any Englishmen of the stamp of Sir Seshadri Ayyar, Sir Salar Jang, Madhava Rao, Dutt, Gupta, Gokhale and Mehta set foot on Indian soil? . . . It is certain that there are thousands of such capable men in India. . . It is not that the English are unaware of all this; but their selfish fear that, in case they openly admit this fact, they would be required to appoint a larger number of Indians to eminent posts which will make many of the English people leave India in quest of employment, that blinds these people. Further, their arrogance that all dark-skinned persons are low in civilization, prevents them from recognising our real worth. . . The reforms effected in Japan during the last fifty years are sufficient to disprove the argument that darkskinned people are unfit for Home Rule.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

The Indian leaders.

49. In commenting upon the work in England of the several deputations to proceed from India shortly in connexion with reforms, the Desabhaktan, of the 21st February, states:—Popular leaders in India are at present at loggerheads with one another and are reviling each other without shame. The bureaucrats have gained their object. What else can we say except this, when we see the leaders differing from one another at a time the benefits from their united agitation are expected? . . . By the time the representatives from the Congress, the Home Rule League and the moderate party return to India with the reforms for relieving her bondage, there is no doubt that the Rowlatt Bills will be passed into law and ruin India. Our prayer is that a few of the nationalist leaders who have decided to go to England should stay in India at present. The bureaucrats are now ready to grant permission to any number of persons desirous of going to England. The leaders should act drawing their own inferences from this. They should adjust their actions so as to suit the trend of the times and the devices of the bureaucrats. They should not get themselves beguiled by the acts of these bureaucrats.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

The Indian Legislative Councils.

50. The Desabhaktan, of the 21st February, observes:—It is within our experience that the Government turn only a deaf ear to the representations of the Indian members on these councils. When once the official members come to a decision on a particular subject, any amount of argument by the representative members to prove that the views of the Government are wrong, will not correct them. Interpellations by these members on matters connected with public interest, only elicit some irrelevant replies from the Government. We ask Sir William Vincent himself, if he has given a suitable reply to the interpellation by Khan Bahadur Asad Ali Khan at the last session of the Imperial Legislative Council, whether the reports of the Reforms Committees will be published for the information of the public, and whether permission will be accorded for discussion on the Reforms Bill in this Council before it is introduced in the Parliament. Do not the Government of India know whether it is in their power or not to permit the discussion of the Reforms Bill in the Imperial Legislative Council? Why should they not give any definite assurance on this point? We doubt very much if they replied in this strain without realising their responsibility. It has thus become a practice with the Government of India to give such evasive replies. They boldly say in answer to interpellations by non-official members on matters connected with Provincial Governments that they are quite in the dark about them, and cannot interfere with their actions. What purpose is served by the existence of such Councils? When is the day to dawn for altering the constitution of these Councils in such a way as to make them pay heed to the grievances of the people's representatives?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Legislative Councils.

The Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, a communication in which the following finds place among others:—If any laws for relieving the difficulties of the people have to be enacted and that at the instance of the non-official members, the official party are quite ready to thwart such an attempt and are bent upon doing so; but if laws hampering the liberties of the people have to be enacted, they can be passed at any time. . . None of the non-official members spoke in support of the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar, when the latter left the Council Chamber for some time on the first day, for our representative members lack the courage to secede from the Council which is making attempts to crush us. A deep consideration of the proceedings in the Legislative Councils shows that the condition of the members therein is no better than that of bondslaves. Their suggestions are seldom cared for or accepted. . . The law is ready to put down the person that attempts to explain the nature of liberty enjoyed by the Indians. When there are no means to set right these matters, and to criticise the defects therein, we fail to see the purpose served by the Legislative Councils consisting of representative members.

PANCHAYAT, Trichinopoly, Aug.-Sep. 1918.

Grazing grounds for cattle.

51. The Panchayat, reverting to this subject in its issue for August-September 1918, calls on the mirasidars, agriculturists, panchayats and the public in the villages to hold meetings and request the Government to revoke their recent order on this subject as it will be an obstacle to the progress of the villagers, besides causing inconvenience to the agriculturists and hardships to the public. It also adds that, in Mysore, permission has been accorded for raising fodder crops on lands adjoining tankbeds and asks why the Government of Madras alone should act in this manner.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Farewell address to His Excellency Lord Pentland.

52. Referring to the proposal of Diwan Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar, that a farewell address should be presented to His Excellency Lord Pentland by the Corporation of Madras, the Hindu Nesan, of the 21st February, observes:—It is still green in the memories of the members of the Corporation how Lord Pentland and his party slighted and rejected their repeated suggestions in regard to the City Municipal Bill, and how they unanimously opposed the persistent contentions of the members of the Corporation on the Legislative Council to carry out certain alterations and amendments in the Bill. To say that the Corporation should pay some tribute of honour to the gentleman who treated them in this fashion, will only be worshipping the feet that kicked. We do not think that all the people in this province will endorse the view of Mr. Chettiyar that Lord Pentland has striven hard to develop its resources. As it is well to avoid here unpleasant scenes like those that recently occurred in Bombay in connexion with a farewell address to the Governor of that province, we suggest that Mr. Chettiyar would, instead of proposing that the Corporation should present an address, arrange for an address being presented by a party holding views similar to his own.

The condition of the labourers.

53. The Swadesamitran, of the 21st February, observes:—The Indian labourers are not inattentive to the happenings in regard to the labour movement in the western countries. Union among labourers is growing strong here also. The authorities here should begin to attend to the benefits of the labourers so as to avoid any struggle between the labourers and the capitalists as in the western countries.

Mr. Norton's reminiscences.

54. The Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, reproduces in Tamil Mr. Eardley Norton's 'reminiscences' in the Looker-On, containing among others his opinion on the work of the Congress and the attitude of the old and the present day officials towards it.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Englishmen and swaraj for India.

55. The Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, publishes an article under this heading from the pen of a correspondent, in which he says that it is in the interests of India, which has become impoverished, that she should be linked with a great power for some time and that England is the power suited for this purpose and, remarking that the colonies are the best proof of countries having gradually acquired strength under the protection of England, makes the following observations among others:—The colonies themselves have demonstrated to India that it is not sedition to aspire for swaraj and make the necessary efforts. There is therefore no harm in demanding that the Royal family of England should be considered to be the Royal family of India and that all appointments should be conferred only on persons who will be helpful to the people. If some officials illtreat those who make this demand strenuously, they are acting illegally. It will connote manliness only if we make a bold, though constitutional, demand for swaraj, without being ruffled by hardships and it is meanness on the part of one to give up one's right, for fear of the punishment unjustly inflicted by the authorities. . . As for the attitude of the British Parliament towards this question of swaraj, both the parties therein would like India only to remain where she is. This is the nature of officials everywhere, and they care only for the administration being conducted easily. Even in England, any public good has had to be obtained only after a struggle for it, and, as such, it is no wonder the Ministers in England are not inclined to grant swaraj to far-off India, which does not send its representatives. Even the petty concessions now enjoyed by the Indians have been obtained only in this manner. If pressure is brought to bear upon the Government through the friends of India, the authorities will, to satisfy the people, appoint a commission, comprising some among themselves, to inquire about the demands and this commission will take some years to do its work. If, by the time this work is finished, the people become quiet, the authorities will drop the question altogether. If, on the other hand, they find the people still awake, they will grant some concessions, which will not meet even half the demands. But all the same they are afraid to express openly that they are against the efforts made in any country to acquire swaraj. . . The Labour party no doubt sympathise with the efforts made by India to improve her condition and are doing their best to draw the attention of Parliament to the high-handed acts of the officials in India. Though this may not benefit India immediately, it will, of course, be useful to her in course of time. But the House of Lords always stands by the bureaucrats in India, in the matter of the progress of the country. The reason for this is nothing but the almost hereditary claim which the members of this House have for governorships in India.

A public meeting.

56. The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, publish in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting held in Gokhale Hall in Madras on the 18th idem, when Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal delivered a lecture on the 'Delhi Congress and after.'

SWADESAMITRAN & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

A public meeting in Madras.

The Desabhaktan and the Swadesamitran, of the 24th February, publish in Tamil the proceedings of an open air meeting held on the Triplicane Beach, Madras, on the 23rd idem, to protest against the Rowlatt Bills, in which Mr. B. C. Pal is reported to have delivered an address, after passing of the usual resolutions calling on the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council to dissociate themselves from these Bills, and the popular leaders to begin to agitate.

DESABHAKTAN & SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

57. The Swadesamitran, of the 22nd February, observes:—Rangoon rice cannot be had anywhere in the Presidency for the price fixed by the Director of Civil Supplies. The importers are required to charge a profit not exceeding 8 annas per bag. If they are so sold, what makes the purchasers from these importers charge three or four rupees in addition for each bag. If our report is true, this is what actually takes place. The Director's order is binding only on the importers but not on others. Between these importers and mufassal merchants there was already a broker who was including in the invoice his commission at the rate of 1½ per cent. But now many brokers have sprung up, and each of them gets a profit of at least 8 annas per bag, and all this has to be borne only by the consumer. Sir Claud Hill, while speaking in the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council on the 19th instant, admitted that the prices of articles had gone up unduly high and attributed it to the situation caused by the war. We are unable to accept this. The present high prices seem to be due to the licences and certificates given by the Director of Civil Supplies. Licences are not freely issued to all the applicants but are issued only to those importing not less than 200 tons of rice which cost about Rs. 25,000. The import trade is thereby being monopolised only by a few. Why not the importers sell by bags in retail for the price prescribed by the Director? Why cannot this condition be insisted on when the licence is granted? . . . The authorities without according permission for getting paddy hulled in any of the mills in the districts of Tanjore, Gōdāvari, etc., have directed that only certain mills should be so utilized. This enables them to favour certain mills in preference to others, and the mill authorities to obtain this favour will have to take much trouble, and on whom will this tell? Is the quantity of paddy produced in the districts of Tanjore and Gōdāvari sufficient to leave a surplus for export to other places, after meeting their own demands? Are statistics of the harvest available? On what basis was the price fixed? Will either the Director or the Government enlighten us on these points? Though we should feel grateful to the Government for having attempted to regulate the prices, still the results do not justify our feeling grateful. The only benefit is that the prices have risen higher than what they were. If steps had been taken for reporting the retail prices prevalent in various places, it would have become clear then and there that the existing arrangements were not adequate to produce the desired effect. The authorities should note that it has become necessary to completely revise the present arrangements. One word about the scarcity of kerosene oil. No supply has been received from America. The charges for getting the oil from Burma appear to have become heavy, because of the coal difficulty. If immediate attention is not paid to this, the poor people will be under the impression that the merchants are harassing them and that the Government are winking at their ways.

The same paper publishes an article contributed on this subject by a correspondent, which contains the following observations among others:—The Director of Civil Supplies only fixes the prices at which articles should be sold, but he does not appear to inquire whether these are actually in force in the market. Otherwise there is no reason for the existence of such differences. Many are of opinion that the appointment of the Director is in itself the main cause of the heavy rise in the prices. We cannot say how far this may be true; but such a feeling is prevalent not only in Madras but throughout the Presidency. At present the prices of all foodstuffs have risen very high and the hardships of the masses are indescribable. If at this time the Government fail to see whether their orders as regards the regulation of prices are being obeyed, what can the poor people do? It is necessary that, hereafter at least, the Director should publish a weekly list of those people in the Presidency to whom permission has been granted to get rice from elsewhere, stating therein the quantities that can be so obtained and actually received by them together, with the quantity sold and the rate at which it is sold during the week. It will then be impossible for any one to raise the prices of articles.

The food situation.

Remarking that, though the food situation of this Presidency has not yet improved, the Government of India are prepared only to curtail the export of rice and other foodstuffs and not to prohibit it altogether, the Hindu Nesan, of the 24th February, observes that, under existing conditions in this Presidency, it is very necessary not only to prevent the articles produced here being taken to other places but also to afford facilities for grains being freely brought into the Presidency from other places and adds:—The prospect of the crop is not very encouraging not only here but even in Bengal and Burma, the two provinces which have been supplying us. It is regrettable at this juncture that even the Government should be unaware of the exact stock on hand in this Presidency. Under these circumstances, it is a great mistake to allow grains to be exported from here. Of course the Government of India have stated that the question of export will be regulated after ascertaining the needs of every province and other facilities and the stock on hand. The people are entitled to be informed of the figures on which the Government base their action.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The paper then attributes the present rise in the price of rice to the action of the Director of Civil Supplies in fixing the price of rice at the delta tracts of the Gōdāvari and the Kistna and says:—The natural conclusion of the people will be that he has fixed this price, with a knowledge of the stock on hand, and the merchants will therefore go on increasing the price, as the stock goes down. The only way of remedying the situation will be to adopt the suggestions made by us.

The Lokopakari, of the 24th February, also refers to the hardships suffered by the people on account of the abnormal rise in the prices of foodstuffs and points out that the authorities are not taking any steps to see that articles are sold for the prices notified in the Gazette. It observes that poverty can never prevail in a country, if the Government deem it their duty to see that all their subjects have equal status.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

Political parties in India.

58. The Dravidan, of the 22nd February, reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Justice under this heading in its issue of the 21st idem regretting the existence of numerous political parties in India and observing that the Parliament cannot be easily convinced that the people who oppose the Rowlatt Bills which have been introduced obviously for the maintenance of peace in the country, can be entrusted with the control of the Government of India.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

Mr. Tilak's case.

59. Referring, with regret, to the news that Mr. Tilak's case against Sir Valentine Chirol was dismissed with costs, the Desabhaktan, of the 24th February, remarks:—How can the soul force and veracity of Mr. Tilak become perceptible in England which is steeped in materialism?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

Mr. Tilak's case.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th February, says that if the news that Mr. Tilak has not won his case in England against Sir Valentine Chirol, many cannot but be disappointed.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The future of India.

60. Adverting to the unionist majority in the new House of Commons and observing that gentlemen sympathising with India such as Messrs. Ramsay Macdonald and Philip Snowdon have not been returned to this House, the Desabhaktan, of the 24th February, writes:—There is reason to think that the present British Cabinet will uphold the views contained in pronouncement of August 1917. But the Indians will never get satisfied, unless the assurance is completely fulfilled. People regard Mr. Lloyd George as dear as life, because he discharged the duties connected with the war efficiently. But as the Unionists form the majority in the Commons, and as there are many outside the House still smarting under a sense of disappointment, it is feared that the influence of Mr. Lloyd George will soon wane away. If such a contingency should arise, what will be the lot of India? The head of the Nationalist party has spoken in Parliament to the effect that either England should decide the Irish question or the Irish themselves should apply to the Peace Conference and obtain self-determination. In view of these words, we have to infer that the British political condition will not be favourable to us. If even the State of Ireland should be such as it is, we have to feel anxious about the lot of India. We, however, trust that the British Government will act in such a way as to suit the trend of times.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the statement of one fully acquainted with the affairs in England made in the Amrita Bazaar Patrika to the effect that though the Labour party have not succeeded, as they anticipated, they will be in the opposition and always favour India, the Desabhaktan, of the 24th February, observes:—It is true that India cannot expect much good from the Coalition Government. Most of those who speak in the cause of India are of the Labour party. So long as we have their support, we need not fear. . . But our moderate brethren preach to us that, because the Coalition party have come to power in England, we should not be exorbitant in our demands. This argument is irrelevant. Only if our demand is for more than what is offered, we will get at least a measure of what we ask for. We hold that it is a great mistake on the part of the moderates to have stated that they are quite satisfied with Montagu-Chelmsford proposals. We trust that, hereafter at least, they will realise their mistake and without extolling the Montagu-Chelmsford proposals, boldly point out the defects therein.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

Political agitation in India.

61. The Desabhaktan, of the 24th February, observes:—The oppression of the bureaucrats is ever on the increase. The demon of the bureaucrats is going on devouring the nationalist newspapers, and the papers that disappear come out again very rarely. Why? There are funds in the country but these do not serve the country's need. Many do not take part in politics. The wealth of India is drained away to foreign countries. The surplus left is spent on useless items. . . Political agitation should hereafter grow strong in India, and India's wealth should be spent only towards that. Many political sanyasins will spring up to spread constitutional agitation everywhere. Nationalist papers will go on doing their work with zeal. The work of one nationalist paper can well be compared to that of a lakh of patriots. For these papers to work unceasingly, public support is indispensable. The hatred which now exists among the different religious parties in India should be diverted hereafter towards foreign articles and the actions of the foreigners.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar at Thenneri.

62. The Swadesamitran, of the 21st February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, a summary of the proceedings of a public meeting held in Thenneri on the 16th idem, in which the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar is reported to have delivered an address on the present situation comparing and contrasting the ancient greatness of the Indians with their present condition. At the end of the meeting resolutions were passed protesting against the Rowlatt Bills and urging the application of the principle of self-determination to India. A free rendering of the above appears in the Hindu of the 20th idem.

A public meeting at Tanjore.

63. The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 21st and 22nd February, respectively, publish a summary of the proceedings of a public meeting held in Tanjore on the 20th idem, in which resolutions were passed protesting against the Rowlatt Bills, the movement of the members of the Indian Civil Service in respect of reforms and the Viceroy's speech in the Imperial Legislative Council with reference to this movement and the British merchants.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The use of false weights and measures.

64. Adverting to the conviction of certain bazaarmen in Madras recently for having used false weights and measures, the Dravidan, of the 24th February, remarks that, as this deceptive practice is not a new thing, the Police should always keep an eye on the bazaarmen in this respect and especially now that high prices and famine are afflicting the people much.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The Delhi Congress.

65. The Andhrapatrika, of the 19th February, publishes in Telugu Mr. B. C. Pal's speech on "The Delhi Congress and After", delivered at the Gokhale Hall on the 18th instant, and observes in the course of its comment thereon:—The importance of the Delhi Congress has been brought home to the public by Mr. B. C. Pal's lecture on it last evening. The difference between the Bombay Special Congress resolutions and those of the Delhi Congress is very little. The time limit fixed for the grant of complete autonomy has been dispensed with in accordance with the public opinion which had already found expression in different provinces. The system of diarchical government will have no other useful result than giving room for dead-locks. . . Mr. Pal has made it clear that in no other congress the popular opinion has commanded greater respect than in the Delhi session. . . The wishes of the colonies are being readily complied with . . Though their status is being considerably raised, the Nationalists in South Africa are demanding absolute independence. . . India does not want the immediate grant of even the colonial position. She wants forthwith the introduction of full responsible government in the Provinces and the grant of colonial status within a limited time. India has defended the cause of the Empire at a grave crisis. It was the Indian soldiers that had saved France at a crisis. When India bears greater responsibilities than the colonies, she should have the corresponding privileges also. Apart from the interests of India, the British Parliament will do well to accept the Congress resolutions in the interests of the British Empire at least. . .

66. Referring to the ignorance of the British public about India and Indians as particularly betrayed by the remarks of certain English papers on the appointment of Lord Sinha as the Under Secretary of State for India, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st February, writes under this heading:—The ignorance prevailing in Britain regarding India, notwithstanding that it is an important member of the British Empire, cannot but rouse our wonder. Some people there do not know even the most elementary facts about India. This is the reason why the words of Anglo-Indians are accepted as the gospel truth. The remarks made by certain papers in England betray their ignorance. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Strange notions.

67. Referring to the discount on notes which is said to be very high in the Guntūr district, the Andhraprakasika, of the 19th February, writes under this heading:— . . . We are shocked to hear that they are taking Rs. 3½ discount in the Guntūr district. Some Marwari merchants and other wealthy men of Guntūr are reported to be coming to Madras every day and cashing notes in the Fort for thousands of rupees and going back, even evading the payment of the railway charges. We are at a loss to understand what the police and the railway authorities are doing. Can it be that the payment of mamul to every one concerned, by the Marwaris on their being threatened is the reason why these day-thieves are not caught hold of? . . .

The Sixth Kistna District Ryots' Conference.

69. Reviewing the administration of Mr. E. A. Davis, the Collector of Guntūr, who has been transferred to Salem, the Desabhimani, of the 5th February, observes:— . . . His regime has been peaceful but for the disturbance which occurred during the Muharram festival last year. . . Though there is not much good, not to do harm is itself a feature that characterises a virtuous man. . .

DESABHIMANI, Guntūr, 5th Feb. 1919.

Mr. E. A. Davis.

70. With reference to the controversy on the Delhi Congress, the Andhravani, of the 8th February, observes in its leader under this heading:— . . . A new era in the history of the National Congress has opened with the last session at Delhi. The false charge that the masses have nothing to do with the Congress has been shown to be unfounded. The habit of conducting business in the vernaculars of the country has come into vogue. . . As has been suggested by Pandit Malavya, all political associations in the country should organize a branch of the Congress in every village and educate the people on the last Congress resolutions and get their support. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 8th Feb. 1919.

The duty of the people.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 8th Feb. 1919.

71. Exhorting the people of India to acquire business habits and organizing capacity, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 8th February, writes under this heading :— . . .

Organizing capacity.

The want of organizing capacity among us is as strong a reason for the failure of of our public movements as that of national education. . . The ambition of western people is the subjugation of the elements and the triumph of physical comfort, while our endeavour is to conquer passions and attain to the sovereignty of spirit. Their ideals are as far from ours as the west is from the east. . . The different nations of the world should be each independent of and brotherly to the other and contribute to the world prosperity as the members of United States of America. This is exactly what the Peace Conference which is now assembled at Paris is trying to do. It will be difficult for this Conference to attain its object, if it should concede freedom to some nations only and withhold it from others. It is just to prevent such a chance that President Wilson has urged upon the necessity of every people in the world being made free and independent.

So, if we want to thrive equally with other nations, we should get Home Rule. For that, we have to first improve our organizing capacity. Whatever ability, wisdom and genius we may have, they will all be useless without this capacity for organization. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 8th Feb. 1919.

72. In continuation of his article under this heading on the Rowlatt Bills appearing in the issue of the Andhravani, dated 1st February 1919, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 8th February, writes :— . . .

Repressive Acts.

Section 2 of the first Bill would show the nature of the amendments therein proposed. The newly proposed 124-B to the Indian Penal Code makes the possession of a seditious document a crime, unless it is shown that the document in question is kept in good faith without any intention to publish or circulate it. . . Is there any country in which such a repressive measure is in force? Even the despotic Czars of Russia have never promulgated a legislation of this nature. Not even the originator of the great world-war, the arch-despot, the cruel Kaiser, has introduced such laws in Germany during his reign. Should the abovementioned section become law, it is impossible to imagine to what unrest it may lead. Is an individual in any civilised country presumed to be a criminal for the simple reason that a seditious document is found in his or her possession even without any intention to publish or circulate it? . . . If a police officer, in order to bring his enemy into trouble somehow, throws a seditious document into the latter's house and then arrests him, how can that unfortunate person prove his innocence? Who can guarantee against the occurrence of such mean acts? Which person will refrain from arrogance, when once he gets arbitrary power into his hands? In these circumstances, is it right to enact such measures? It is needless to point out that this section will soon seal the fate of journalists in the country. The second Bill confers unheard of arbitrary powers on the police. . . The ordinary administration of justice is suspended only in countries where there is war or revolution or foreign invasion. But now, there is no war in India; nor does any foreign nation contemplate an invasion of the country. The number of anarchists, according to the statement of the Government themselves, is very small. What necessity is there for repressive legislation then? The readers are aware how many times more severe is anarchy in Ireland than in India. But there are no permanent repressive laws even in such a country. The Government are pardoning there men who really deserve a severe punishment. The United States of America has granted self-government to the Philippine Islands in only 17 years. . . Though it is nearly 100 years now, not only has the British Government not given us self-government but is trying to stifle the freedom of the individual by enacting repressive laws. . . Mr. Rajagopala Achari of Salem has expressed a doubt regarding the competency of the Viceroy's Council to enact these measures. It is highly necessary that the views of eminent Indian and English lawyers on the subject should be ascertained. Our Indian leaders should work with firm minds and see that such an unlawful measure is not passed. Ye! Indians! Take immediate action: and enter a strong protest. Safeguard your inherent rights, your self-respect and your patriotism. Carry on strong constitutional political agitation. If Indians agitate with three-hundred million voices, what bureaucratic Government will not lend its ear? How can their wishes fail to be fruitful? Should these new Bills become law, my countrymen! think of the name of Mahatma Gandhi and be prepared to take up the vow of passive resistance. That is the surest remedy. Beseech Gandhi to lead you in this great fight for freedom. As delay is dangerous, hold meetings and convey to the Government your disapproval of these repressive Bills. Look, yonder stands mother India! She is weeping over her fallen condition. She is discussing within herself whether her children can redress her sorrow and restore to her her ancient fame and glory. May the sons of India relieve her distress, win this fight for freedom, safeguard the ancient fame and glory of mother India and win their political salvation! Victory to mother India! Vande Mataram!

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

India in the Parliament.

73. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th February, says in its leader:—From what Mr. Montagu has said in the House of Commons, it is certain that Reform Bills will soon be introduced into the Parliament, and the views of the Governments will be placed before it. It is easy to guess the opinions of the provincial Governments. It is rumoured that most of them have expressed the opinion that even the reforms of Mr. Montagu will not suit India and that no important departments should be transferred to the people. When such views are placed before the Members, they will certainly believe them as gospel truth. We see no chance for the views of the people being placed before the Parliament The addresses presented by the various associations when Mr. Montagu came to India were not published. It was asked in the Imperial Legislative Council whether, after a Bill is introduced into the Parliament, the representatives of the people will have an opportunity to express their opinions, and the Government replied they could not give any promise. Under such circumstances, we cannot believe that there will be any opportunity for the publication of the opinion of the people on the Bill. Some may ask if the evidence given by the leaders of the people before the Reform Committees is not enough. The Reform Committees do not enquire into all matters. . . They conducted their enquiry in camera and have not recorded the evidence of popular leaders. There is thus no room for the publication of Indian public opinion in the report of the Committees, and so the Members of the Parliament cannot know the opinions of the Indians. Mr. Montagu's reforms may be made much narrower in the Bill, and it is the duty of the Government to obtain the opinion of the people only after the Bill is published. Otherwise the Parliament will have before it only the views of the provincial Governments and the Government of India. Before the Committee of Enquiry that will be constituted by the Parliament after the Bill is published, it will not be possible for the real opinions of the Indians being placed; nor will it be possible that any such opinion will be placed before the Members of the Parliament. For it is not possible for any large number of the Congress leaders to go to England and give expression to their views. The opinion of a few leaders will not carry weight before the opinion of the Sydenham party which consists of many members. So the Indians will not profit much by an enquiry held in England. From the present constitution of the House of Commons, it will not appear that the Members will consider the Bills with far-sightedness. The English people in England being very ignorant of the Indian affairs, we can hardly expect any very liberal reforms. So it will not be advantageous to leave the reforms to the work of time and to the discretion of Mr. Montagu. The interval is short. There ought to be a new stir in the country, and public opinion should be published from every quarter. The Indians should request the Peace Conference that they along with the other nations should be allowed the privilege of self-determination. The popular leaders should represent to the British people in England their aspirations based on the firm determination of the people. Mr. Tilak is working in England to acquaint the British people and the members of the Peace Conference with the aims and aspirations of the Indians. Mr. Lajpat Rai is doing similar work in America. If the Indians should help Messrs. Tilak and Lajpat Rai who are working in foreign lands their object would certainly be fulfilled. It is well known that

Mr. Lajpat Rai is one of those who advocate constitutional agitation. It is highly improper that such a man should be prohibited to step into any part of the British Empire. We are at a loss to know what harm will result from allowing him to enter the British territory even after the war.

Mr. Montagu said that for the purpose of importing rice from Burma, the shipping rates had been reduced. But, perhaps, he is not aware that the virulence of famine is on the increase, so much so that the life of the masses in Madras has become very unbearable. It will, under such circumstances, be well for Mr. Montagu to direct the Government of India to take steps to ameliorate the condition of the people. The authorities will do well to devote to this matter at least some of the attention they devote to the Rowlatt Bills. If the evil is not remedied soon it is difficult to say how despondent the people may grow. There is no use to rest satisfied that the political agitators are at the bottom of such despondency. We submit that the authorities should know that the people cannot live a happy life unless their economic wretchedness is removed and should take steps to combat the evil.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The labour question.

74. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th February, says that the labour question is growing more critical in England, and that the idea is gaining ground that the present British Government cannot solve the question.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The political situation.

75. The Andhrapatrika, of the 24th February, says on this subject:—Many in the west are of opinion that the proceedings of the Peace Conference are not in accordance with the principles of democracy. Mr. Borah stated in the American Senate that the League of Nations was not in accord with the American policy. In the same way, papers like the Observer in London are expressing their feeling of disappointment. Upon this, the India remarks:—While the proceedings at Paris up to date are in this fashion, what wonder is there in Indians, who have understood the nature of the bureaucrats, not believing that the members of the Civil Service will give effect to Mr. Montagu's reforms? Even the British people are labouring under such disabilities. From this the Indians who are under the control of the bureaucracy, will easily understand what great difficulties are to confront them.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The high-handedness of the bureaucracy.

76. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 22nd February, writes:—. . . If the rulers are not prepared to assume the responsibility of redressing the grievances of the people, they should place the Government of the country in the hands of the popular representatives. Then, the people will bear all responsibilities. Unlike our ancient kings, our present rulers are foreigners, and they cannot therefore understand our weal and woe, our wants and grievances, so well. Further, it is but natural that the western nations should consider the interests of those races which are under their Government, after they have looked to their own first. So, there is absolutely no scope for our national development in the absence of a representative Government.

His Excellency the Viceroy has stated in the Imperial Legislative Council that notwithstanding any measure of self-government which may be granted to us, he would see that provisions will be made to safeguard the interests of English merchants and to maintain the arbitrary power of the Anglo-Indian officials. The authorities are ready to enact the Rowlatt Bills merely on the strength of official majority, in the total absence of any reasons calling forth such legislation and in the face of the unanimous opposition of all the elected members including the moderates. Our freedom of speech and our freedom of writing have been already curtailed; and these new Bills, when passed into law, will force upon us such restraints as are not known in any free country in the modern times. The observation of Professor Lowell in his book on the British Administration, to the effect that the Czar of Russia and the Viceroy of India are the greatest autocrats in this modern world, is true. The scheme of Mr. Montagu has been prepared with a view to the preservation of the absolute power of such a Viceroy. Is it the Defence of India Act that has kept the people of this country loyal during the four and a half years of the war? Can such Acts frighten real anarchists? Those who are opposed to the grant of self-government to us lay against us the charge that the number of the literate among us is not large. Whose fault is this? This is one of our charges against our Government. Our rulers have forgotten their duty during the last 150 years. They rejected the resolution brought forward by the late Mr. Gokhale on compulsory elementary education. In these circumstances, to say that the reason for not granting us political rights is the illiteracy of our masses is adding insult to injury.

Mr. Montagu's scheme is not at all conceived in the faith that liberty is the primary essential for our self-development. . . To say that a nation should get its freedom step by step is ridiculous. A slave should have his liberty restored to him all at once; it will be impossible for him to receive it gradually. His chains must be snapped at one stroke and not at leisure. After he gets his full freedom all at once, he may gradually improve in every respect.

They say that it has taken England six centuries to get her full freedom. But it has taken France only six months; and in Russia, despotism has come to an end in six days. . . It will therefore be seen that, granted full freedom, India will rise by a leap, like Japan, and, besides being a source of strength to England, will contribute her valuable service to the civilisation of the world by contributing a new culture to it. . . But the present circumstances afford room for the suspicion that the English people may dispense with the advice of President Wilson, after once they have gained their object, which will be like kicking the ladder after scaling a height. . . Will those who set at nought the humble prayers of the popular representatives in these peaceful times, apply to us the principle of self-determination? When the Viceroy placates the Anglo-Indian merchants and the Indian Civil Service officials by saying that he will see that even the meagre powers given to the Indian ministers in Mr. Montagu's scheme are rendered ineffectual, it will be an idle dream to expect that this British Government will now grant us complete autonomy. . . Though we may not be allowed popular representation in the League of Nations I believe that the foreign members will not only ask our Government point-blank why the principle of self-determination has not been applied to a fifth of the human race, but also will help in the early grant of our freedom to us. . . The British administration in India and Egypt will be discussed in the League of Nations. I am of the firm belief that the League of Nations will soon make us fit for complete freedom like the British Colonies and allow us separate representation in it.

77. Referring to the opening speech of His Majesty the Emperor in the new Parliament on the 4th instant, the Hitakarini, of the 16th February, remarks:—The speech is full of liberal views. . . To give effect to them is the work of the authorities on the spot. If they do as they are told, what more do we want? The Indian proverb that though God grants a boon, the priest does not, holds good, we think, in the case of the Government of India.

The liberal views of the Emperor.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 16th Feb. 1919.

78. The Hitakarini, of the 16th February, publishes in Telugu a letter under this heading contributed by Mr. Joseph Baptista to the Herald, which contains:—. . . France and America are free. Is the British Empire free? It may be, and is so within Great Britain. But India and Ireland are kept in bondage and governed by arbitrary force. . . The British Empire is governed by an autocratic principle with regard to a fifth of the human race as though to threaten democratic institutions. On what ground can British statesmen urge the compulsory introduction of democratic forms of Government in Austria and Germany? Democracy is also like charity which should begin at home. Let the British Cabinet think what it may, the problems of India and Ireland are sure to crop up at the Peace Conference. . . The storm is not going to stop, simply because the ostrich buries its head in sand. The United States cannot keep thirty-two millions of people in bondage, posing at the same time as the champion of democracy, preaching sermons on representative government to the central powers keeping concealed all the while a big plot. . . The British should, therefore, set their own house in order first. . . Portugal, Spain, Holland, France,

The Peace Conference and India.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 16th Feb. 1919.

Russia and at last Germany have all had an eye on India as the fittest country for exploitation and for the exercise of their power. In case England should retain that power, there will be room for jealousies which will be sufficient to call forth war, and which will eventually defeat the object of League of Nations. . .

Intoxicating drugs.

80. Referring to the legislation in the United States prohibiting the manufacture, etc., of intoxicating liquours, the Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd February, observes :— . . . How beneficial it will be, if the Government totally prohibit drinking in our country also which is immersed in poverty !

Temples.

81. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhraprakasika, of the 22nd February, writes :—. . . At the present time when we are anxious to have the rights of temple priests in their service inams still better defined, the Government should do justice to the priests by seeing that the plaintiffs in scheme-suits will not have their own way.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 19th Oct. 1918.

The economic situation.

82. Referring in its leader, under this heading, to the report published by the Honourable Members of the Executive Council of Madras, regarding the rise in prices, the Andhravani, of the 19th October 1918, writes :—It does not seem to have been prepared with an impartial mind. The lootings in Madras are said to be, in some measure, due to political agitation. It is neither just nor safe to draw such perverse inferences. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 9th Nov. 1918.

Pudukkōttai.

83. Referring to the prolonged stay of the Maharaja of Pudukkottai in Australia, the Andhravani, of the 9th November 1918, remarks under this heading :— . . . Having spent only Rs. 5,000 on agriculture, the Maharaja has, perhaps, utilised the balance of his State revenue for his private enjoyments. It is strange that the Madras Government should not take any notice of such Maharajas. It is, therefore, their duty to see now at least that the present Maharaja comes to his mother country or that another is appointed in his place as the Maharaja.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 9th Nov. 1918.

The Industrial Commission Report.

84. With reference to the Industrial Commission Report, the Andhravani, of the 9th November 1918, writes in its leader :— . . . The report has recognized two main principles at the very outset. The first is in order to enable India to be self-sufficient in men and resources without the necessity of depending on foreign countries, the Government will have to endeavour very earnestly for the industrial development of the country. The second is, the Government cannot accomplish this task without an industrial department and without the advice of experts and research workers. How the Government have hitherto failed to take any interest in our industrial advancement, how this has led to our poverty and industrial dependence on foreign countries at enormous loss, how our industries and commerce have been sacrificed for the benefit of Englishmen, and how the Government have been utterly indifferent to research work are some of the facts which are brought home to our minds by these principles. Is it not because we have no self-government that we have to submit to such troubles? If any Viceroy is inspired by real sympathy to do any good to us, the English merchants will raise a hue and cry and try to defeat his attempts. It is all well and good for the Government to work for the improvement of our industries But we are afraid that, in the absence of responsible government, the conditions will be a thousand times worse than what they are now. . . Though the English rulers express their wishes for our progress, those wishes will be useless, so long as the Government remains irresponsible. Our country cannot progress, unless we are accorded equal rights with the colonies. As the proverb says, God grants a boon but the priest withholds it. Similarly, our bureaucrats will prevent the grant of any advantages to us. . .

85. Referring to that part of His Excellency the Viceroy's opening speech at the Imperial Legislative Council, which deals with the Scheme of Reforms in its bearing on the I.C.S. officials and the Indian Ministers, the Andhravani of the 15th February, writes under this heading:—. . . His Excellency the Viceroy has ably convinced the Government officials that the new reforms will not curtail their powers. . . The Indian Ministers cannot have their own way before these officials, and they can have no control whatever over them. The Governor, the Governor-General and the Secretary of State for India, will see that the official stronghold is preserved intact. . . The grant of responsible Government to the people and the safeguarding of official power cannot go on simultaneously. The grant of real responsibility cannot but have the effect of curtailing the power of the bureaucracy. They will not consent to it. The Viceroy has given a description of the form of responsibility which will be granted to the peple in future. From what he has said, it will be clear that Indians will not have anything worth having after all. The schemes of reforms contemplated by statesmen are bound to be ineffectual, so long as the Government are in the hands of the bureaucracy. It is the duty of the people to see that such a fate will not overtake the Montagu scheme of reforms.

Political reforms.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 15th Feb. 1919.

86. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 15th February, writes to say that the Andhras will have their day of exultation when they get a separate province, a separate university and a separate High Court and that day will not come so long as they use foreign articles, foreign dress, and foreign language neglecting their own.

Which is that day for us?

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 15th Feb. 1919.

87. Under this heading, the Hitakarini, of the 16th February, reproduces in Telugu, an article from the Herald, advocating self-government and self-determination to Ireland and India, the political problems of which, the paper observes, are not internal Imperial questions to be excluded from the Peace Conference.

Not internal Imperial problems.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

89. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 24th February, writes:—Mr. Tyagaraja Chetti is trying to present farewell addresses, etc., to Lord Pentland on behalf of the Municipal Corporation. This seems likely to end in just the same way as it did in respect of the Governor of Bombay. We understand that many people regret to see that these persons are attempting an impossible task and creating disaffection in the mind of His Excellency.

Farewell addresses to His Excellency Lord Pentland.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 24th Feb. 1919.

90. A note in the Manorama, of the 18th February, expresses regret that India will have no representation in the League of Nations, as only self-governing countries, the dominions and the colonies will be represented in it. It is a pity indeed that India should be denied what is allowed to the colonies. It is occasions like these that make us feel ashamed of our position. Indians should protest against the denial to India of a place among the nations.

India and the League of Nations.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 18th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the same subject the Yogakshemam, of the 25th February, points out that the exclusion of India and other countries that are under the rule of European powers, from the League of Nations, renders the League quite useless for the world and the majority of people will have to continue to live in disappointment and discontent. The famous preliminary speech of President Wilson and this draft constitution are as far from one another as the north and south poles. It asks "Where is the speech! What is the deed!"

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 25th Feb. 1919.

91. Referring to the existence of a strong party in South Africa and Ireland trying to establish a republican form of government in those countries, the Yogakshemam, of the 25th February, points out that though in India there is no such party, there are many

The republican movement.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 25th Feb. 1919.

who are opposed to the policy of the Government, and hopes that as the increase in the number of such organizations in the countries under British protection is likely to reduce the strength of the Empire, this matter is receiving the serious attention of the British Cabinet.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 25th Feb. 1919.

92. The Yogakshemam, of the 25th February, refers to the action of the European Members of the Madras Corporation resigning their membership; because they considered that the provision in the City Municipal Act excluding persons having pecuniary dealings with the Corporation from becoming members thereof cast an aspersion on their honour, and says:—Such is the strength of union. The Government of India introduces in the Imperial Legislative Council a measure which will curtail wholesale the liberties of the people of India. The non-official Indian members protest against the passing of this measure. Without paying any heed to their opinion the Bill is accepted by the official majority. In spite of all this, the Indian members continue to be the members of that Council. This is the actual difference between Europeans and Indians. Such occurrences are only instances proving that Indians are wanting in strength of will and co-operation to establish their views.

III.—LEGISLATION.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

93. In thanking the Delhi correspondent to the mrita Bazaar Patrika for divulging the secret which made the moderates who were stubborn in the beginning in their opposition to the Rowlatt Bills, suddenly change their mind when the Government announced that the first Bill was to be in force only for three years, the Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, observes:—Does not this clearly show that the moderates had agreed with the Government in secret that one of the Bills might be in force for three years? If the statement of the Delhi correspondent should be true, what to call those moderates on the Imperial Legislative Council who approved the Rowlatt Bills in secret? Are they to be called patriots or traitors?

The moderates and the Rowlatt Bills.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

94. The Desabhaktan, of the 21st February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, a communication in which the following finds place:—By the operation of this law, it is manifest that countless will be the number that will suffer by getting entangled into difficulties and enter prison without proper trial, that the movement for liberty will be blocked and that political life will be prejudicially affected. . . The Government have resolved to establish this law. So the noble sons of mother Bharata should agitate to get rid of this piece of legislation. The popular leaders should stand firm, taking to passive resistance.

The Rowlatt Bills.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

Remarking that the unanimous opposition of the people to these Bills makes the bureaucrats seek the favour of the moderates and exhorting the moderates to resign their seats on the select committee and agitate against the passing of these Bills, a correspondent writes an article to the Desabhaktan, of the 21st February, in which the following finds place:—The present situation puts us in mind of the history of the United States, which belonged to England about 140 years ago. In the year 1765 the Stamp Act was enacted in Parliament. The Americans agitated against this enactment and eventually succeeded with the result that the Act was at once repealed. If the Americans made such an agitation for the levy of a tax, without their consent, what a huge agitation should we make for condemning these barbarous Sedition Bills which attempt to deprive us of even our present liberties and make slaves of us? Therefore brethren! Our liberty is to be forfeited and justice is to vanish. Take the necessary steps before it is too late. Arise to oppose these Bills that tend to steep mother Bharata in the abyss. Meetings should be held in every town and every village for condemning these Bills. If the bureaucrats do not yield even after that, you should seek the leadership of Gandhi and be prepared to resort to passive resistance.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 17th Feb. 1919.

Adverting to the remark of the Viceroy that it is only the Defence of India Act that saved India at the time of the war and that a permanent Act is needed in its place, the Vaisyamitran, of the 17th February, observes:—Words such as these to escape from the lips of the Viceroy cast a slur on the British administration itself. Other countries are likely to infer from these words that, as the British administration is not being carried on properly, anarchical views have cropped up here. Further, these are contradictory to the words of the authorities from the Premier down to the Provincial Governors eulogizing the services rendered by the Indians in the war and their loyalty. There is no necessity for the whole of India to suffer by these Bills, merely to put down a few persons here and there with anarchical tendencies. It is not in keeping with their responsibilities that the moderate leaders should surrender the rights of the people. Even as the official members obstinately carry their point, why not these also be bold in working for the cause of the people's liberty?

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Desabhaktan, of the 19th February, reproduces in Tamil a communication by Mrs. Annie Besant under the heading 'Rise Parantapa!' to the Bombay Chronicle, condemning the Rowlatt Bills and observing that, in the face of these Bills, reforms will be of no use and that only Home Rule will restore liberty to India. DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 19th February, observes:—Such a stressful condition is quite unprecedented in the political history of India. Attempts are now being made to enact a law to invest the Police and the executive authorities with powers that will prejudicially affect the liberties of all the people of the country. The endeavours of the authorities to enact this piece of legislation and their having condescended to restrict the term of its operation to three years make it clear that they feel anxious to have the consent of the Indian members for this measure. It is apparent that the Government do not wish to pass this on their own responsibility. If, therefore, the Indian members decline to co-operate with them in this matter the Government will drop the Bills. A Delhi correspondent to the Tribune states that it is wrong to say that the moderates erred in having agreed to the passing of these Bills as a temporary measure, as it was through their endeavours that at least this advantage was secured. This cannot be deemed to be an advantage at all. Did Sir William Vincent say that this law would not be renewed at the expiry of the present term? So the party that had the benefit at present are not the people but the Government. During the currency of this law for three years, every one will be afraid of doing political propagandist work of making public speeches and of writing to newspapers. Though our cause is just, our European brethren do not hesitate to revile us. It thus appears impossible for both of us to work in union for the progress of India, as pointed out in the Montagu-Chelmsford report. Some of the Englishmen, who are the descendants of persons that warred against their Government for establishing the liberty of the people, have now stated that these Bills should be passed into law and that those of the Indians who object to it are not fit for political privileges. Perhaps the European association will admit the competency of the Indians to conduct administration, if all the dictates of the Government are readily obeyed by them. Though Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford have pronounced that the Congress-League scheme is unworkable, future historians may have to record that Montagu-Chelmsford scheme is equally unworkable. It appears that the very mention of the expression 'dual government' brings on laughter among eminent barristers in England! One day the European association says that the Indians do not deserve any political rights, because they oppose the Rowlatt Bills, and another day, when the authorities considered the administration of the Burdwan Municipality to be unsatisfactory, it says that the Indians are unfit for political privileges. Perhaps it may ascribe the same unfitness to the Indians, if they object to the wealth of India being exploited gradually by European traders and capitalists! What a miserable lot is ours? We have to contend with such implacable enemies! SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

In justifying the statements of the correspondents to the Hindu and the Amrita Bazaar Patrika that the Government and the moderates had come to an understanding between themselves in the matter of the passing of these Bills, the Swadesamitran, of the 21st February, observes:—The views of Sir Narayan Chandravarkar have come out in time. If these had been expressed already, the SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

moderate members would not have consented to serve on the Select Committee. Even hereafter if all the non-official members in a body oppose the Bills, we believe that the Government will drop them. What will the members do in case the Bills are passed compulsorily? Would they remain quiet with the satisfaction of having done their duty, or would they venture to take measures to compel the Government to have the law repealed? It is suggested that, in case the Bill is forcibly passed into law, the people should resort to passive resistance. But some are of opinion that, as only a few will be involved so far as passive resistance to this law is concerned, it is not likely that the Government will change their attitude, while others consider that passive resistance should be resorted to by all so as to necessitate the Government to change their attitude. As such a feeling is prevalent among the people, the leaders should make use of it and chalk out the lines on which they should proceed. We trust that, if the Bill is passed into law, all the Indian members will represent to the Government the extraordinary consequences likely to result in the country and that, if the Government proceed further without paying heed to their objections, they will not fail to secede from the Council.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

Adverting to the news that the Bills as amended will not again be brought for the consideration of the Council before October next, the Desabhaktan, of the 22nd February, observes:—The Hon'ble Mr. B. Narasimheswara Sarma recently stated in Berhampur that the first of these Bills might, in all probability, be dropped. This is chiefly due to the able pleading of the representative members on the Imperial Legislative Council. However, if our friends had expressed their objections very strongly, as was done recently by the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar of Salem or by certain European members of the Madras Corporation, the Rowlatt Bills might have been got rid of altogether. It is not, however, too late for our representatives to do so.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Desabhaktan, of the 21st February, publishes in Tamil an account of a meeting held in Ammapet on the 14th idem, protesting against these Bills.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 24th February, reverts to this subject and, doubting whether it is the Hon'ble Mr. Bannerjee himself that is said to have suggested to an official member the desirability of making the Bills a temporary measure, remarks:—Even accepting the version of Mr. Bannerjee about this incident, the question arises as to why the said Indian member, whoever he may be, should have made such a suggestion, when the Government were nonplussed by the unanimous opposition of the Indian members? Did it not mean that, if the Bills were made temporary, some would support them? When all the moderates had strongly opposed the Bills on their own merits on the first day, how did they hail with satisfaction the later announcement that the Bills would be in force only for three years? Were they carried away by the praises bestowed on them by Sir William Vincent? After the announcement that the Bills would be temporary, the Hon'ble Mr. Bannerjee said that the attitude of his colleagues would depend on the changes that are made in the Bills by the Select Committee. Are the Bills to be passed into law then, if a few changes are introduced in them? Our duty is only to do what appears to our mind to be correct and we need not care for the consequences. A certain section among the people have been, for a long time, spoiling political matters by their over-readiness to compromise, on the impression that it is they that are doing all good to the country. Even those who were divided on the question of presenting a farewell address to Lord Willingdon at Bombay have now joined together in opposing these Bills. When even moderate leaders like the Hon'ble Mr. Sastri openly say that the Bills may endanger them too, how can others escape from them? Why should they be accepted for three years? Within these three years, they are sure to crush all spirit in political life and there will be none to oppose their continuation after that period. This is the idea of the Government. As the opposition is very strong now, they propose to enact the law for three years now and to perpetuate it easily later on. It is for this purpose that they have patted the moderates on the back and made a show of yielding to their wishes. The latter have fallen into the snare. The whole country is sounding a note of warning to them and we feel sure that they will hear it. They should not be carried away by the flattery of the Government. Whatever changes may be introduced in the Bills by the Committee, if all the members fail to oppose them with one voice, the slur of having betrayed the country will attach to them eternally.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 24th February, takes exception to the non-official members having agreed to serve on the Select Committee, after opposing the Bills in the Council, and remarking that the object of the popular leaders is not to amend particular portions thereof but to do away with them altogether, advocates the secession of the non-official members from the commitee.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 11th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 11th February, says with reference to the remark of Mr. Chakravarti that the hatred of the Government officials against the bureaucratic Government is greater than that of the Home Rulers:—There is some truth in the statement that the Government officials themselves are dissatisfied with the present Government. It is true that some of the Government officials themselves have openly joined political agitation and are acting against the interests of the Government. Should not the Government open their eyes now at least and examine the conduct of their officials? The people fear that if they do not do so, some catastrophe may befall the country. Some people try to see that the Rowlatt Bills are not passed and thus harass the Government.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

With reference to the Rowlatt Bills, the Desabhimani, of the 12th February, writes:— . . . All our agitation against these Bills ended only in the waste of our voice, money and paper, and has not been productive of the least good. . . We have to infer from the present circumstances that the Bills will be passed into law soon after the receipt of the Select Committee's Report. If the Government want to act against public opinion, there is nothing impossible for them to do. "But no law whatever which is contrary to public opinion can have the desired effect." . . . . .

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The Excess Profits Duty Bill.

95. Referring to the opinion of Sir Fuzulbhoy Kharimbhoy that the Government can, without resorting to this new taxation, very easily get the funds required for their expenditure by increasing the rates of customs duties and income-tax, the Hindu Nesan, of the 22nd February, observes:—This view will not find favour with the public of this country. Most of the European Chambers of Commerce in India are arguing against the imposition of this new tax, but their arguments will not stand. It is but right to pass this Bill into law. This law urges that it is not proper that large capitalists, in view of the effects of the war, should amass huge profits without caring in the least for the hardships of the poor. It is not equitable for the Government to tolerate the rich to grow wealthier by getting inordinate profits and the poor to get poorer day by day and suffer more miseries. We deplore that the Government did not till now move in the matter of removing this injustice. We trust that, hereafter at least, they will pass this Bill and teach a lesson to the big capitalists.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

96. The Swadesamitran, of the 22nd February, observes:—According to the Bill recently discussed in the Madras Legislative Council, the Commissioner, an officer to be appointed by the Government, will wield all sorts of powers. The Government declined to accept the proposal of the Hon'ble Mr. Ranga Achariyar that they might reserve to themselves the power of appointing the Commissioner, but that the selection should be made from among those nominated by the Corporation. Is not the Madras Corporation competent to appoint the Commissioner who is the head of the executive? Or are the Government, by appointing the Commissioner, trying to take into their own hands the municipal administration of the city? If so, when are the councillors to get responsibility in local administration? Further out of the total number of 50 councillors, only 30 will be the representatives of divisions. Limits have been placed on sources which might bring in large revenues. The horses and carriages in the fort belonging to the Government have been exempted from payment of taxes. Are not these using the municipal roads? Or are they the property of the poor or of charitable institutions? Why should they not pay taxes? If the Port Trust Board, the Government and other bodies who get large revenue cease to contribute towards the expenditure of the Corporation, the required funds have to be collected only from the poor. It is now clear that adequate provision has not been made for the expenditure of the Corporation, and it cannot, therefore, continue to discharge its duties properly. Then there will be room to say that local self-government is not a success. But as the legislation contemplated at present is the cause for this, it is but essential to enact a fresh legislation in its stead.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

The Andhraprakasika, of the 18th February, publishes under this heading a letter from a rate-payer in Madras, urging the citizens of Madras to hold forthwith a grand public meeting, protesting against the enactment of the Madras City Municipal Bill which will probably take place in March, and to refrain from standing as candidates for election and to boycott such as have the cheek to so stand, in case the Government pass it into an Act in spite of the protest made by the people. The paper, in commending the action suggested by the correspondent, says that the Bill is likely to be passed into an Act before the 11th of March, and exhorts the people to hold a protest meeting without any delay.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and Sir G. N. Chandravarkar's criticism.

97. Referring to the opinion of Sir G. N. Chandravarkar on the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 19th February, observes in its leader under this heading:— . . . Nobody can call Sir Chandravarkar an extremist or a sympathiser of the Nationalist party. He was a member of the Beachicroft Committee which inquired into the condition of the internees in Bengal. Even such a man has clearly explained in the 'Times of India' how the Rowlatt Bills infringe the fundamental principles of British justice. . . "With Regulation III of 1918 still in force, and with the power of the Viceroy to issue temporary orders for the defence of the country, what necessity is there for the Government. Sir Narayan asks, to pass another coercive Act even as a temporary measure? . . . He exhorts the non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council not to extend even the least support to these Bills, unless called upon to do so by the strength of popular opinion; and what that opinion is can be easily understood from the resolution passed by the open air meeting held in Calcutta under the auspices of the Bengal Moderates Association to the effect that the elected members should not accept even the temporary measure. . . Sir Chandravarkar wants the popular representatives not to assume the responsibility for the enactment of the Bills until the grant of self-government. It is not possible to explain more clearly the line of action to be followed by them than Sir Chandravarkar has done in his article. . . Though the Emergency Powers Bill becomes temporary, there is another which wants to make some permanent alterations in the existing Criminal Law. There seems to be absolutely no reason to accept the latter. The provision of this Bill are even more stringent than the recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and The Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma's speech.

98. Reviewing the speech of the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma on the Rowlatt Bills in the Imperial Legislative Ceuncil, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st February, observes in its leader:—We are now in receipt of the full report of the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma's speech on the Rowlatt

Bills in the Imperial Legislative Council. Mr. Sarma has stated in the course of his unambiguous and well-reasoned speech that there is not the least necessity for the enactment of repressive laws . . The courts of law have been till now invested with the power of questioning the acts of the executive except those done under the Press Act. The new Bills will upset the fundamental principles of law. Hitherto, law-courts have been the main source of protection for the people. It is the fairness of British justice that has helped most in the creation of unshaken confidence in the British Government among the people in India. If this firm bond is to be broken, why should not the people demand complete self-government forthwith, asks Mr. Sarma. . . Mr. Sarma has proved by irrefutable arguments that there is no necessity now for these Bills and attacked their very basic principles.

Had he stuck to this position to the very end, his tenacity would have been really praiseworthy. But instead of doing so, that he should request the Government to please the moderates seems ridiculous. . . He further observed: "make the measures temporary, for to make them permanent would border on madness." By the above sentence, he has surrendered his original position. . . It is because the non-official members have failed to maintain their determination to the very end that the Bills have been allowed temporarily. . . That the non-official members should try to fall back, when even Sir N. Chandravarkar wants them not to accept the Bills, even as temporary measures does not look proper. . .

99. Referring to the answers given on behalf of the Government in the Imperial Legislative Council to some questions, the Andhrapatrika, of the 21st February, remarks:— . . . In reply to the question whether an opportunity would be given to the Council Members to discuss the Reforms Bill after its introduction in the Parliament, Sir William Vincent has stated that the Government are unable to make any promise in the matter. This reply cannot but be disappointing to those who have been eagerly expecting such an opportunity.

Questions and answers in the Imperial Legislative Council.

100. The Andhraprakasika, of the 18th February, reproduces from the Ravi, an article approving of the Rowlatt Bills and refuting the arguments of the opponents to the Bills.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

The Sedition Bills.

Referring to the Rowlatt Bills, the Desabhimani, of the 5th February, writes under this heading:—At a time when the heads of all countries are concerting measures at the Peace Conference to destroy autocracy and establish self-government all over the world, that the Government of India should try to forge in the Imperial Legislative Council fetters in the shape of these Sedition Bills, for India that has fought to the best of her ability against despotism in the last war—Bills which have not been in force in any civilized country at any time in the world—strikes awe and terror in our heart. These Bills are objectionable for more reasons than one. That they should be sought to be employed at a most inopportune time against such a dumb, innocent and helpless subject nation as the people of India is the first objection against it . . . The people are being now tried by famine and pestilence; and to annoy them still further by forcing this legislation upon them is unjust. It does not become the civilized and freedom-loving Englishmen . . . The Secretary of State came to this country and has prepared a scheme of reforms. Whatever its faults, it evinces a liberal spirit. Those reforms have not yet been embodied in an Act. The agitation against them in England and the attempts made by the Indian Civil Service officials in this country to defeat them minimise the chances of their being so embodied. By trying to pass this repressive legislation at a time when the political horizon in India is so gloomy, the Government will be only insulting Indians, setting at nought all their loyalty . . . If these Bills are entrusted to the newly constituted Council after the introduction of the scheme of reforms, it would then be in keeping with the British traditions. But if they are to be passed now, it will only show the obstinacy of the Government, who carry out their will, taking advantage of the differences which the Scheme of Reforms has unfortunately created among our politicians. The principles which are going to be applied to races that are a thousand times inferior to us in point of civilization are being denied to us at the Peace Conference. . . All the members of the Rowlatt Commission are Government men. . . The reading of such religious and devotional works as the Bhagavat Gita has been condemned in the report. National education has been similarly treated; and patriotism has been regarded as sedition. Their inquiry and their recommendations are alike bereft of all discretion. Because we say all this, we should not be understood to deny the existence of anarchists in India or the fact of there once having been anarchical conspiracies. . . As in every other country, in India also there are some anarchists. . . But their number is very small. The Rowlatt Report itself makes this fact clear. . . In these circumstances, no self-respecting Indian can give his consent to these Bills. . . It is the duty of the people to carry on agitation in the country and see that these Bills are not passed into law. . . The time has come when everyone should be ready to observe passive resistance, should a need for it arise. It is difficult to imagine a more cruel and terrible piece of legislation. May the members of the Legislative Council realize their responsibilities and discharge their duty, inspired by self-respect and by their country's honour!

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 20th Feb. 1919.

The European Commissioners of the Madras Corporation.

101. Referring to the Madras City Municipal Bill, the Andhraprakasika, of the 20th February, writes in its leader under this heading:— . . . The Mail is of opinion that when the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme is introduced, there will be a chance of annulling this Bill and passing a new one. We think it is not at all proper for the Government to pass it into an Act, when there is such a strong difference of opinion upon it. . . A protest meeting of some Municipal Commissioners alone will not do. As suggested by us the day before yesterday a grand assembly of five to six thousand rate-payers at least should be held to protest against this dangerous Bill. . . If the Government carry out the Bill even in the face of such strong and unanimous popular opinion, it will be the indispensable duty of the Indian Commissioners to resign in a body like their European brethren and see that everybody is discouraged to stand as a candidate for election. . . The opinions of the citizens, of their representatives, and of the members of the Legislative Council elected on behalf of the Corporation have never before been flouted so flagrantly to our knowledge. . . We regret to state boldly that not to recognize the opinions of the citizens of this city in the management of the municipal affairs within its four toll-gates is altogether condemnable. It is indisputable that the leaders are responsible for the well-being of the citizens in the city. We regret to have to repeat that it is not proper for His Excellency Lord Pentland and his Government to ignore the opinions of such leaders on the subject and rush this unpopular Bill in indecent haste on the eve of His Excellency's laying down his office. . .

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 12th Feb. 1919.

The Imperial Legislative Council and the discussion on the Rowlatt Bills.

102. With reference to the opening speech of His Excellency the Viceroy at the Imperial Legislative Council, and the Rowlatt Bills, the Desabhimani, of the 12th February, writes in its leader:— . . . We are very sorry to observe that His Excellency's speech is cast in a most disappointing tone which is least calculated to satisfy the aspirations of Indians or to facilitate the progress of their country. On the other hand, we regret very much to see the Viceroy devoting the greater part of his speech to give an assurance to the Indian Civil Service officials, those opponents to Indian interests, who want to retain absolute power in their hands so that they may always play with the aspirations and the rights of Indians and keep them down. . . The way in which he has referred to the Scheme of Reforms, while making this assurance, cannot but have the effect of shaking the confidence of Indians in the impartiality of the English Government officials. . . Hitherto, the Government could get the support of many non-official members for each and every repressive measure passed by them. . . But as regards the Rowlatt Bills, there is no Indian, whether within or outside the Council, who has not expressed his disapproval of them. It is extremely regrettable that such a clear, unambiguous and unanimous opinion has not been respected. This one instance is enough to establish the necessity for reform in the Government. . . The Hon'ble Mr. Sastri and the Hon'ble Mr. S. N. Bannerjea did not consent to resign their membership on the Select Committee over the Rowlatt Bills, lest it should be a disrespect to His Excellency the Viceroy. There is no wonder in their saying so. But we cannot agree with them in their opinion. We are of the firm opinion that no self-respecting Indian should accept a membership on this committee, as it is opposed to the interests of the country. We request the Honourable Members to change their views and resign their membership from the committee even now, since they cannot do anything though they are on it.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 12th Feb. 1919.

A huge monster meeting at Calcutta.

103. Under this heading, the Desabhimani, of the 12th February, gives in Telugu the proceedings and resolutions of a monster meeting held at Calcutta to protest against the Rowlatt Bills and a summary of the speech of Mr. C. R. Das.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 16th Feb. 1919.

The Imperial Legislative Council and the Black Bills.

104. With reference to the Rowlatt Bills, the Hitakarini, of the 16th February, writes in its leader under this heading:—. . . The speech which Sir William Vincent made introducing the Rowlatt Bills, otherwise known as the Black Bills, immediately after His Excellency had concluded his opening address, is full of self-contradications. . . It is hard to guess what reason Sir William Vincent could have for introducing these Bills, when once he admitted that there had been no political crime in the last three months of the year 1918. . . If these Bills are to be applied to anarchists, for whom is the Defence of India Act intended? The suspicion, therefore, arises that the latter legislation has been passed with the object of punishing constitutional as well as unconstitutional agitation indiscriminately. . . The agitation carried on by all parties is directed towards the attainment of a single object. That object is the establishment of democracy. The proper remedy for this lies in the fulfilment of the national aspirations. When the boy raises a hue and cry for something, what should the mother do to quell his clamour? Will it do, if she abuses and beats him all the more and binds him with ropes? Can such a procedure put an end to the disturbance? The very next moment that she places in the boy's hand what he wants, not only will his agitation subside, but the peace and content which then pass through his mind will be reflected in his smiling face. Whatever be the number of repressive measures passed with the object of rooting out the seeds of unrest in the country, the spark of that fire will be smouldering somewhere, and will bring disaster to the country at some time or other. . . The thirty-four members who voted against Mr. Patel's amendment were all official members. Should the Government go according to the opinion of the people to govern whom it has been established, or should it go according to the official majority? Will not our moderate friends recognize now at least the efficacy of the Congress-League Scheme of reforms? . . . It is strange that the unanimous cries of the people from every part of the country, namely, "these Bills are dangerous and productive of unrest! withdraw them!!" should not reach the ears of the Government. Has the voice of people to be a cry in the wilderness under this Government?

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 16th Feb. 1919.

Village officers.

105. With regard to the Hereditary Village Officers' Act Amendment Bill, the Hitakarini, of the 16th February, observes:—. . . Taking away the hereditary right and leaving the power of appointing village officers in the hands of Deputy Tahsildars are matters which cannot but be open to criticism. It is on account of their unwillingness to leave the villages where they have been long residing to forego their hereditary right which has been coming on from time immemorial and not on account of any pleasure in leading precarious lives, showing servile homage to every one from the taluk peon to the District Collector, that the village officers are still clinging to their offices. . . We fear that this Bill may lead to strikes among village officers similar to the labour strikes. A rumour has reached us that such attempts are on foot. It is not possible to say how far this is true; but anyhow, it is certain that the Bill will create some trouble. . . Unless the date of receiving representations is postponed at least to the end of June, the opinions of village officers cannot find a full and adequate expression. It is not safe that there should be unrest in the village administration which is the very foundation of the political edifice in the country. . . If one servant resigns his post, another will not come forward to take it up. Whatever reasons there may be for it, this is a principle of village life. The Government will, therefore, do well to withdraw this Bill.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 15th Feb. 1919.

106. Referring to the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhravani, of the 15th February, writes in its leader under this heading:—. . .

The popular awakening.

In spite of certain differences regarding the political reforms, all Indians are agreed on the question of the Rowlatt Bills. All of them, with the exception of Doctor Nayar and some of his followers have condemned those Bills. The clarion voice of the people resounded in the Imperial Legislative Council during the discussion on these Bills. . . In the face of protests made by the people, the Government have introduced the Bills. They are bent upon passing coercive legislation which is unknown anywhere else in the world. The fact that they will be in force for only three years after the war in no way tones down their rigour. . . However hard we may rack our brains we cannot find an answer to the question: 'What necessity is there in India for such drastic legislation which is not deemed necessary anywhere in the world?. . . The people can possibly have no confidence in the ex parte inquiry held by the Rowlatt Commission. . . There is only one way of creating confidence in the people, and that is by holding an open inquiry into anarchy. . . Sir William Vincent has told the members of the Council that the proposed legislation is not meant to root out political agitation and that it only tries to make that agitation free from taint. But no agitation which is not liked by the authorities can be untainted. . . No freedom-loving people can ever accept repressive laws. It is not good that the Government should proceed in haste without heeding public opinion. . . .; nor is it safe to afford room for strong agitation among the people at a time when they are suffering from famine and pestilence. The people will not be responsible for the consequences that may follow. It is impossible to obstruct national awakening by repression. By employing repressive laws, the Government will have to swim against the opinion of 300 million Indians. May the Government use gentle means and help on the progress of the country?

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 22nd Feb. 1919.

107. In the course of an article criticising the Criminal Law Amendment Bills, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 22nd February, writes:—We think Justice Rowlatt is a great benefactor of India. Those who are wanting in far-sightedness and allow themselves to be led away by angry passion prove a great asset to the country. In the Madras Presidency, the people began to fight for their rights and liberties ever since Grant Duff became its Governor and did not cease their fighting until he retired The Indians, chiefly the Bengalis, were wanting in manly qualities until Lord Curzon came as Viceroy. They were slavish in their attitude towards Government and were bowing before them until they touched the ground. But this did not satisfy Lord Curzon. He became a 'Viceregal Nabob'. He ascended the throne at the Delhi Darbar and regarded the Indian Rulers as his servants and the Duke of Connaught as his Minister. But such pride and haughtiness always brings punishment in its train. Great deeds as well as great sins bring their result without delay. Differences arose between Lord Curzon and the Military department and also between him and the Indians. The untoward consequences such as the Bengal partition, and the boycott movement that arose from it are well known. He even feared that his life was in danger, was made to retire from the service, and, without the honours which his exalted position deserved, returned to England despised by the very country which he ruled like an Emperor. These curious events are by no means infrequent; and yet few people profit by the lessons which they afford. The very first result of following the treatment which Justice Rowlatt prescribed in the belief that there was political disease in India is that even the moderates in the Imperial Council became extremists, Justice Rowlatt. Instead of prescribing any treatment for India, seems to be in need of treatment himself. Mr. Welby and other Anglo-Indian journalists are helping the cause of India. They are sowing the seeds of Bolshevism. We do not regret this in particular as adverse to Indian interests. We only deplore the blot that these people cause on the name of the just-minded among their countrymen. Once the prestige is undermined, all power disappears in an instant. Those who cherish the traditions of British justice regret to find that even so deeply cultured a nation as the British make the blunder of placing their confidence in a wrong quarter and are thereby bringing about their own ruin.

Writing on the same subject, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st February, remarks :—We have already pointed out how the authorities seeing the strong opposition from the popular representatives resorted to the policy of 'Divide and rule'. The whole secret in this connexion is out. The Government wanted at least some support from the moderates. Some of the members got scent that the Government were willing to enact the measures temporarily for three or four years. The moment the reply was given that they will be regarded as temporary in answer to Babu Surendranath's enquiry, the latter gave his consent and thus dug holes for letting into the Imperial Council these young snakes called Rowalt Bills. Ten years ago the late Gokhale had given his support to the Press Act relying on the promise that the measure would be regarded as temporary. But subsequently when the Congress and Gokhale himself urged that these fetters on the liberty of the press should be removed when the Minto-Morley Reforms had restored tranquillity, their cries were not heeded in the least. Though Gokhale deeply repented all the rest of his days for having given his consent to the measure this stump of a Press Act driven into the heart of India is still there. It must be due to the infirmities of his old age that Babu Surendranath who had long been known as a farsighted and veteran patriot still believes in the temporary nature of the present measure. If it be true that his mind has become infirm, it is really dangerous that he should represent the people in the Council.

Travancore administration for 1093 M.E.

108. In the course of its review of the administration report for 1093 M.E. presented by the Diwan of Travancore at the current session of the Sri Mulam Popular Assembly, the Manorama, of the 18th February, notices that the efforts of the Darbar to combat famine were creditable, e.g., the arrangements made to import paddy from Burma and to sell the same at moderate rates in different parts of Travancore and to supply kerosene oil for 'kol' cultivators, and inquires:—Has anything been done in British Malabar corresponding to these things? This affords evidence that Native States can appreciate the hardships and miseries of the people much easier (than foreign administrations).

Manorama, Calicut, 18th Feb. 1919.

Writing on the same subject the Sathyanadam, of the 21st February, considers the financial position of Travancore quite satisfactory. It also notes the successful efforts made by the Darbar to combat famine and regrets that the Cochin Darbar did not follow the example set by Travancore. "The neglect of the Cochin Darbar in the matter is quite unpardonable."

Sathyanadam, Ernakulam, 21st Feb. 1919.

Writing on the same subject, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 19th February, and other papers congratulate Diwan Bahadur Krishnan Nayar, Diwan of Travancore, on the success of his administration and note with satisfaction the sound financial condition of the State in spite of the difficulties caused by the war.

1. The West Coast Spectator, of the 27th February, has the following:— West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 27th Feb. 1919.

Agrarian discontent in Malabar.

"For how long are the local Government going to fight shy of a state of affairs which we have no hesitation in condemning as 'a shame and a scandal to civilization'—to borrow the language the late Lord Salisbury used once to condemn the Irish situation? Out of date wooden and inelastic, isolated from the real public, as Mr. Montagu said in the course of the Mesopotamia debate misled by its hangers-on, sycophants and 'conservative Indians', by cart loads of John Roes and Richard Roes who pose as leaders, the bureaucratic administration has failed to realise the strong undercurrent of feeling in Malabar against the landlords. . . The existence of this chronic distemper is and must be regarded as a serious indictment against the administration which has failed to realise that the interests of landlord and tenant are as opposite as Hyperion to a satyr.

Our agriculture is ruined, the major part of the population exists on one slender meal a day, wealth is in the hands of a microscopic minority, and the economic situation is becoming worse and worse. Verily, this state of affairs, which is the direct consequence of our agrarian laws, is not very creditable to anybody. We do think, however, that something will be done to improve matters before the situation gets out of hand. . . We appeal to the sense of justice and fair-play of the Englishmen concerned with the administration to do away with a scandal which keeps hundreds of thousands of human beings in perpetual bondage."

The West Coast Spectator, of the 4th March, remarks:—"To the casual observer, to the European civilian as well, it will seem that everything is going on as merrily as marriage bells in Malabar, with a population apparently contented and happy. For, is there any agitation in Malabar; is there any agrarian crime, and have the Government received any complaint from the tenants? . . . 'Internal' emigration still continues, for there is a steady influx of population into towns from rural areas, intensifying the unemployed problem. How we wish the Government realized the gravity of the situation before it is too late; how we wish the Government paid heed to the warnings and counsel of their own servants like Mr. Chantan! May we not hope that the words 'too late' will not be written on any legislation the Government might be compelled to undertake to allay the agrarian discontent that saps the vitality of the real people of Malabar?" West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 4th Mar. 1919.

(k) General.

2. The West Coast Spectator, of the 27th February, says:—"The impartial observer cannot but be amused at the new developments of Indian political activity and thought. Babu Bepin Chandra Pal, the super-Extremist, is at present in Madras hurling anathema maranatha against the moderates and, incidentally, against Mr. Besant as well. . . This has created a very interesting situation. We have now several parties, viz., the moderates, the super-extremists, the extremists, extremist—moderates and the revolutionaries. We believe Mrs. Besant now stands midway between the moderates and the extremist—moderates, and judged by her recent writings one is tempted to believe that she is making frantic attempts to join the moderate fold. . . Till recently the moderates were the anathema maranatha of the High Priestess of the Home Rule cult; she availed herself of every opportunity to discredit them, and to damage their reputation. It is a very strange irony of fate that to-day the old lady has turned round with her overtures! . . . There may be moderates, fools enough to be cleanly taken in by the emotional West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 27th Feb. 1919.

utterances of the old lady but the rank and file, and the leaders are not likely to allow themselves to be bamboozled. . . Her quarrels with her whilom friends, disciples, admirers and followers are no concern of ours; let her and them boil together, we do not in the least mind it. We cannot, however, but feel amused at the quarrel. Mrs. Besant herself set the example to her volatile following in the use of vituperation and denunciation. . . The question is whether a leader of her type who has no "settled convictions"—to use a Balfourian phrase—and who is very likely to doff her coat to-morrow and become a staunch pro-Bureaucrat can create confidence in the country and get a following from outside her Theosophical circle which is pledged to support her through thick and thin as the members of a vendetta would their leader?. . . It is our conviction that Mrs. Besant has at last been found out, and shunned by the moderates and looked upon with distrust by the extremists she must necessarily create a party pledged to and obeying her to the end. We have seen that possessed of a highly emotional temperament she needs must always be in the lime light, receiving the homage of all and sundry, and to a person of her temperament obscurity or enforced retirement is leaving death."

Artificial agitation in India.

3. The Hindu, of the 1st March, writes:—"The assiduous efforts of the Indo-British Association seem to have borne fruit in the misguiding of British opinion. What kind of a scare-crow of a scheme, what a bitter mockery of a project of reform, is likely to emerge in the present state of things can be understood by reading between the lines of the Times' remarks. There is an old familiar ring about these sentences which betrays their inspiration if not their authorship. To call a 'facitious artificial agitation' a protest in which every shade of public opinion has joined in no uncertain terms, is carrying fatuity to absurd lengths. Why, even the facile consciences of the prize-boys of the bureaucracy revolted at so wholesale a repression of civil rights as the Bills proposed! . . . Most British people have forgotten that such a country as India exists, much less that there remained any unfulfilled pledges to carry out. The reactions of the Tilak case and the activities of the Sydenhamites have convinced such people as still bestowed a thought to India that British rule in India was seriously menaced. . . So far as British opinion is concerned therefore we seem rapidly to be harking back, after a period of maudlin sentiment and carefully vague assurances of a new angle of vision, into the old comfortable ruts. Humanity, democracy and self-determination once again become meamingless catch-words east of Suez. . . It is not the first time that tall talk has been followed by mean actions and we are not surprised at the frame of mind which reconciles itself to ranting about the sacred rights of humanity and self-determination and in the same breadth abusing those who insist on defending their most elementary civil rights. . . We ask for bread and have half a brick heaved at our heads. Because we think the half brick might not quite suit our digestion, we are promptly told that we are not fit to be fed at all. It is strange logic, but evidently one that holds the field at present in England where the idea seems to be: no repression no reform. So much for the keepers of a great democracy's conscience."

Justice, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The following appears in Justice, of the 1st March, "Commenting on the debate in the Imperial Legislative Council on the Rowlatt Bills, the London Times says that India is on the verge of another of those factious artificial agitations which have repeatedly disturbed the country during the last ten years. . . What the Times says is not without force. . . But who are responsible for over-rating the importance of these artificial agitations? Who have been patronising and advancing the agitators to positions of prestige and influence? The answer will leap to the lips of those who have followed Indian politics for the past two or three years. The fact remains that the agitation of the variety described by the Times has been receiving encouragement, indirectly of course, at the hands of those whose duty it is to set their faces against everything artificial and objectionable. We need not go farther than Madras for instances. In this part of India even the loyal people have been painfully surprised at the manner in which the agitators and the agitating class are preferred for almost everything dignified, to the representatives and spokesmen of the loyal millions; and some people now imagine that to be an agitator against the Government and against the established order is the surest passport to official recognition, fame and popularity."

The press in India.

4. The Indian Patriot, of the 5th March, observes:—"The history of the Indian press is one long story of dismal sufferings, cruel persecution and unaccountable misery. Newspapers have been banned from entry to certain provinces in India; they have been gagged with security and forfeiture and confiscation; they have been tormented in diverse ways; their independence is gone and it is a struggle for existence. Various ways and means have been devised since the outbreak of the war to silence the press and to stifle public opinion. The early struggles were nothing compared with the present-day difficulties, and the proud boast to establish a free press remains an unrealisable dream and 'a baseless fabric of a vision'. . . Two years have gone by since the unrelenting attitude of the Viceroy found expression, and it is time that the question should receive more detailed consideration, and may we not hope for tolerance of reasonable criticism of public acts and measures. Will not the Indian press be allowed to hold the acknowledged position of 'protector of freedom, watchful guardian, capable of uniting the weak against the encroachments of power'? Will an Indian editor be allowed to hold the worthy position of a 'ruler of the world,' as Carlyle put it? The question is of increasing importance, and the sooner the Government assuages popular feeling and indignation the better for the country."

INDIAN PATRIOT, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The Public Services Commission.

5. United India and Indian States, for the week ending, 5th March, says:—"The Public Services Commission made their recommendations long ago and the report is still being considered by the Government so far as the Indian-manned services are concerned. And when finally something is done, we shall hear that there is no money for their increase of pay without further taxation. So far as the European-manned services are concerned, the recommendations are being gradually carried into effect. Money will be found when the Government wants it. The Imperial Police and Medical services will soon enjoy the increased rates of pay: they barked long at the big salaries paid to the Indian Civil Service and as a result, their salaries are raised by the Government on the principle, evidently, of live and let live. It is a wise maxim, but when the people who live and those let to live both live at the cost of the Indian tax-payer, the latter's interest must, we urge, be considered foremost."

UNITED INDIA AND INDIAN STATES, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

India and self-determination.

6. The following appears in United India and Indian States, for the week ending 5th March:—"As we pointed out last week, the resemblances between India and the Philippines are so numerous and striking that the fate of these interesting Islanders is full of profound significance to the inhabitants of our own vast continent. . . We happen to know that there are people who call themselves countrymen of Fox and Gladstone according to whom Prussianism is not so black as it is painted and that though it may be bad in Europe, it is good in India. With regard to such opinions, it is sufficient at this time of the day to say merely that the war was fought for a different principle, the Allies fought and won it on a different principle. The Allies, the Peace Conference, are now pledged to the view that every nation however small or however weak is entitled to its own independent life and that therefore as good old Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman said, good government (by foreign rulers) can never be a substitute for government by the people themselves. In India we want government by the people and the British Imperial connexion."

UNITED INDIA AND INDIAN STATES, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The forfeiture of the 'British Indian Press' security.

7. New India, of the 5th March, says:—"Madras will do its duty on Friday next, when we hope the Government of Madras will be left in no doubt as to the public interpretation of its latest act of vandalism. . . One noteworthy feature of the present forfeiture order is the compilation of extracts from the articles, and not the articles themselves. . . Even more important it is to know whether the action of the Government of Madras is based on the passages now published or on the whole articles. Three members of the Government are ignorant of Tamil. Did they, before sanctioning the forfeiture go through the translation of the whole articles or merely through the few selected sentences? . . . Lord Pentland is to retire in a few weeks, and this is perhaps his final reminder to the public, as to the mischief of 'other rule' in India."

III.—Legislation.

The Madras Law Times, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Bolshevism and Rowlattism.

8. The Madras Law Times, for the week ending 19th February, has the following:—"To sum up, the proposed Bill abrogates all sound rules of evidence and procedure; it places the life, liberty, and property of every subject of His Majesty in India at the arbitrary will of an Executive not responsible to the people; it abolishes the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of law established in this country. . . We are of opinion that the draconian provisions of the all-comprehensive Indian Penal Code ought to be sufficient for any conceivable purpose. From the necessity to have such drastic powers concentrated in the hands of the Executive, it would seem to an outsider that India is in a state of chronic revolt. Even if it were so, which we deny, this is not the remedy. Indeed this smacks strongly of Bolshevism. Although the nature and aims of the Government of India are totally and fundamentally different from those of the Bolshevistic idealists, still there is a surprising similarity in the methods they employ, which may not be quite accidental. There is the same distrust of lawyers, of judges, and of the ordinary courts of justice with their attendant formalities."

The Commonweal, Madras, 28th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and protest meetings.

9. The Commonweal, for the week ending 28th February, observes:—"The stage in India this week has been occupied chiefly by protest meetings against the Rowlatt Bills, Bombay being especially noticeable for its persistent opposition. Meetings have been held day after day, with well-known speakers at each, and the volume of disapproval grows as time goes on. . . Indians have had too much experience of the exaggerated use of coercion in the past to regard with equanimity the possession by the Government of such sweeping powers. . . Moreover, when the Bills become Acts, liberty ceases to exist in India. Liberty is very imperfect now, but when it depends on the proclamation of the Ruler it is not liberty at all. We shall be living under a pure despotism, hitherto unknown in India, and we shall hold everything by the mercy of the Viceroy. He may not intern, or imprison, or take our money as security, but he can do so at his own will and pleasure; that is, we shall be under the will of a man, not under the rule of the law. These Bills abolish liberty everywhere, by putting anyone in any area in danger of punishment by one man's will. . . Is it wonderful that we cannot trust authorities who behave in this way not to commit wrongs under cover of discretion, to say nothing of the worthlessness of Government promises made to procure the passage of obnoxious measures, as the promise of the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha—now Under Secretary of State for India—that a man should receive interest on the security he was compelled to lodge. Security has now become the imposition of a yearly fine—a scandalous abuse."

Nationalist, Madras, 2nd Mar. 1919.

Rowlattism and passive resistance.

10. The Nationalist, of the 2nd March, writes:—"People have begun to despair; hopes raised and dashed to the ground, prices ruling high and holding no prospect of the slightest fall, distress staring every Indian in the face by the high-handed behaviour of soul-less wheels in the great machine of the present day administration, are all contributing to make the sense of despair deeper and deeper day after day. What is the result of this despair? It either kills all activity in men and makes them mere cynics and fatalists or it drives them mad and throws them into the hands of bravadoes, bomb-throwers, and secret revolutionaries. The ineffectiveness of moderate politics has well-nigh exasperated the country. . . What is the real antidote to all this chaos—we answer emphatically it is none other than Passive Resistance."

Justice, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

Mr. Gandhi and the Rowlatt Bills.

11. Justice of the 3rd March, writes:—"Against Mr. Gandhi's new movement all loyal and law-abiding citizens must set their faces. The Rowlatt Bills are aimed at the most dangerous of criminals. They will not interfere with constitutional agitation which will go on as before and must go on as before. Let us bear that in mind. If these Bills were intended to stop, or make legitimate forms of political activity impossible, we would be among the first to oppose them. But they are not so intended. What then is the object of this passive resistance movement? It is a mischievous idea which enlightened public opinion all over the country must unqualifiedly condemn."

The Hindu, of the 7th March, writes :—" The telegrams from Delhi published elsewhere, show that the interview of Mahatma Gandhi with His Excellency the Viceroy has not relieved the situation, and that the attitude of Mr. Gandhi ramains unchanged in respect of his firm adherence to adopting the principle of passive resistance in case the Rowlatt Bills are passed into law. The interview has cleared the air in so far as it has been made clear to the representative of His Majesty's Government in this country, viz., the Viceroy, by so selfless, so farfamed, and such a spiritual public worker as Mr. Gandhi that a large part of the thinking people of this country are prepared to resort to passive resistance in case the Rowlatt Bills are passed into law. That the movement of passive resistance has been seriously set on foot, that it is gaining ground and that it is likely to spread soon over every nook and corner of the country, there is already ample evidence to show. The name of Mahatma Gandhi is itself a soul-stirring force. . . The issue is now reduced to this: Either the Government must in deference to the unanimous public opinion in the country, abandon the Bills or they must face the fierce and widespread agitation for passive resistance which the proposed law will produce. . . As the proposed laws are subversive of their fundamental rights as citizens, and as their enactment will be in direct opposition to the view of the people at large as well as of their representatives in the Legislative Council, they do not possess the elements which render obedience on their part, a matter of moral obligation." HINDU, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

12. The Indian Patriot, of the 4th March, states :—" The committee proposes changes such as would not destroy the general principles of the Bill, and it is definitely laid down in the preamble and other sub-clauses that the Criminal Emergency Powers Bill is intended to cope with anarchical and revolutionary crime alone. The time-limit laid down will not afford considerable satisfaction as the measure is viewed as a menace to the liberties of the people. . . Changes here and there in the Bill are not the best means for making the Bill acceptable. The principle is wrong and the methods employed are faulty; and the findings of the Select Committee follow in the main those principles and methods which have been shown times without number to be quite unnecessary in the best and truest interests of the country. . . The Government has not shown any deference to the reasoned opinion of the country, and they will have learnt by this time the intense force of public feeling against the Bill. We need not here enter into a lengthy discussion of the provisions of the Bill as amended to show that the public still view it as a grave menace to the liberties and rights of the people of India." INDIAN PATRIOT, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Madras Government and the City Municipal Bill.

13. Justice, of the 5th March, has the following :— JUSTICE, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

"No, thank you.

"That is what the Madras Corporation has said to the Madras Government about the new City Municipal Bill. We know that such polite refusals will have no effect on the Madras Government. That worthy body believes in ramming down the throats of municipal institutions in this Presidency not what the municipal bodies want but what the Government thinks is good for them. The process is very much like a mother administering caster oil to a child, with this difference, that the castor oil generally does good to the child, while the municipal measures of the Madras Government, as a rule, have the opposite effect.

"But we are thinking more about the effect that the resolution passed by the Madras Corporation at a special meeting last evening will have on those two high functionaries, the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. . . The Montford report goes so far as to say that its distinguished authors could not content themselves with reforms in the sphere of local self-government as 'Indian hopes and aspirations have been roused to such a pitch that it is idle to imagine that they will now be appeased by merely making over to them the management of urban and rural boards.' Quite so. If Indian aspirations will not be appeased by merely making over to them the management of urban and rural boards, how much more Indian aspirations will be ruffled by not handing over to them even the management of urban and rural boards? . . . The City Municipal Bill, however useless it may be as an instalment of municipal reform, is exceedingly valuable as an index of the nature of the Montagu reforms of the future. And if this is the nature of the reforms that India is going to get, may the good Lord deliver us from Montagu reforms?"

Malabar Herald, Cochin, 1st Mar. 1919.

Mr. Bhore, I.C.S., Diwan of Cochin.

14. The Malabar Herald, of the 1st March, says:—"On Monday, the 3rd instant, Mr. J. W. Bhore, B.A., I.C.S., will vacate his office as the Diwan of Cochin which he has held for the past five years with what credit we shall endeavour to show as briefly as possible. We have no doubt that the whole of Cochin, with the exception of a microscopic minority composed chiefly of scheming sycophants, will have heaved a sigh of great relief when they heard of Mr. Bhore's impending departure from the shores of Cochin as a piece of positive information. As he is now leaving Cochin for good we, who have watched its affairs, would be failing in duty if we do not pay him a tribute which he richly deserves as the weakest administrator Cochin has ever had."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

15. The Desabhaktan, of the 26th February, observes :—It it seen that, though the war has stopped in a way, the Germans have not given up their wicked propagandist work. It is reported that their work is being carried on unchecked in America and that the chief mission of the German spies is to create ill-feeling between England and America. It is also stated that they have succeeded in their attempt to a small extent. The Times of India observes that, in such circumstances, if Germans are permitted to reside in India, great danger is likely to be caused by them here and that the Government should be careful in this matter.

German propagandist work.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

16. Adverting to a note of warning given by Mr. Gandhi to the Government of India, that unless the grievances of the Indians in South Africa are redressed, passive resistance is likely to be resorted to there, the Desabhaktan, of the 27th February, observes :—Mr. Gandhi says that, if the Government of India remain silent on the matter, the lot of the Indians who have been residing for generations together in the places where gold mines are worked in South Africa, will become very miserable. It is noted in the conditions of the passive resistance formed in 1914 that the liberty of the Indians in South Africa should not be forfeited. What to say of the Government of South Africa who contravene this stipulation and attempt to confiscate the liberty of the Indians without realising that they too are British subjects? If the statement made during the war, that the Indians also hold equal status with the other members in the British Empire, is true, it is necessary that the Government of India should put a stop to the excesses committed in South Africa. Is there none to question the South African Government who grew fat on the labour of the Indian coolies and on the blood shed by the Indians in sugarcane plantation and coal mines?

The Swadesamitran and the Desabhaktan, of the 27th February, reproduce in Tamil an abstract of a letter written to the press by Mr. M. K. Gandhi, with reference to a telegram received from South Africa complaining against the stringent application of certain laws prejudicially to the interests of the Indians in that place.

Swadesamitran, & Desabhaktan, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

17. The Swadesamitran, of the 25th February, publishes the substance of a lengthy article on this subject contributed by a correspondent to the Herald, in which the following finds place among others :—The first sinful act perpetrated by these Russian extremists is that they have made public the treaties entered into in secret. This provoked the statesmen and the Governments of the allied countries. The devices adopted by statesmen without the knowledge and consent of representative assemblies called the Parliament or the Senate were brought to light. Further the secret views of the statesmen of the allied countries were revealed to the public in spite of their proclaiming that they were working with the purest of motives. Such an act of the Russian extremists will never be excused by Ministers, office of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and Ambassadars.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

18. The Swadesamitran, of the 26th February, describes at length the hardships suffered by the Indian labourers in the plantations of Ceylon and observes :—The root of all this misery is the ignorance of the labourers. Without any idea of the nature of the country they are to serve in, the work they have to do, and the wages they have to get in return, they get into the clutches of the planters through the kankanis. It will be sheer injustice if the Government should merely look at an educated person duping the ignorant. But neither the Government of India nor Indian labourers in Ceylon.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

the Government of Ceylon have taken adequate steps to prevent most of the labourers being taken to plantations by deceptive words. Some years ago, a committee was appointed by the Government of Ceylon to inquire into the complaint about the condition of labourers and Mr. Sundaram, a barrister of Ceylon, writes that the report of this committee has long ago been received and has been communicated only to the planters. If this is a fact, we have to remark that the Ceylon Government are partial, as the labourers that work in the plantations are also equally interested in the matter. If the report is made public, the labourers or others interested in their behalf, can say what portions of it are detrimental to their interests. The planters are said to be the primary cause for the hardships of the coolies. To remove these hardships, why should the planters alone be consulted? Indian leaders should at once attend to this. The recruiters may allege the stress of the present situation as a reason and induce many to emigrate. But as the services of these coolies are required in India alone, it is the duty of the Government to prevent them from going out in view of the wages, etc., they might earn here. The sufferings of the coolies in Ceylon are known to all and as the conditions there are worse than those obtaining here, it behoves the Government to prevent the recruitment of coolies in this country.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

19. The Desabhaktan, of the 3rd March, reproduces an article from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika which quotes an extract from the Evening Standard to show that the decision at the Paris Conference, that only the five great powers can form the league, was resented by the smaller European States and observes:—We thought that the League of Nations would at least be a league of whitemen. It is clear only now how even the smaller countries of the whites are to be excluded from this league. This shows the fraternal feeling of the great powers towards the smaller States, though the latter too are occupied by the white races. The guiding principle seems to be only that might is right, and it is really a mockery for people, who are immersed in worldly attachment, to talk of rare subjects like 'human brotherhood' and 'divine equality'.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The League of Nations.

With reference to the draft rules of the League of Nations, the Andhravani, of the 22nd February, remarks:—Those rules of the League of Nations which relate to the dependent nations are defective. The League is expected to set right these defects, when they come to discuss the draft rules. . . It is not proper that such a vast country as India should have no representation on the League. The people believe that it is the noble duty of the British nation to accord to India an equal place with the Colonies which are within the Empire. We hope that the rulers will soon justify the expectations of the people.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

In its leader under this heading, the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st March writes:—When an article is found without an owner or when its rightful owner is dispossessed of it, strangers other than the owner are generally treated as partners in respect to that article. The League of Nations has been created with the object of preventing dissensions among these partners. Thus, there is the seed of injustice in the very inception of the League. There are black races in Africa. Still, they are not regarded as the people of Africa. In spite of this fact, South Africa has been recognized as a self-governing country. What is meant by South Africa? It means the few white people who have settled in South Africa and their government which has been recognized as independent. What is to become of the original inhabitants who have been in South Africa long, long before the advent of the white people? . . . Australia, New Zealand and other colonies also are similarly treated. . . The few white settlers who have recently come and lived for some years become the owners. Is it not such owners who rule the League of Nations? See the justice of it! When the question of the German colonies comes up, they want to drive the Germans out of them on the ground that they have ill-treated the original inhabitants. Why should they not also inquire how the original inhabitants in South Africa and Australia are being treated? The oppression of labourers in the Congo State by the Belgians is now a matter of history. Still, Belgium can keep the Congo State in their possession.

It is thus clear that the League of Nations is intended to facilitate the partition among its members without any hitch, and not to do justice to the voiceless original inhabitants. Further, it is for the most part wealthy men, owners of factories, capitalists and their followers who are now dominating in the Government of every country. . . Finding no other way of escape from the tyranny of the rich, the labourers are obliged to develop their social strength. They are now giving to the owners of factories an idea of their social strength by means of their strikes. . . There is no wonder in the wealth of the rich, amassed with the tears of labourers, proving in the end to be poison to the world. This western commerce is depriving, on one hand, the labouring classes in the west of their status as men, while it drains the resources of foreign countries on the other. This economic problem is the cause of endless trouble among the western continents. Look at the present condition of Russia. It is the labouring classes that have rebelled all over the country. They have taken possession of large tracts of land, driving out proprietors out of their estates where they have been, till now, enjoying all pleasures. They are splitting up those estates into small pieces and dividing them among themselves. The workmen in factories are driving out the owners of their factories and working the factories themselves, sharing the profits. . . They are backing up their cause and power by the force of arms. This terrible revolution is undoubtedly the outcome of capitalism in Europe. It is also spreading in Germany, and it is not possible to say to what extent it may go. Since the defeat of the Labour Party in the last general elections in England, a strong reaction has been in progress there. The recent labour strikes prove this fact. England is in a serious crisis to-day. . . In addition to this struggle between labour and capitalism, a clash between women and men threatens to be imminent as regards professions. . . There is one more fact. A sort of jealousy between Europe and America seems to be in progress. America has realized a profit which is more than her loss during the war, and the problem which confronts every American to-day is how to make the American commerce the greatest in the world. The Americans also entertain a fear that they may have to face European competition. The Europeans are troubled on their part by the doubt whether they can stand the American competition. It has been published that America is going to double her navy. Why should they? It may be said beyond all doubt that the competition of Europe alone has led to this step. From the cables which are being received, it is understood that Americans are grumbling that they have only one vote in the League of Nations while the British Empire has been allowed five. There are many more points of discord of this sort. We shall describe them in our next issue and see how far the League of Nations can be helpful in setting them right.

The rules of the League of Nations.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 19th Feb. 1919.

Commenting in the course of its leader on the draft rules of the League of Nations, the Andhrapatrika, weekly of the 19th February, observes:— . . . From this, it will be clear that there is very little hope of redemption for dependent countries. We suspect that the provision entrusting the administration of dependent countries to big powers in the interests of the subject nation contains in it the seeds of future wars. . . The first eight rules go to exclude India which has rendered great help in the war, from the Peace Conference. Though the League was formed for the purpose of establishing peace and dharma (righteousness) in the world, the rules make it clear that its object is to safeguard the rights of European powers and to provide against any foreign inroad on them. Its object is not the protection of the rights of all nations. . . Countries like India, Egypt and Mesopotamia will have to advance under the domination of full-grown powers. This arrangement, it will be understood, precludes the possibility of the grant of self-government to them in this age. The League of Nations does not recognize the national soul, honour and individuality of countries like India. The history of the world loudly proclaims that the ruling powers cannot enable their subject nations to acquire individuality. . . History does not furnish an instance of a nation willingly leaving a country which it has conquered. It seems to be an idle dream that the League of Nations will be able to accomplish this object. . .

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 28th Feb. 1919.

The League of Nations.

Writing on this subject, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 28th February, remarks:—Those dominions which are completely autonomous have a place in the League of Nations. This makes it certain that India will have no place in it. Under the system of Mandatory States the German and Turkish Colonies will have to remain under the shelter of some leading States such as England and France for some (?) time. If President Wilson should agree to this, it will be contrary to the 14 points announced by him prior to setting foot on European soil. The influence of the atmosphere of Europe is such that President Wilson, the moment he set foot on European soil has had to go contrary to his previous suggestions. We are unable to say whether it is the soil or the climate of Europe that wields this influence.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Feb. 1919.

The emigration of Indian labourers to Ceylon.

20. Referring to the announcement made by the Local Government recently, that all restrictions imposed upon the emigration of Indian coolies to Ceylon have now been removed, the Desabhaktan, of the 4th February, regrets that the Government have not made any reference about how far the hardships suffered by the Indian coolies in Ceylon have been removed, and adds:—We now learn that, in addition to the 'useless' commission appointed by the Local Government to inquire about the condition of the coolies in Ceylon, the Government of Ceylon also appointed another committee of inquiry and that that Government now propose to take action on the recommendations of their committee. We learn also that these recommendations are favourable to the European capitalists and prejudicial to the poor Indian coolies. We are, therefore, surprised at the Local Government having merely announced the removal of restrictions in the matter of emigration of coolies to Ceylon, without giving any information to the people about the work of the new committee.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The American Navy.

21. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th March, says:—It is strange that while everybody is hoping that after the conclusion of peace, there will be a reduction in destructive weapons, the Americans are trying to increase their navy for three years. It is difficult to understand how such a step will help to promote peace.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mangalore, 25th Feb. 1919.

Japan and China.

22. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 25th February, writes:—Japan has the wicked ambition of taking China into her possession. China has come to know of this. At the instigation of Japan, China has not been treated with the respect she deserved at the Peace Conference. China is discontented in consequence. Japan wants to introduce the Munroe doctrine into Asia. Japan's attitude towards China shows how she has been blinded by power.

MYSORE STAR, Mysore, 23rd Feb. 1919.

Germany and the war.

23. In an article referring to Germany's unwillingness to fulfil the conditions of the armistice, the Mysore Star, of the 23rd February, after explaining that Germany is sure to be completely ruined if she should be so foolish as to renew fighting, proceeds to observe:—Though German leaders have themselves confessed recently that their internal affairs were so bad that they could not but sue for peace, there are some Indian Bolsheviks among us who in their pride regarding Germany find satisfaction in asserting that Germany has not been defeated at all.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

An attack on the President of the Peace Conference.

24. The Qaumi Report, of the 22nd February, referring to the dastardly attack made on the French Premier, writes:—Though such occurrences are common in Europe, extraordinary importance attaches to the outrage as the victim is the President of the Peace Conference. There is probably something behind it all.

European dynasties are frequently established by such unlawful means. The strange thing about it is that Europe spreads anarchy and puts the blame on Asia! e.g., to investigate the causes of sedition, a Rowlatt Commission was found to be necessary and now to prevent sedition a Rowlatt Act is regarded as essential. It is said that India contains a very large number of seditious germs and if they are not destroyed the Government will be overthrown. But we do not know that how many such youths there are in this unfortunate country who are capable of destroying kingdoms and overthrowing ministries.

It is said that there are some secret societies in India and several high officers have been assassinated. We do not understand how the germs of sedition and anarchism have been destroyed in Europe and how the continent of Asia can compete with even one of the islands of Europe.

25. The Qaumi Report, of the 1st March, commenting on the reply given by Sir William Vincent on behalf of the Government regarding the question of the Khalifate raised by the Hon'ble Nawab Mir Asad Ali Khan Bahadur at the Imperial Legislative Council, observes:—The Home Member has failed to realize the importance of the question or to frankly reassure the Muhammadans. The Government had promised to preserve the sanctity of the holy places but the explanation which it now offers after the lapse of three years is really amazing and compels us to express our regret. Lord Curzon's interpretation of late Majesty's promise was simply astounding but now we have to admit that Sir William Vincent is not a whit inferior to his Lordship in his exegesis.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The Government and Khalifate.

The editor, referring to the reply given by the Honourable Member regarding the question of the restoration of the holy places to the Khalifate, writes:—

This is a question which will naturally be uppermost in the minds of at least seven crores of Indian Muhammadans and they earnestly hope that it may soon be settled. Although Sir William Vincent's reply is sympathetic and friendly but it cannot satisfy the desire of Muhammadans nor meet the needs of the case. Cannot His Majesty's Government go a step further? Surely the realm of sympathy is a vast one.

(b) Courts.

26. Referring to the decision in the case filed in England by Tilak against Sir Valentine Chirol, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 28th February, remarks:—The opponent is a personage like Chirol, who has the sympathies of the Bombay Government. Big retired officials such as Lord Sandhurst and Sir Richard Lamb are his witnesses. Further, the name Tilak itself is hateful to Government. Under these circumstances, whatever be the side on which truth and justice rest, almost everyone must have guessed beforehand, how far the decision would be in favour of Tilak. Such a decision of the goddess of justice as the above in a pure atmosphere like that of England is not undesirable (?) When we look into the biography of patriots like Tilak, we find that the greater portion of their intellect, energy, wealth and life has been used up in the struggle against the bureaucracy in India. Sometimes as a patriot and sometimes in individual capacity, sometimes for disproving extraordinary accusations such as sedition, at other times for clearing terrible charges of moral degradation such as the production of false documents—in these various ways was Tilak's priceless energy spent. If this is not due to the present crooked times then it must be due to the great ill-luck of India.

27. The Hindu Nesan, of the 26th February, reproduces in Tamil 'Bulletin' No. 2 on this subject issued by Mr. G.S. Arundale, which contains an observation to the following effect:—It is said that many of the leaders hitherto regarded by us as supremely trustworthy have been bribed by the Government and have consequently changed their attitude at present and that certain others have adopted their present attitude with the hope of getting some high appointments.

Referring to the speech of Mr. Yusuf Ali in the Bedford College on elementary education, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st March, says under this heading:— . . . Considering the changes introduced by Mr. Fisher in England, it is the duty of the Government to introduce national education in India.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 13th Feb. 1919.

Education in the Madras Presidency.

28. Referring to the administration report of the Educational Department for the year 1917–18, the Vartakamitran, of the 13th February, observes:—Though statistics appear to be satisfactory, still when the population of the presidency and the amount of expenditure incurred are considered, the result does not appear to be commensurate with the labour involved. If financial aid is being rendered properly, there is no reason why the number of private schools should decrease by 9·3 per cent, while the number of public schools has shown an increase of 3·7 per cent. This gives room for one to suppose that the Educational Department is retarding the increase in the number of private institutions, with the object of showing that all the credit in the progress of education is due to them. It is a great mistake on the part of the Department to give room for such an impression. The people wish to have education under their control, while the department besides baffling their efforts in this direction, is intent upon its own improvement, regardless of the progress of education. What exactly is the nature of education which the people should get and how it should be imparted, can better be decided by the people and their representatives. So it behoves the department to bestir itself to create feeling in the public to become zealous in improving their education by establishing various kinds of schools as they like and by maintaining them, and is not proper for the department to waste public funds. If it errs in this matter, it is necessary that the Government should ask for proper explanations and rectify it. If the Government who are of opinion that the Indians are not fit to discharge their own responsibilities, wish to take on themselves these responsibilities for ever, stifling, through the bureaucrats, the little amount of spirit in the people, it is beyond the possibility of not only the British but also of any Government on earth to make the people fit to take up their own responsibilities.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar and vernacular newspapers.

29. Adverting to one of the resolutions to be moved by the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar at the next meeting of the Madras Legislative Council, to the effect that this Council recommends to His Excellency the Governor in Council that the vernacular newspapers should be permitted to report the proceedings of the Legislative Council, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th February, observes:—It is a well-known fact that the reporters of vernacular newspapers are not being allowed to attend the meetings of the Legislative Council so as to enable them to publish the proceedings of the Council then and there. In reply to a communication on this subject after the Desabhaktan was started, the Government informed us that there was no accommodation available for the correspondent of this paper in the Council Chamber and this reply took us by surprise. On learning since that two or three reporters are allowed into the Chamber for Anglo-Indian papers such as the Mail and the Times, we again wrote to the Government about the partial treatment, with the result that no reply has been received up to date. It is said that the reporter of the Swadesamitran alone is admitted. Perhaps the Government think that granting permission to this reporter will satisfy all the vernacular papers. While generally one reporter should be permitted for each paper, it is sheer partiality to allow two or three reporters for every Anglo-Indian paper and completely withhold permission to the reporters of the vernacular papers. The Legislative Council exists for the benefit of the public and the people are very eager to read the proceedings of its meetings. Most of the readers of vernacular papers are ignorant of English. It is, therefore, necessary that the reporters of these papers should be admitted to Council meetings, so that the proceedings of these meetings may be published in them then and there. We submit that it is not proper to show partiality in such trivial matters. If there is no accommodation available for the correspondents of these papers, why should not the Government provide additional accommodation for them? Where is the need to admit more than one reporter for papers such as the Mail, the Hindu, and the Times? We hope that Lord Pentland will note the spirit of this resolution and make suitable arrangements for the reporters of vernacular papers being treated in the same way as those of the English papers.

30. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st March, writes:—The President of the Transval Indian Association has sent a cable to this country to the effect that attempts are made in South Africa to obstruct and destroy Indian commerce. . . A bold attitude like that which was taken up by Lord Hardinge, should now be adopted and two prominent men should be sent from this country to hold an inquiry. Otherwise, Mr. Gandhi says that South Africa cannot but be disturbed once more by the passive resistance movement. . . Once more, the South African problem confronts us. Unless India soon gets the status of self-governing colonies, it will be readily understood that she cannot command respect, whatever be the attempts made.

31. While expressing regret at the decision of the Government to remove the Medical School at Calicut to Coimbatore, the Manorama, of the 21st February, points out that the Government will be doing immense good to the people if they give pecuniary aid to some women of Malabar to undergo training in midwifery for which, it says, Calicut will be an excellent centre as there is a women's hospital at that place. It also points out that at present many delivery cases prove fatal as they are conducted by ignorant women of the dhobi caste, and invites the attention of the Government to the matter.

The Medical School at Calicut.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 21st Feb. 1919.

Reverting to the subject of the transfer of the Medical School from Calicut to Coimbatore, the Manorama, of the 25th February, suggests that, as the report on Medical Schools for 1917–18 shows that the majority of the students of the Medical School belong to Malabar and the adjoining district of South Kanara and therefore the transfer of the school from Calicut is regrettable, and as Calicut is every way a more convenient centre for students, the Government of Madras may be pleased to reconsider the proposed transfer.

Adverting to the reference made by the Government of Madras to the Calicut Municipal Council regarding the introduction of the Prevention of Adulteration Act in the municipality, the Manorama, of the 25th February, considers that in view of the gross adulteration of milk, sour milk and ghee now practised there and the consequent danger to public health, the introduction of the Act is absolutely necessary.

34. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 24th February, in a leader on this subject writes:—It is not unknown to the public how seriously India has been affected by the ravages of this deadly disease and how rapidly it has reduced the population. The Government besides adopting every possible measure for the prevention of the disease has spent and is spending large sums of money under this head.

At present dissatisfaction is being caused among the Muhammadan community by the recent method of taking blood smears from the dead bodies of the Muhammadan men and women with the object of ascertaining whether death is due to plague and by the delay in internment occasioned by obtaining a death certificate.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 25th February, has the following letter from a correspondent, Moulvi Haji Muhammad Habibullah Sahib, son of the Chief Kazi Shums-ul-ulama Haji Moulvi Obeidullah Sahib, in which he enumerates the points opposed to religion.

Certain of the Plague Regulations that have been introduced by the Corporation authorities for the prevention of this disease are such that Islam from a sanitary point of view agrees fully with them, while others are so objectionable that Muhammadans neither accept nor tolerate them inasmuch as they are opposed to the sacred law and antagonistic to religion.

(1) It is contrary to Islam to take blood smears from a dead body whether male or female or to mutilate it in any way.

(2) It is not permissible in Islam that a woman should be unveiled and seen by a person who is not a relative and therefore a privileged person.

(3) Religion commands that a body should be buried expedetiously. In other words it is opposed to the religious sentiments to delay internment simply for the purpose of obtaining a certificate.

Co-operative Credit Societies.

37. The Swadesamitran, of the 25th February, reproduces in Tamil an abstract of the address recently delivered by Sir Daniel Hamilton in the Bengal Co-operative Conference, and, adverting to a statement made by him that Indian politicians demand control over the purse which, however is empty and to a touching reference in the address to the position of India in the British Empire, observes:—Want of money is the cause of India's poverty in every respect and if this money is made easily available for the agriculturists at low rates of interest, the country will be saved. Sir Daniel has clearly said that it behoves the Government to do this and also points out the large revenues derived by them by means of import and export duties, the cash reserved by them in exchange for the paper currency and the profit in minting silver. If all these funds, instead of being kept in England, are retained and utilized in India, there will be a large sum available for being advanced to agriculturists at easy rates of interest. The Indians have had an eye on these items for a long time but the Government, in spite of all representations, are keeping a major portion of these amounts in England itself and lending sums out of this only to millionaries like Messrs. Samuel & Co. in London on easy terms. Sir Daniel further states that a scheme should be framed for the formation of co-operative credit societies within a fixed period throughout the country.

Though the benefits resulting from these societies are borne out by experience, still a sufficient number of such societies have not yet been formed. When this movement was started, work progressed somewhat rapidly at the outset. Subsequently, somehow or other, the Government came to the conclusion that it was more important to improve the efficiency of the work of the existing societies than to start new ones. As a result of this, the growth in the number of societies has been retarded. Sir Daniel is opposed to this view. Realising that the movement will not progress at all if it should depend on non-officials, Sir Daniel urges that in every large province 200 officials should be appointed every year for the purpose. For the last seven or eight years, the Government have been hesitating in this matter with some suspicion about the development of the co-operative credit societies. The prosperity of the country will increase only if the societies grow in number and sufficient funds are made available for their transactions. Otherwise, the country will continue to be in the same state as at present like the water in a stagnant pool. Which of the two do the Government prefer?

38. The Desabhaktan, of the 25th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, certain extracts in which the following occur:—It is but right that the people of any country should safeguard their liberty. "I will never allow the liberty of the people of a country being guarded by the people of another country"—Henry Gratton. . . SWADESAMITRAN, & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919, HINDU NESAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

40. The Swadesamitran, of the 24th February, publishes, in Tamil, an abstract of an address delivered by Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal on the 23rd idem at Tondiarpet on this subject, in the course of which he is said to have observed as follows with reference to the Brahman-non-Brahman controversy in South India:—Every one in the country should secure voting franchise and have the right of electing popular representatives. The administration of the country should be conducted in accordance with the wishes of these representatives. Non Brahmans should strive to secure this condition, and there is no good in contesting for Government appointments. Let us suppose that a member of a community gets a high office. Of what benefit is it to that community? If, on account of such petty matters, differences should crop up among us, the authorities will act like the monkey who acted as a mediator in the story of the cats. Where is the guarantee that they will not wrest back the next day the post which they give today?

Social reforms.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

41. Referring to the Viceroy's speech in the last session of the Imperial Legislative Council, the Vartakamitran, of the 20th February, observes:—The Viceroy has said that India could not have attained this condition but for the exertion of the European merchants and Indian Civil Service officials. This is the most veritable of truths. Every one would have found out whether the present condition of India is one to evoke praise or commisseration. The condition of Indian trade is too well known. The observations made by the Viceroy with reference to the interests of European merchants provoke laughter in us. He speaks as if, in consequence of the reforms to be introduced, the Indians are going to get certain unexpected privileges and think of sending back all European officials and merchants bag and baggage immediately there after and the Government of India are going to prevent such a contingency. What are the benefits to be derived by the Indians from the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals? As the adage goes, that the new flood carried away even the old one, it appears that even the little liberty now enjoyed by the people's representatives will be wrested away from them. . . Similarly, if Indians are appointed ministers and the British officials under them are not required to act according to their words, will the administration run smooth? There will be always a hitch between the officials and the ministers. It is only the officials and the European merchants that were till now carrying on the administration of India. It is not known what disadvantages these merchants will suffer from. While there is no reason for their influence to diminish, it is not apparent why the bureaucrats should give them such an assurance. At the time the Minto-Morley reforms were introduced, agreeably to the requirement that the non-official element should preponderate in the Legislative Councils, the bureaucrats reserved for themselves the right of nominating certain Indians who would act according to their wishes. Now, one has to infer that the Indian Civil Service officers are allowed the right of appeal to the Government of India to see that their object is fulfilled, in rendering the appointment of ministers ineffective.

The Viceroy's speech.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 20th Feb. 1919.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The Dravidan, of the 25th February, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, an article on this subject which contains the following observations:—The Viceroy attempts to please the Indian Civil Servants and the European merchants that found fault with him; but in spite of this we do not believe these two parties will have any faith in his words. In the beginning he endeavoured to please the Congress party and now he tries to draw to his side the Anglo-Indians as he did the so-called moderates. But he is still indifferent towards us, in spite of our loyalty and our assistance in the war. If he, who is praising the services rendered by India in the war, had but considered deeply whether it was the Brahman Home Rulers or the non-Brahmans that rendered such services, he would have become convinced as to whose interests it was indispensable for him to protect. He only wants to please the Brahmans who stood in the way of collecting funds for the war, but does not think of those who shed their blood in the war profusely. Now to fulfil his own object, he extended the term of the members of the Legislative Council. Perhaps he feared that, in case this was not done, non-Brahman members would be returned to the Council at the next election and they would demand our rights. We have realized that this Viceroy will not do anything for us. As the views of the Viceroy, Mr. Montagu and the Reform Committees are all against our interests, let us work with zeal in the matter of sending our deputation to England promptly.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

. Referring to the same speech, the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th February, remarks:—The Viceroy's views are in favour of the Anglo-Indian party. It appears that, out of sympathy with that party, all endeavours will be made to restrict and curtail the reforms as much as possible. Democratic rule is what we ask for; but we fear that we will be given that only in name. All are aware of the revolt of the Indian Civil Service officials in India. We have to infer that with a view to humour them, the Government will act without caring for the good of the people. It appears that, under the Reform Scheme, the civilians would continue to exercise their powers in the same irresponsible way as at present and that the Indian ministers to be newly appointed will be mere figure-heads. Is the post of the minister who is not empowered to control his subordinates worth the name? Perhaps the selection for these posts will be made from among those who, being incapable of acting independently, will go according to the ways of the official class. Again, under the Reform Scheme, all countries will, without any restriction, be freely allowed to compete in the Indian market. Though such defects are found in the reform proposals, we expected that certain differences which at present exist between the Indian and the European merchants in the matter of trade will disappear. Our hope that an impartial treatment would be given to European and Indian merchants was blighted by the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy.

VARTAKAMITRAN, Tanjore, 20th Feb. 1919.

42. Remarking that the bureaucrats in India, as elsewhere, are caring only for their own interests, the Vartakamitran, of the 20th February, observes:—The Indian bureaucracy is in several respects at variance with the public. This espouses the cause of the English merchants. It is only on account of trade that the British first came to India. If there were no scope for trade in India they would not care much for her. As the bureaucrats are greatly interested in safeguarding their own interests as well as those of the merchants of their class, they wish to protect the mercantile interests of the Englishmen even as a miser would endeavour to guard his hoard They feel that the European system of education given to the Indians has ended suicidally to their interests. What can be done? They cannot now go back on their own words that the Anglo-Indians have all along been working only for the good of India. It is not possible for the Anglo-Indian commercial community to understand aright the real nature of the Indians having failed to do so even after moving with them closely for the last 150 years. It is only due to the natural bent of the Indians, and not to the efficiency of the Englishmen, that the people continued to be peaceful and to act with responsibility even at the time of the war when they were in the midst of agitations. The Anglo-Indian community fail to realize whether the world will not laugh at their action in beating their trumpet at times of success but shirking their responsibility and finding fault with the Indians for want of wisdom at times of reverses. While speaking about the mercantile interests of the Englishmen in India, the Viceroy says that the English merchants have invested large capital in India. Was there no wealth in India when these merchants first came here? Was there no civilization, no industry? What makes the Viceroy hold such a view?

The present situation.

The present famine.

The Manorama, of 25th February, observes that the statement made by Sir Claude Hill at the Imperial Legislative Council on the Food problem in India carries with it deep disappointment to all the people of India. The burden of the statement is that the Government have done everything possible in the matter, yet the present famine continues unabated. If the Government have exhausted all their resources, in their attempt to tackle the food problem and can do nothing more, it is no wonder that the people should stand bewildered, not knowing to whom else they can look for succour, and suggests that the Government should make a very careful inquiry whether the present famine may not be due to the holding back of stocks by wholesale dealers holding import licences and whether the granting of facilities and licences to petty dealers may not relieve the situation, because while wholesale dealers are bent on profiteering petty dealers cannot afford to hold back stocks but will sell them readily.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 25th Feb. 1919.

The Kerala Sanchari, of the 26th February, in its leading article on 'Famine' refers to the same statement of Sir Claude Hill and expresses confidence in the Government that they will never neglect or delay necessary action. Referring in particular to Malabar, the paper wishes that the authorities and the leaders will forget, for the time being, the theory that Malabar is a land flowing with milk and honey, and co-operate to prevent the impending famine.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 26th Feb. 1919.

Cottage industries.

43. Remarking that, in spite of the several advantages that can be derived from these industries, neither the Government nor the patriots have come forward to devote proper attention to their improvement and that co-operation, agriculture and cottage industries being kindred subjects, great benefit will result if the heads of these departments should work in consultation with each other, the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th February, observes:—The development of these industries is essential in the interests of our country. It is regrettable that the Industries Commission have not gone deep into the question of improving these industries. They have failed to investigate how far the principles of co-operation can be applied to them. The Government should resolve to work with earnestness in this matter. They should find out which village industries can be promoted by means of co-operation. They should depute competent persons for starting industrial societies in various places. All these require liberal help at the hands of the Government. From their attitude as far as we know, the Government are not likely to evince much interest in this matter. Ways should be devised for the promotion of industries by means of co-operative efforts. The hardships of villagers will come to an end if industrial societies are started in every village with a central society to maintain them. This view should be followed by the Government and our patriots.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

Mr. Tilak's case.

44. Referring to the loss of Mr. Tilak's case against Sir Valentine Chirol, the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th February, observes:—The defendant in this case is a European, strong and influential, and has won the good-will and support of many in political matters. Is it not hard to oppose such a person in his own country and win? The jury consisting entirely of Englishmen, it can be inferred that they will all be favourable to the defendant. Further, a prejudice has already been created against him in England by a misrepresentation of his patriotic deeds. Many of us anticipated that he would lose his case for these reasons and our anticipations have been realised.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The Tilak case.

Regarding Mr. Tilak's case against Sir Valentine Chirol, the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th February, remarks:—. . . Addressing the Jury, Sir Edward Carson said that a verdict might be given in favour of Mr. Tilak, but that they should, in that case, consider the effect on the Government of India and the White officials in India.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

It is not at all surprising, therefore, that the Jury has given a verdict against Mr. Tilak in such circumstances. When the Jurors' minds have been prepossessed by political opinions and racial prejudices, it is not possible to get justice.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Mar. 1919

Mr. Tilak's suit.

Referring to the judgment in the Tilak-Chirol case, the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st March, observes:—. . . Our readers must be aware of how, since this suit was filed, Sir Valentine Chirol had been busy in this country gathering with the help of the authorities copies of diaries prepared by the Criminal Investigation Department officers, and how at one time Mr. Tilak who was on his way to England was asked by the Government to return to India, lest his presence should create unrest among the British public then. Subsequently, a passport was granted to him, because it would be partial not to grant it to him after Doctor Nayar was given one, or for some other reason. . . Be it as it may, a verdict has been given to the effect that the abuses of Sir Chirol are not against law. It may be imagined how matters would have been, if Mr. Tilak had written like this about any Englishman. . .

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

45. In an article contributed by a correspondent to the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th February, wherein he dwells at length on the inordinate rise in the price of foodstuffs, the following observations find place among others:— The recent appointment by the Government of the Director of Civil Supplies in Madras has been the cause for the rise in the prices of articles and this increase in prices could have been averted, if the procedure adopted by the Director in Bombay for the transport of articles in that Presidency had been followed here also. The rent of dwelling houses is going on increasing on account of the rise in the price of articles, such as timber, chunam and tiles. All this has to be attributed only to the indifference on the part of the Government. They should make arrangements for articles, being sold at such prices as will enable one with an income of Rs. 15 per month to eke out a living with a wife without incurring debts. When the Hon'ble Mr. Narasimha Ayyar recently pointed out at a meeting of the Madras Legislative Council that the question of high prices should be considered, the President neither permitted it nor cared to hear it. So long as the Government are obstinate in their view that all that is done by their servants is right while all that is done by others is wrong, of what avail will be the fund of information furnished by the representative members in the Legislative Council?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

Food situation.

Referring to the present high price of rice, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th February, observes:—Though export of rice has been prohibited from the Kistna district and the price regulated, still the price of rice is increasing day by day, and the intermediate merchants are even now making a profit of Rs. 3 per bag. In spite of the rule that only a profit of not more than 8 annas should be charged, some merchants in Negapatam have sold at a profit of Rs. 1½ to 2 per bag. When the merchants in the mufassal districts allow the wholesale importing dealer a profit of one and a half rupees, it is needless to say how high the price will rise when it reaches the poor consumer. Under the orders of the Director of Civil Supplies a bag of two maunds of rice sells in Negapatam for Rs. 11-10-3 and the same bag when transported to Erode or Coimbatore, a profit of one and a half rupees is charged on it exclusive of cart hire and railway freight. Accordingly, rice should be sold at 3½ measures per rupee, but in practice it is difficult to get even three measures. The local officers and the committee of inquiry are indifferent in this matter. Hereafter at least, they should direct their attention to this and fix the price of specific varieties of rice. As, in some local committees, the importing licensees are themselves members, it becomes impossible for them to do their duties properly. Poor illiterate people are unable even to find out whether the prices they pay are proper for the articles they get in return. So, if the Government should fix the rates for which Rangoon rice and broken rice should be sold in each district, poor people will not be deceived. Every one begins to despond as to what should be done if the conditions continue like this for some time more. Judging from the present situation, there is room to think that people are prepared even to commit looting being unable to bear the pangs of hunger.

The food situation.

The Swadesamitran, of the 27th February, observes:—The retail prices of rice show that no material benefit has resulted by the regulation of the price of Burma rice and by the reduction of shipping freights. From the words of Sir Claud Hill in a recent meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, it is clear that grains are exported from India to other countries to a small extent. It is the opinion of the people that export of grains should be completely stopped while the Indians are suffering. If as a result of the efforts of the Government, the difficulties of the rice consumer only enhance day by day, there is no doubt that the amount spent on the officers appointed for the purpose is only a waste.

SWADESAMITRAN Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

Adverting, in its leader, to the various steps taken by the Government of India to relieve the hardship caused by the scarcity of foodstuffs, the Dravidan, of the 1st March, hopes that the Government of India would give Provincial Governments independent powers to enable them to take necessary steps for relieving the distress in their respective provinces, as it is only these that realize very well the true condition and the needs of the people there.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

In an article contributed by a correspondent to the Swadesamitran, of the 1st March, on the present price of rice and on the scarcity of kerosene oil, the following observations find place among others:—While the authorities in other provinces are taking steps to avert this distress in many ways, it is specially unfortunate that the Government of Madras alone should remain idle. We have to apprehend serious consequences, if they still continue to be indifferent without adopting prompt measures in the matter. . . It is our ill-luck that the Government should abstain from showing any sympathy with the people, though such a stress has occurred.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

Food situation.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 27th February, contains a leader reproducing almost the same views as those expressed by the Desabhaktan, of the 25th idem, on this subject.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919. & DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The food situation.

The Desabhaktan, of the 1st March, publishes a long article, from the pen of a correspondent, on this subject in which he points out that the rule that a licence for importing rice will be granted only to those who purchase certain definite quantities makes it impossible for small dealers to import direct and supply the people at cheap prices and, referring to the fact that many big merchants, for example in Tanjore, are reported to be withholding large stocks of rice, suggests that, if this is true, the Government should fix a price for this rice and, buying off the whole quantity, supply the district and also open depots in several places for selling this rice to the poor at cheap rates. He complains that the Director of Civil Supplies does not consult the people in the districts in regulating the prices and attributes the increase in the price of rice to the action of the bookers, which he thinks will be checked, if the Government would adopt his suggestion of opening depots in different places for the sale of rice.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The situation.

Referring under this heading to the proposal that India should pay an additional contribution of 45 millions sterling towards the war expenses, the Andhravani, of the 22nd November 1918, observes:— . . . The Gujrat Sabha and the Sindh Provincial Congress Committee have protested against this proposal. In these days of severe famine and pestilence when the people everywhere are undergoing great suffering, and there is a general failure of crops, it will not be an easy thing for India to pay 675 crores of rupees. Since the war has come to a close, it will not be necessary to spend so much money for war purposes as was done before. We request the Government to withdraw the proposal in view of all these facts and afford hope for the people.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 22nd Nov. 1918.

The problem of foodstuffs.

In its leader under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 24th February, observes:—. . . There will be no hope, unless the Government take decisive action in the matter. When we write like this we should not be misunderstood to say that the Government have not done anything till now. They are doing their best for the solution of this problem. Only they do not seem to apply the remedy to the correct spot. . . Unless the Government deal with this problem more minutely, the people will be put to great hardship. . . The speech of the Hon'ble Sir Claude Hill, the Revenue Member, on this subject at the Imperial Legislative Council is not so encouraging. . . The Government think that their order to the effect that raw rice should sell at Rs. 11–4–0 a bag and boiled rice, at Rs. 11–12–0 from 1st March is being properly obeyed. There is one secret about this. The merchants in districts, who are dying from hard famine, are going to rice factories and purchasing rice, paying secretly a rupee or two more than the price fixed by the Controller. . . We beg to point out that the Government will do well to encourage those private philanthropic gentlemen who are willing to open depots and sell rice at the prices fixed by the Controller by enabling them to get rice wherever they can purchase it at a cheap price.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

The prices of foodstuffs.

Under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 26th February, observes:— . . The Government should note that the fact of such an abnormal rise in the prices of all necessaries of life, as was characteristic only of the severest type of famine reveals a situation which is more serious than any other matter, and it is their duty to give up the consideration of all other questions such as that of legislation and to try at once to remove the discontent which has spread among the people on account of the present high prices of foodstuffs, which are many times more than those prevailing in the worst famine days. . . Let alone political rights. We submit that it is their most sacred duty to see that the people of this country get two full meals a day, and thus to release them from their present miserable condition.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Lala Lajput Rai.

46. Referring to the reply of the Secretary of State for India to Commander Wedgewood, that permission will not at present be accorded to Mr. Lala Lajput Rai to proceed to England from America and that this question will be reconsidered after the peace proposals are signed, the Desabhaktan, of the 26th February, observes:—What does this signify? Is Mr. Lala an accused? If so, he could be well made to take his trial in America alone; or, if he goes over to England he can be tried there. What danger can be fall England if he is to come there? Why such a fear for a big State which was victorious over the Germans?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

A public meeting at Tuticorin.

47. The Desabhaktan, of the 26th February, publishes a summary of the proceedings of a public meeting held at Tuticorin on the 23rd idem protesting against even the temporary enactment of the Rowlatt Bills, the attitude of the Indian Civil Service officials with reference to the reforms and the high price of rice in spite of supplies from Burma.

DESABHAKTAN & SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Present political situation.

48. The Desabhaktan and the Swadesamitran, of the 26th February, publish in Tamil, an abstract of the proceedings of public meeting held in the Triplicane beach on the 25th idem, at the close of which an address was delivered on this subject by Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

Good intentions and bad training.

49. The Desabhaktan, of the 27th February, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments of the leader of New India of the 26th idem under this heading, commenting at length on the statement of Lord Willingdon, to the effect that India's progress will be more rapid if the Servants of India Society could get the Indian public to drop unnecessary suspicions and to realize that the bureaucrats are striving for the good of the people.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Extension of tramways.

50. Referring to the discussion by the Madras Corporation about the extension of tramway lines to Teynampet, Saidapet and other places, the Hindu Nesan, of the 26th February, observes that congestion in the city will in a way be relieved by the proposed extension and low-paid men who, for want of proper accommodation, now occupy insanitary and congested quarters in Chintadripet, Park Town, etc.

may remove to those places and live comfortably, and hopes that the work will be taken up in view to the convenience of the people.

Duty on sugar.

51. Referring to the suggestion of some persons to enhance the import duty on Java sugar, the Hindu Nesan, of the 27th February, writes:—This step should not be taken in haste. Increase of duty on sugar may perhaps be beneficial to the Indian sugar trade. As the price of sugar in India is already high, it will not be right to further enhance the duty simply with the idea that this increase of duty will ever be pleasing to the Indians. The advantage to be derived by the manufacturers and consumers of sugar by such enhancement should be calmly investigated.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

Territorials in India.

52. Referring to the urgent call to England of the 'Territorials' who have been in India for the last four years and to the attempts of the British Government to send fresh troops in their place, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th February, observes:—It appears that this will entail inconvenience and delay. Should troops be still sent for from England for the defence of India? Why not Indians be appointed? Has not this war clearly proved that the Indians can be well trusted? If, in spite of this, troops are still to be had only from England, it will not be compatible with the self-respect of the Indians, nor will it be in consonance with the view that the Indians will be granted a responsible form of government.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

The Provincial heads.

53. Reproducing an extract from a letter written by a correspondent from Bankipur to the Amrita Bazaar Patrika about the head of the province, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th February, observes:—Though Provincial heads are full of broad views and sympathies, no material benefit would result to the people, so long as many of the members of the Executive Council and the bureaucrats that surround them hold narrow views and lack sympathy. Our Lord Pentland belongs to the Liberal party, and while in England he is reported to have held very broad views and a liberal heart. But the moment he came to Madras and began to associate with the bureaucrats, his views as a liberal had completely changed.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 27th Feb. 19.9.

The bureaucrats in India.

54. Remarking that, though history says that the British always preach liberty, equality and fraternity to the people of any country that they may occupy and rule, India has not yet properly tasted the sweets of liberty in spite of her having been under their rule for 150 years, the Desabhaktan, of the 1st March, attributes this to the fact that India has not been governed by the bureaucrats in consonance with British justice and glory and has been subjected to several hardships under their administration, adding at the same time that, by this, it should not be taken to find fault with the British for whose righteousness and justice, it says, it has the highest respect. It cites the fact of the resolution passed in the House of Commons in 1853 that Government appointments in India should be conferred on all people, irrespective of class differences, and the promise in the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 that the Indians would be treated as British subjects not having been given effect to wholly, and the stoppage of the Home Rule deputations on their way to England as instances to prove that it is the opposition of the bureaucrats and Anglo-Indians here that has prevented the Home Government from carrying out its wishes and, observing that the Indian Civil Service movement is another instance to show that the bureaucrats attach a greater importance to their own position and salary than to the progress of India, says that England and India will be greatly benefited only after the promises of the British Government are fulfilled truly and justly in practice.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 3rd March, generalises that all the countries under the sway of bureaucrats have to lose their liberty and suffer and, pointing out that the appearance of Bolshevism in Russia and the attempt of the Young Turks to create a disturbance in Turkey are due only to the rule of bureaucrats, observes:—The system of administration by the bureaucrats can now be said to have almost become extinct in Europe, but in India alone the time has not yet come for its disappearance, and it is not known when it will come. The bureaucrats here are doing everything in their own way, arrogant with the feeling that there is no one superior to them. We expected that the close of the war would synchronise with the disappearance of the bureaucratic system of administration here, but, to the disadvantage of India, the Viceroy has patted the bureaucrats on their back and perpetuated their administration. Mr. H. A. L. Fisher has stated that India cannot attain political progress until the bureaucrats conduct the Government subject to the Legislative Council. So we should strive day and night for getting rid of the bureaucratic system of administration.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

Western civilization!

55. In a short note under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 3rd March, asks whether western gentlemen who condemn the Indian system of marriage are aware of the fact that in this twentieth century a society has been started in England, which professes to spread the lustre of civilization throughout the world, for protecting unmarried mothers and the children born of them.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

56. The Desabhaktan, of the 1st March, comments as follows upon the order of Government forfeiting the security deposited by the British India Press, where this paper is printed:—Though there was a rumour for the last one month and a half that the security of the Desabhaktan would be forfeited, we took it to be a false one. But it has now turned out to be true. It is for the readers to go through the four articles noted in the order as well as the English translations thereof by the Government very carefully and understand the truth. They should note that the fourth article is teeming throughout with expressions of loyalty. Our bureaucrats are doing many things against right principles and justice without investigating matters fully. This may not be discernible to man but is seen by God. We do not think Lord Pentland is aware of the object of the Desabhaktan. It is only that there should be a constitutional agitation to acquire Home Rule subject to the British Government. We have always been speaking in praise of the British Government. But we will now and always oppose the wicked bureaucratic system of administration. We will not be afraid in the least to criticise it. If Lord Pentland is to understand the object of the Desabhaktan, he should read it every day. When the matter in it is translated into English, its ideas and objects are altered and the purpose of the articles is not brought out clearly in the English translation. The authorities never go through an article in full before they find fault with it. They rely only upon portions of it. An article can be understood only if the whole of it is studied. Then again, one judging about a work has to proceed with an impartial mind. If he starts with a prejudice, even the good ideas in it will appear bad to him. This is the fault of his mind and not of the work. The Government may say that some of the articles referred to by them tend to create a class hatred against the Anglo-Indians. Perhaps other papers inciting class hatred are not sent for the perusal of Lord Pentland. Does his Executive Council know why the Desabhaktan finds fault with the Anglo-Indians? We have no hatred towards the Anglo-Indians as a class. But we do hate the actions of some of them. Volumes can be written about the incidents in which Anglo-Indians insulted and afflicted the Indians. If we criticise the actions of the Anglo-Indians, it provokes the bureaucrats. Some papers in Madras are always reviling the Brahmans and Indians as a class. Does not the Press Act apply to them? Perhaps they are privileged under the Madras Government! Of the many benefits conferred by Lord Pentland on this Presidency, the three that it will never forget are the internment of Mrs. Besant, the imprisonment of Varadarajulu and the forfeiture of the Desabhaktan. The last act will leave an indelible impression on Lord Pentland's mind. It is really surprising that he should have ventured to crush this paper, which, cherishing a feeling of loyalty, desired for liberty. Alas, what can he do? His seat is like that. Need we dilate upon the benevolent act of his councillors, Sir Alexander Cardew and Diwan Bahadur Rajagopala Achariyar? What else can we say but that it is the result of the penance of this Presidency that at the time when the war of liberty is begun these three deities are on the Madras Executive Council. We are very sorry that Mr. Gillman is not alive now. On the eve of his departure, Lord Pentland has granted a medal of merit to the Desabhaktan. The Madras bureaucrats have classed the Desabhaktan as a nationalist paper. So he has passed in the test of the bureaucrats and this will only gladden the Desabhaktan and his friends. O Goddess Bharata! Will you see again the pranks of the Desabhaktan, a child of a year and three months? Alas! Your condition has come to this! But do not shed tears. Your sons are not dried trees. They are heroes and saints. They will maintain the Desabhaktan. O Lord Pentland! We express our gratitude to you. Have you finished all your work? You have forfeited the security without even a warning. As this amount goes to the Government, we are really glad about it. The editor of the Desabhaktan is ready to swear in any form that his paper never published anything against the British Government.

The paper then makes an appeal for funds.

It remarks elsewhere that it was under the impression that certificates of merit would be conferred on papers like the Desabhaktan only after the Rowlatt Bills have been passed into law and that the haste with which Lord Pentland gave this certificate (to the Desabhaktan) was perhaps due to his decision to confer it before his approaching departure and adds:—He tasted the sweets of the power conferred on him by the Defence of India Act, a war measure, when he interned Mrs. Besant. So will he not be desirous of tasting the sweets of the application of the Rowlatt law, a measure intended for peaceful times? He declared the security of the Desabhaktan forfeited perhaps only to satisfy this desire!

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

Referring with regret to the action of the Government against the Desabhaktan, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st March, observes:—The Press Act empowers the Government to bring within its unlimited scope any article which is not to their taste though it may not be culpable under the ordinary law, and order the forfeiture of the security. It has, therefore, become impossible for the editors always to write without transgressing this Act. The dangerous sword is ever hovering over the head unless the articles are written in such a way as not to wound the feelings of the authorities. The Desabhaktan has been criticising the actions of the Government and the officials in the manner it deemed lest, with its conscience and service to the country as standard, availing itself of the liberty which newspapers have or ought to have. Probably its work has displeased the Government on that account. How is it possible for the editor of any paper to continue his work when once he incurs the displeasure of the Government? The Press Act serves as a suitable tool to crush the editors. It is certain that the action of the Government in having made the Desabhaktan and its editor victims to the severity of this Act, will cause grief to the public which cannot be alleviated. As, in the present condition of the country, the Tamil world can ill afford to lose the services of that paper or its editor, it behoves the public to render the required assistance for the continuance of that paper. A perusal of the articles pointed out as objectionable shows that it is curious on the part of the Government to have formed that opinion of them. We are at a loss to know what special features there are in these articles which are likely to create hatred against the Government. If these articles are considered to be objectionable, then it will become impossible to find fault with the Government in any way. Is that the object of the Government? If so, the newspapers may well be deprived of the privilege of criticism now enjoyed by them.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

Adverting to this subject, the Lokopakari, of the 3rd March, says:—To a man with jaundiced eyes, everything will appear yellow. Similarly everything will appear a crime to those who look with a prejudiced mind. This applies to newspapers and to authorities. . . Numerous papers should appear in our country at this juncture when a new spirit of liberty is spreading throughout the world, for the purpose of preaching the mutual duties of the Government and the people. Without understanding this fact, the Desabhaktan has got into trouble. It is necessary that patriots should render assistance to safeguard the Desabhaktan while this paper should also note whether anything can avail before the authority of the Government.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 3rd March, publishes the opinions of the Swadesamitran, New India, the Hindu and the Nationlist about this order of Government.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Deeabhaktan, of the 3rd March, refers to this subject and writes:—The bureaucrats have rendered a great help to the Desabhaktan, which we will never forget. This can be said to have increased its influence. We have, on several occasions, noted that patriotism increases through the repressive measures of the bureaucrats. As it is the Desabhaktan used to be read by our friends zealously and there is no doubt that that zeal will hereafter increase a hundredfold. Our friends know how the eyes of India were opened by the actions of Lord Curzon and a great agitation resulted from the internment of Mrs. Besant. Man may try to suppress man. But God will not swerve from impartiality and do injustice. It is, indeed, the result of our penance that Lord Pentland, who is like Lord Curzon, has become the Governor of Madras. By his actions, the nationalist party is growing strong in this Presidency. . . It is impossible for any one to control the Desabhaktan. Its zeal will fear neither mountains nor rivers. It will continue unabated. How can we adequately express our gratitude to the bureaucrats, who were the cause of this? . . . The four articles noted in the order of the Government cannot stand in a court of law. So we propose to take the case before a court. This requires sufficient pecuniary assistance. Every friend should contribute his mite and put the action of the bureaucrats to shame. This is the time for exhibiting the strength of the patriotism of the Tamil land and making the bureaucrats tremble.

The same paper has a leaderette in which it says:—Lord Pentland, with this evil advisers, has immersed the vessel of Desabhaktan. We wish Lord Pentland knows that, whatever might be done, the Desabhaktan will reach the shore again and perform its duty well, with great zeal and enthusiasm. It will not be afraid of anything. It came out to establish righteousness and has a divine tinge about it. No man can crush it. It stands by the justice of God and a few obstacles that crop up in its way will prove eventually to be beneficial to it. What can be done by Lord Pentland, who has vowed to govern the Indians, keeping them under subjection? . . . . Brethren! Was it found possible to do away with Prahlada? As long as the Desabhaktan follows truth and justice, Lord Pentland and his associates cannot do anything to it. It will be serving Mother Bharata for ever. The feeling that they have power and influence in their hands at present has made the bureaucrats begin to suppress the persons and newspapers serving Mother Bharata. . . But the bureaucrats should note that the Indians will not flinch to bear the hardships imposed on them and that they have a soul-force. The more the cruelties committed by the bureaucrats, the greater will be the discontent and unrest among the Indians. In Ireland the British bureaucrats suppressed Irish papers and Irish leaders by cruel repressive laws and adopted many evil ways to prevent the development of political agitation there. But was it of any use? The Irishmen have now established a republic and threaten the British Government that there should be nothing British in Ireland. . . The Irish papers cry out that the present disturbed condition of Ireland is due to the cruel acts of the British bureaucrats. The bureaucrats, who are governing India as they like, are committing many cruel acts blindly. As we condemn their mischievous deeds, they pounce upon us. We would tell them that their pouncing will be in vain. The Desabhaktan prays for the longevity of the British rule in India. Without realising this and understanding the real significance of the articles in the Desabhaktan, without forethought and mercy, without any experience of British statesmanship and without any idea of British principles and justice, Lord Pentland has aimed an arrow at this paper. Patriots! Arise, arise to support the Desabhaktan!

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd March, observes that the editor of the Desabhaktan is very ardent in appealing to the people to demand a change in the administration favourable to themselves and hopes that his action, which had no motive behind it, will be excused, though it may prove to be a mistake.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 4th March, reproduces the above.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The policy of repression.

57. The Desabhaktan, of the 3rd March, observes:—It is very necessary that the Government of India should note at present the events which occurred in Ireland and be careful.

It will not at all do to introduce repressive laws now, as was done in the time of Lords Minto and Morley to spoil the reforms. It is usual with autocratic governments to seek to suppress, by means of illegal repressive laws, those who carry on political agitation on constitutional lines. The bureaucrats have introduced the Rowlatt Bills as a reward for the Indians having demonstrated their loyalty during the period of the war and stood resolute without creating a disturbance, though they were induced to do so and they knew they could succeed. Such repressive laws not only curtail the liberty of the subjects but also dim the lustre of loyalty. So it is necessary that the bureaucrats should be careful in this matter.

58. The Desabhaktan, of the 3rd March, publishes the following sayings of eminent men among others :—' O Indians ! Be up and doing. No one can block you. A spirit of liberty has appeared in India. Remember that every community has advanced only by its own efforts.—A. O. Hume.

Stray sayings.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

' Patriots should take a vow in respect of the progress of their country. It is the action of the bureaucrats that necessitates such a vow.—Ambikacharan Muzumdar.

' . . . You must have the strong confidence that you have been born to do mighty things for the progress of the country. Do not be afraid of the barking of dogs or the thunder of the clouds. But get up and work with attention.—Swami Vivekananda.

' It is unrest that is the cause of all advancement. It is this that stimulates the progress of our community. By means of this, we can reform the future—Surendranath Bannerjea.

59. The Desabhaktan, of the 24th February, reproduces in Tamil from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika certain comments on the action of the Principal of St. Paul's College, Calcutta, who is said to have thrown into the dustbin the idol of Saraswati kept by the students in the premises of the College hostel in the course of which the following observations find place :—Missionaries like this Principal probably expect here a religious war like the one that was waged in Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. But the action of these missionaries makes it necessary for the Indians to strengthen their right to follow a general principle in particular buildings and compounds. These missionaries are preaching in public streets and publishing handbills containing matter disparaging to the Hindus and yet the latter are not checking the former. Now the missionaries are making the Hindus repent for their tolerance. The new religious propagandist method adopted by the missionaries is a very dangerous one.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

60. The Desabhaktan, of the 25th February, publishes an article, from the pen of a correspondent, in which he concludes, from the recent discussion in Parliament about improving the economic condition of the British Empire, that the aim of the British statesmen seems to be to increase the future earning capacity of every Britisher by preventing foreigners trading freely within British territories and making the British partners in every trade and industry carried on by each country and, remarking that, as the Colonies and other self-governing countries have been excluded from this scheme, the economic future of India is rather gloomy, especially in the face of the Viceroy's words of encouragement to the British merchants in his recent speech, says that India cannot derive any benefit from the reforms unless she is granted fiscal autonomy also.

The economic future of India.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

61. The Desabhaktan, of the 25th February, continues the article under this heading from its issue of the 19th idem (article No. 55 of Report No. 9 of 1919), in which the writer says :—Next to the House of Commons, it is the big merchants and owners of big factories in England that wield the largest influence in Indian affairs. These will not be in favour of granting Home Rule to India, on account of the fear that it will affect their goods being sold in this country. It is in their interests that the administration of India should be conducted from England, so that they can represent their grievances to the authorities there and introduce legal measures, which may even be prejudicial to the Indians. So there is nothing surprising in their attitude regarding Home Rule for India. But the Labour leaders in England will be ready to help in the matter of India acquiring Home Rule, for they know that India, which has lost all industrial training, has to depend on foreigners for putting them in the way and that, if India grows richer and continues on friendly terms with England, it will only lead to the Indians going in for English articles on a much larger scale. To make their help useful, the Home Rule agitation should be carried on here incessantly, generally the people of England pay no attention to Indian affairs. To add to this there are some Anglo-Indians there, who have retired from high appointments in India and are enjoying handsome pensions, who always condemn the proposal of granting Home Rule to India. Their opposition is due to the fear that they will lose their easy living. To remove the ill-feeling of these men, efforts made while they are in service in India will be more effective than any made in England. If they are impressed well, while here, of the strong desire of the Indians for Home Rule, it will be impossible for them to oppose it after their return to England. Further it should not be forgotten that there are some honest men even among them.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

This article is continued even in the Desabhaktan, of the 26th February, the concluding portion of which runs as follows:—Home Rule is now the panacea for all evils in India and if she does not acquire it, the very race of Indians will perish. They are becoming victims to a horrible type of poverty. There is no useful education in the country. Epidemics are present always. The few remedies adopted by the English rule have not been of any use. It looks as if the Indian race is speeding fast towards its complete destruction. It can gradually revive only if it obtains Home Rule before then.

62. The Desabhaktan, of the 27th February, publishes in Tamil a communication by six Mussalman gentlemen appealing to the Muhammadans, with the permission of the large number of Mussalmans in Nagur, to support this Bill and see it passed, on the ground that it does not violate the laws of Muhammadan religion, and that, for putting an end to the troubles arising in connexion with the registration of marriages and divorces, a bill of the kind is necessary in the interests of the Moslem community.

63. Adverting to the announcement made by Sir James Meston that a new loan of 15 crores of rupees called the victory loan will be raised in India, the Desabhaktan, of the 4th March, says:—The sum of 15 crores of rupees is not a big thing for India which gave far bigger sums as loan on two previous occasions. But, considering the high prices prevailing at present and the hardships caused to the people thereby, we have to deem this now to be a big sum. Still we hope that the wealthy in our country will themselves pay this small amount, without any trouble to the middle and poorer classes.

The victory loan.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

64. In a short note under this heading, the Desabhaktan, of the 4th March, remarks that, as India is subject to England in political matters, some people wrongly think that she will be a slavish country in other respects too and adds:—As India has no political rights, her requests are not heeded and no regard is paid to her discontent or refutation. As the foreigners deem the Indians to be slaves in political matters, they have no regard for them even in religious and social matters. This is a great mistake. The lofty position of England economically and in religious matters is due to the help of India. If India does not give her raw products like cotton, what will be the condition of the industries of England? There is no religion in the world which is not found in the British Empire and most of them originated only in India. Considering these things, England should be said to be inferior to India.

Which is a slavish country?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

65. The Desabhaktan, of the 5th March, has a leader under this heading in which it observes that it is soul-force that should be developed in India now, if the Home Rule agitation started here should thrive well, and, pointing to the fact that the majority of the signatories to the Satyagraha pledge of Mr. Gandhi are women, remarks that means should therefore be devised for creating a soul-force among women and says:—In the girls' schools now conducted with the support of the Government, the instruction given aims mostly at making them care more for their bodily comforts, and so our women are no better than dolls adorned with clothes and jewels. If, on the other hand, they are given national education and taught the history of our ancestors, and our philosophical and moral works, they will begin to develop a soul-force at a nick and relieve the misery of mother Bharata. The boys and girls born of such women will also have soul-force. Then the British will grant complete Home Rule to India as promised. What can the cruel laws of the bureaucracy do before soul-force? O excellent patriots! It is our opinion that the Home Rule agitation will not gain strength without the help of women.

Soul-force.

66. Quoting an extract from a book of the late Sir Charles Dilke to the effect that, when the military strength of Europe increases, it will destroy the old country and curtail even the strength of the Empire and that Great Britain may in a few years be dragged into a war, which may lead to her losing Canada and India, the Desabhaktan, of the 5th February, says:—Though the prophecy of Sir Charles has been fulfilled as far as the war is concerned, England has not, as foretold by him, lost any portion of her territory and it is due to her being strongly fortified by the loyalty of her subjects. But the fulfilment of the first portion of the prophecy has its own lessons to teach. Countries which are the allies of England to-day may become her enemies to-morrow. Though it is true that the league of nations will bind all countries to certain prescribed conditions, who can say what will be the condition of the world twenty or thirty years hence? Who expected that rules framed and followed before now would be cast to the winds in this war? The most important work before England now is to reconstitute her Empire. She will be free from frequent trouble, only if the Empire is so reconstituted as to stand on a solid foundation. Now how should she behave towards India? The latter claims a right to acquire her liberty as much as she deems it to be her duty to help England at a time of danger. Should not England, which entered into the war only for establishing liberty, deem it to be her duty to grant liberty to India, which completely relies on her. Though India has been occupying an eminent position in every line from ancient days, her Government is now in the hands of a few bureaucrats, who are said to represent the Government by the King and the people in England. But, beyond giving some seats to Indians in the Executive and Legislative Councils, these are not inclined to give effect to the profession of England that her aim is to grant a responsible government to India. Our Indian Civil Service friends have begun to raise a hue and cry, even when the reform proposals are still at the gates of Parliament and our Viceroy too has come out to satisfy them, which shows that it may take many centuries for India to see the lowest step of responsible government. England is now occupying two conflicting positions. She is proclaiming within her territories that she is protecting the rights and liberty of her subjects, while in India her representatives are following a system of administration which is not responsible to the people. When England is advertising that the liberties of small States should be safeguarded, while, within her Empire, India is immersed in thraldom, all true British subjects have to bend their heads in shame. Every one knows that England came forward to protect the liberty of Belgium. But how is the liberty of Belgium superior to that of India? Have the Belgians a greater stake in the British Empire than the Indians? Do the Belgians share the good and evil that may happen to the British Empire? Why should then England, which deemed it to be her duty to help Belgium having no political connexion whatever with her, be disinclined to grant the rights of India? It is only by granting them that England can strengthen her Empire. This is not the time to say that the Indians are not fit for a responsible government. The cry of liberty sounded throughout the country is itself an indication of the popular attitude. The people have understood that they cannot be content unless they acquire their rights So the first duty of England should be to quench this thirst for liberty. It cannot do for England to rely upon the military strength of other countries. She should strive to improve the strength and union of her own kingdom. She can strengthen India only by granting the birthrights of Indians and, by strengthening India, she will be strengthening herself. Will the British Statesmen realize this truth at least hereafter?

The duty of England.

DESABHAKATH, Madras, 5th Feb. 1919.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

A strange question.

67. Referring to the question in the Parliament about the lectures which Mrs. Besant proposes to deliver in Ireland, the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th February, remarks:— . . . Mrs. Besant is agitating only constitutionally. She does not approve of unconstitutional agitation. In these circumstances, it is not possible to imagine what harm there will be for Ireland from Mrs. Besant's lectures. It is natural that lectures should be dreaded in dependent countries.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The League of Nations.

68. Regarding the opposition in America to the draft rules of the League of Nations, the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th February, says:—. . . It will be seen from the cables received to-day that Mr. Reed, a democrat, has opposed the constitution of the League on the ground that it is opposed to that of the United States of America. Unless the status of dependent countries is determined and arrangements are made to encourage friendliness and co-operation among all the nations of the world, the new League cannot stop war and help in the restoration of peace.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th March, writes under this heading:—We are at a loss to know why, when certain countries which try to separate themselves from the Empire are admitted into the League of Nations, India which wants self-government within the Empire is not allowed an opportunity to place her view before the Peace Conference through her popular representatives. A resolution to the effect that India should be given a place in the League of Nations has been adopted at a meeting at Madras and the resolution was communicated to the President of the Peace Conference. It will only be fair to give to India the privileges given to the Colonies.

ANDHRAPVTRIKA, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

Famine prices and the Kistnapatrika.

69. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th February, writes:—. . . There was none to sympathise with the ryot when he was reduced to a helpless condition by the failure of crops and by the rise in prices of foreign articles. But the Government as well as those leaders who are not acquainted with the condition of ryots are now trying to reduce the price of paddy, which has naturally gone up. It is easy to attack the voiceless ryot. . . The ryots will no longer tolerate reduction in the price of paddy without a corresponding reduction in the prices of foreign articles. If the fire which is now latent in their hearts bursts out, it will not be possible to check it. . . The prices of foreign articles should be properly regulated. The Government should purchase the paddy required for each district and should order its sale in a reasonable way. If not, the price of paddy may be fixed at Rs. 65 a candy, when the prices of foreign articles are also reduced, and the licence for exporting paddy should be given to the representatives of ryots, since its grant to particalar ryots will cause dissatisfaction to others. . .

Mr. B. C. Pal's lectures: Industrial reconstruction.

70. The Andhrapatrika, of the 25th February, publishes in Telugu Mr. Pal's lecture on 'Industrial reconstruction' which contains the following observations among others:— . . . In the opinion of the Europeans, humanity which is worthy to live in the modern world means only white manity. . . . The white men will have to understand that all humanity is one. This is what they should learn from us. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Mr. B. C. Pal's lecture: the present political situation.

Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 26th February, publishes in Telugu among others, the speech of Mr. Pal on the 'Present Political Situation', delivered at the meeting held on the beach on the 25th ultimo, which contains among other observations the following:—. . . What does Government interference (in industries) mean? By this, our economic dependence will become permanent. What are we to do? If we fail to secure our political liberty, our progeny will have to suffer untold troubles. Criticising the position of the Government with regard to local self-government, the Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastri very touchingly observed: "In such a case, I shall be obliged to pray to God not to give me any children." If we, the heirs of a mighty people should come to such a condition, a wholesale destruction of men in the country would be welcome. . . He exhorted the audience to demand a place in the League of Nations along with other nations and to agitate strongly for responsible government, being prepared to undergo any troubles that may happen to them on this account.

In an article expressing his admiration for B. C. Pal as a staunch patriot second only to Tilak in his fearless opposition to Government and readiness even to lay down his life, like Dadhichi, in the service of the people, a writer in the Sapad Abhyudaya, of the 25th February, gives a summary of Pal's speech in Madras on the 18th February.

The world-political situation.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

71. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of 26th February, observes:—. . . When Doctor Wilson and the European statesmen have recognized national freedom in accordance with self-determination as the basis for the establishment of peace and prosperity in the world, the people of India have begun to cherish hopes of self-government in their hearts. They were confident that the western statesmen would carry out their declarations. But that hope is now turning into disappointment. How best the scope of the announcement of the 20th August 1917 may be narrowed seems to be the problem which is now engaging the prominent attention of the friends of the bureaucracy both in India and in England. Instead of being construed in a liberal spirit, that announcement is being interpreted strict to the letter. The officials have taken into their heads to make some reforms or others as they please, and give them the name of responsible Government. . . There is a strong rumour that the views expressed by the Provincial Governments and the Government of India on the subject of reforms breathe a narrow spirit. . . When the sub-committee examines the provisions of the Bill, said the Secretary of State, the opinions of Indians will be ascertained. A suitable reply has not been elicited in the Imperial Legislative Council to the question regarding the timely arrangements made in the matter of the Congress deputation proceeding to England. . . The net results of it all are indifference in Britain, Government repression and internal differences among leaders—factors which are not surely calculated to achieve the desired object. . . When a grave crisis threatened the British Empire and the European society, the western statesmen proclaimed high principles such as freedom, self-sacrifice and righteousness. But once the danger is passed the high principles also have disappeared. . . The League of Nations is turning out to be a League of White Nations. The principle that the white races should rule over the black ones in the interests of the latter has been established. Who is to decide whether the white races are governing the blacks for their own benefit or for the benefit of the black races? It is the League of White Nations. This decision resembles the administration of justice in India by Government officials in whom are vested both judicial aud executive functions. When the main principle is unjust, there is no wonder if the result also goes against justice . . . Mr. Reed, a democrat, has strongly criticised the rules of the League of Nations, which tend to increase rather than decrease the highhanded rule of western Powers in Asia and Africa. Is it not indeed a strange result that the League of Nations which is being established with the object of spreading democracy in the world should give its support to autocracy? By virtue of the concentrated power which the League of Nations embodies, it seems to bless the domination of western Powers in eastern countries with a long lease of life. But it is not possible to know the dispensation of Providence. . . In Canada and Australia, there is a strong concensus of opinion demanding separate representation for those countries in the League of Nations. The discontent prevailing in India needs no special description. An intolerable living seems to add to the effects of an absolute Government. The prices of food-stuffs have risen abnormally high. Ordinary people find it difficult to live. The fate that has befallen the Turkish Empire is rousing the indignation of Muhammadans. Though the Empire has been crowned with success in the wars unrest instead of peace is spreading in the internal affairs. The responsibility of saving the Empire in its present crisis rests on the British statesmen. The time has come when they should be inspired by liberal views in the interests of the Empire. The well-being of the whole world will be ensured, if the anthorities in India recognize the fact, that the British Empire will not have the required strength, wealth and credit so long as India is bound by fetters of absolute power.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

British labourers; a crisis.

72. Referring to the Labour strikes in England, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th February, writes under this heading: . . In this connexion, the people of India should note one fact. The unrest now spreading among the British labourers is unprecedented and dangerous beyond all doubt to the peace of the country. Though England is in such a crisis, the British Government does not waver in the least, it has not thought it fit to punish the labourers by passing repressive measures like Rowlatt Bills. On the other hand, it is trying to pacify them by granting their wishes as far as possible. . . But what are the boons which India is going to get at the present auspicious time when peace is prevailing? The people are taken aback to learn that the Rowlatt Bills are those boons. If there had been in this country even hundredth part of the unrest now prevailing in England, we cannot imagine what repressive measures would have been passed. The difference between England and India is now becoming clear.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

A crisis.

Referring to the judgment in the Tilak-Chirol case and to the present political situation, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st March, writes in its leader under this heading:—. . . When the object was to convict Mr. Tilak somehow, what value translations can have may be understood. Moreover, Sir Edward Carson appealed to the Jury to consider what a disastrous effect a verdict given in Mr. Tilak's favour would have on the Government of India and on the prestige of the white officials. It is but natural that such appeals should rouse their racial prejudices. . . When there is so much discontent in different parts of the Empire and when a repressive policy has not been resorted to anywhere, the Times does not give any reason why such a misfortune should befall India alone. . . It may be said without doubt that the introduction of these repressive Bills has evoked an unp recedented agitation in the country from one end to the other. But the Times consoles itself with the thought that all this agitation is artificial. . . The report of the Select Committee on the Rowlatt Bills has been placed to-day before the Imperial Legislative Council. The enemies of popular aspirations are rallying their forces once more. The advocates of the Rowlatt Bills find fresh support in the result of the Tilak-case. Surely the country is in a crisis. . . When the very birth-rights of the people are menaced, no reforms, whatever they may be, can bring happiness to the people. It is therefore the duty of men of all parties to realize this truth and to unite together and save the mother-country from such a disaster. . . It is understood that Mr. Gandhi and his followers are prepared to resort to passive resistance, if the Rowlatt Bills are passed into law. It will be better for the Government to think even now of withdrawing the Bills and thus give no room for unnecessary agitation in the country.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The famine trouble.

73. With reference to the rise in the prices of necessaries of life, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st March, writes under this heading:—The famine trouble is increasing in the country day by day. If the present unhappy condition is not inquired into, we cannot say what disturbance it may produce in the country. . . Living is becoming intolerable for the ordinary people. It behoves the authorities to understand that serious discontent prevails among the masses in this respect. There is absolutely no good of the Government consoling themselves with the idea that it is all due to political agitation. There is also no use of trying to afford temporary relief with the object of improving the bad economic condition. The representatives of the people should be consulted and their assistance, obtained. It is the duty of the Government to take suitable action in the matter, before the popular disaffection becomes still stronger. We request the Government to heed at least the following vivid description of the present condition by the Madras Mail, and take prompt action: ". . . The poor who purchase kerosene-oil in small quantities are put to much trouble on account of scarcity of oil. Considering the prices of food-stuffs, the situation is becoming more and more intolerable. The people are beginning to think that the authorities will never take proper steps to regulate the prices."

It need not be specially pointed out that it is the duty of the authorities to check the despair that is spreading among the people.

74. Referring to the reports which are said to have been submitted by the Reform Committees to the Government of India, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st March remarks:— . . . Whatever be the nature of reports submitted by the Reform Committees, the people can have no confidence in the secret inquiry held by them without recording the evidence given by the popular leaders.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The Reform Committees.

With reference to the Reform Committees, the Andhravani, of the 22nd November, remarks:— . . . The Reform Committees will work even with greater secrecy than the inquiry held by Mr. Montagu who was subjected to unnecessary restrictions which made him no better than gosha lady. The inquiry of the Rowlatt Commission which submitted a report making unmerited allegations against Indians was also held in camera. We do not know why such matters which affect the future well-being of India should be treated with so much secrecy.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 22nd Nov. 1918.

The Reform Committees.

The constitution of the Committees is still more disappointing. . . They are composed of those moderates who have taken no part in the political agitation, who have seceded from the Congress and who want to curry the favour of the authorities, and what is worse still, of such Anglo-Indians bureaucrats as Mr. Gillman and Mr. Hailey who are of opinion that no reforms are at all necessary. No Nationalist Congressman except the Raja of Muhammadabad is on them to express the popular opinion. We are therefore afraid that the Committees may not, after all, be of much use.

In this connexion, the following lines written by Sir William Digby twenty years ago come to our memory: "The inception of reform ideas comes from one set of brains. The realisation of that inception is entrusted to others who do not believe in its realisation, do not consider anything requires to be reformed. Consequence: Failure of the remedy, which in hands understood and worked by minds who believed in it would prove successful."

75. With reference to the forfeiture of the security deposited by the Desabhaktan, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st March, observes:— . . . It is not possible to know against which paper and at what time the Press Act may be used. . . We have seen the translations of the articles complained of. Their sum and substance is that the present system of administration should be changed and that self-government should be established. The civil rights associations should work now promptly. We appeal to them to work for the repeal of the repressive laws which are a menace to our birth-rights, and for the establishment of peace in the country.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan.

76. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 1st March, publishes letters from correspondents belonging to various places, all complaining of the scarcity of kerosene-oil.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

The kerosene-oil famine.

In its leader under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 3rd March, observes:—The kerosene-oil famine beats out the foodstuffs famine. . . We are not able to ascertain the reason for this famine; nor do the Government publish it. . . The B class licence depots are not open to the public from 7 a.m. to 9 p.m. like all other shops. The retail merchants are giving a lot of trouble. The price of one bottle of oil has gone up from 2 to 4 annas. . . The people will be put to much inconvenience, unless a dozen or two dozen shops at least are opened for the whole city and sell oil at all times. It is not just that the Government should be silent over the matter. Unless they see that depots are freely opened by big companies all over the city, keep them under Police guard and sell kerosene oil at reasonable prices, we are afraid that the people who are starving from famine may have to die in dark houses. . . We submit to the Government that the middle classes seriously fear that the masses driven to despair by foodstuffs famine, kerosene-oil famine and other famines may commit any excesses.

The kerosene-oil famine.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 25th Feb. 1919.

Scarcity of kerosene oil.

A note in the Manorama, of 25th February, states that most pitiable accounts are being received from various places regarding the price of kerosene oil and its scarcity. The difficulty experienced even in Calicut is very great. Such a calamity was not anticipated. If immediate relief is not forthcoming, the people will be reduced to great misery. The Government is responsible for public welfare. It is inadvisable to allow the present state of affairs to continue for many days. . . How is it that the authorities do not wake up and do something in the matter?

THE MALAYALAM PAPERS.

Scarcity of kerosene oil.

All Travancore and Cochin Papers as well as British Malabar Papers invite the immediate attention of the respective Governments to the scarcity of kerosene oil and its abnormal price and urge the necessity for prompt relief.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

Kerosene famine in Madras.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 24th February, writes:—It is astounding to find that the depot-keepers, in spite of the Government fixing the rates for kerosene oil, are worrying the people and selling it much above the prescribed price. It is still more amazing to find that the retail-sellers purchase the oil from the depots and sell it at a still higher rate. We hope that the Collector of Madras, the Commissioner of Police and the President of Corporation will take steps to allay public anxiety and arrange for the supply of kerosene oil by opening a few more depots at the expense of the Corporation.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 22nd Feb. 1919.

Kerosene-oil calamity.

The Qaumi Report, of the 22nd February, writes:—It is a general complaint that oil merchants are a great nuisance to people. Firstly, they open their shops late and close them early. Yesterday our reporter, who saw this with his own eyes, states that oil was being sold in two places in carts in Jambazaar Road at the rate of 15 annas a gallon. Although several hundreds of men, women and children were waiting for it, several had to go away disappointed. The oil merchant was very rough with his customers as if he also was a Government officer.

We observed that mostly Muhammadan women were going empty and no one seemed to care.

We invite the attention of the Collector of Madras, the Commissioner of Police to this and request them to take steps to remove the evil.

It is incumbent on the Government to adopt proper measures for the sale of this commodity and not to allow the people to hawk oil in carts on the public roads in this manner.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Delhi Congress.

77. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th March, reproduces in Telugu a passage from the Bombay Chronicle, which contains among other things:—The resolutions adopted at the Delhi Congress are the results of the deep deliberations of the Congress and the League. Any suggestion to transgress them will not meet with the approval of the people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The same paper reports Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao to have written to the Hindu fully agreeing with the above opinion of the Daily Chronicle.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

Expenditure on railways and agriculture.

78. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th March, says:—In Mysore equal sums are expended on railways and agriculture. Money is also spent liberally on industries, electricity, etc. But we are surprised to see the great difference that is made in Sir J. Meston's budget between railways and agriculture.

79. Comparing in its leader under this heading the condition of India with that of the Philippine Islands, the Andhravani, of the 22nd February, observes:—. . . There is much difference between the system of administration followed by the Government in India and that followed by the Philippine Government. It is the flawless scheme of action, observed by the rulers in practice, that contributes to the progress of the people. The American Government has solved the political problems of the Philippine Islands with courage and firmness. However pious may be the wishes of the rulers of India, the courage and boldness which are required for the fulfilment of those wishes in practical life are wanting in them. . . The greatest drawback in India seems to be the lack of harmony between the intentions of statesmen and the practical work of the authorities. The rulers of India are unwilling to give up their love of power, whereas the rulers of the Philippines have placed the administrative control in the hands of the people to a large extent. . . There cannot be an end of slavery in the world, until and unless the wrong notion that the eastern countries have been created for the enjoyment of the Western Nations is exploded. Dependent countries are bound to be in an intolerable condition, so long as this theory is in practice. The union of the Eastern and the Western nations is not possible until the arrogance of the ruling races disappears. Doctor Wilson has often said that unless every nation is freed from Commercial slavery, no co-operation and mutual good will are possible in the world. Mr. Neva has made it clear that it is only when the resources of Eastern countries are liberated from the domination of the west, that those people can render complete help in the prosperity of the world. There are two ways in which Sir William Meyer can give effect to the facts which he has understood. He will have to convince his countrymen that the idea of imperialism of the European nations has resulted in the oppression of humanity. He must be willing to put into practice in the Eastern countries the noble ideas expressed by Mr. Neva. . .

Andhravani, Berhampur, 22nd Feb. 1919.

80. Under this heading, the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st March, reproduces in Telugu the concluding part of Mrs. Besant's speech at Bombay on the Rowlatt Bills, which it commends to every Indian for repeated perusal. The passage contains:—. . . O England! England that hast been to Europe the home of liberty! Do you want to be the sole despot in Asia? Have you forgotten the woes you suffered in the past? . . . You have been saying to every autocratic government: "Govern justly, and no body will turn against you." Have you now dared to walk in the foot-steps of those whom you have criticised? Will not those who were reprimanded by you in the past ridicule you now? Recollect what you have done! If, forgetting your past traditions, you want now to change from the giver of freedom that you have been into a destroyer of freedom, close your past history!

England! Do not forget yourself!

Kistnapatrika, Masulipatam, 1st Mar. 1919.

81. A correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st March, writes continuing his review of Sir John Woodroffe's book, "Is India civilized?":—Christianity in the middle ages was characterised by high ideals. But since the discovery of Africa and America, Christanity has gradually degenerated, Europe has directed her attention for the absorption of others' money, ambition has begun to grow in the place of union, wealth has become more important than land, and industrialism, which is the characteristic of "the age of machinery," has progressed. The debasing idea of nationality has become predominant. It is this idea that has at last burst out into the present terrible war. In this evolution brute force has been worshipped and there has been a well-merited retribution. There has been a conflict between the western and eastern cultures, since the conquest of the eastern countries by the western people. Sir John Woodroffe is of opinion that this conflict has begun in India with the introduction of English education. . . The result of the University Commission of 1902 has been to place the full control over the present system of education in the hands of the Government. . . The world knows how grateful Indians are to the British Government for the many benefits which they have received from English education. Now what are the evils of that education? Vernaculars are dying. Sanskrit, which is renowned as the language of the gods, is on the verge of death. . . There are many other evils besides the neglect of vernaculars.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 1st Mar. 1919.

An appeal to the Government.

82. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 1st March, invites the attention of the Government to an incident which has taken place in the Court of the Sub-Magistrate, Bezwada. The sub-magistrate is reported to have allowed a public copy of a document from the Registrar's office to be filed as an exhibit without proof, though the pleader on the other side was objecting that the document in question could not be considered as a public copy and that it could not be accepted as an exhibit unless proved. The correspondent concludes his letter with the following observations:—. . . The gentleman probably passed his Criminal test long ago. It is highly necessary that the Government should require such men to pass the test again soon after they are entrusted with magisterial duties. As it would otherwise compromise and endanger the position of pleaders and parties, I request the Government to make suitable arrangements.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and Mr. Gandhi's passive resistance.

83. Under this heading the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd March, reproduces in Telugu Mr. M. K. Gandhi's letter on the Rowlatt Bills and the pledge of passive resistance signed by him and others.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 6th Mar. 1919.

Mr. Gandhi's passive resistance.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 6th March, writes:—Mr. Gandhi has announced that all true patriots from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin should adopt the mantram of Satyāgraha or passive resistance in case the Rowlatt Bills are brought into force and that he has himself undertaken this sacrifice. Not only these laws but all autocratic methods can, without doubt, be burnt to ashes with the aid of this magical formula.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 22nd Nov. 1918.

The new epoch.

84. Referring to the close of the war and to the prospect of a bright future, the Andhravani, of the 22nd November, writes in its leader under this heading:— . . India is depressed to see that the authorities do not trust her in spite of her valuable services in the war. She is perplexed by doubt and anxiety whether those principles of justice and liberty, for the triumph of which she has also fought along with other countries, will be applied to her own Government or not. Though she has been allowed representation in the Peace Conference, she is sorry that one who will boldly express the popular opinion has not been appointed to represent her. . . O British Empire! you are now on your trial. When you were in a critical condition, our Mother India stood by you, shared your trouble and showed her love towards you in a manner that had challenged the admiration of the world. If you, now in your turn, satisfy her requirements and accord her an equal place in the Empire, this page in the history of mankind will be written in letters of gold, and you will earn the gratitude of the three hundred million people of this country. We appeal to you again and again not to forget this fact.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

Foodstuffs.

85. In its leader under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 4th March, observes:— . . . Many people think that the hard famine here is due to the order issued by the Government of India to the effect that foodstuffs may be exported from one province to another and to the Native States. This is not without some truth in it. . . It is true that the present hardship is due to the order of the Government of India. The people are anxiously asking why the Madras Government should be bold enough to represent the real state in this Presidency to the Government of India and prohibit the export of foodstuffs to other provinces. The representative of the Madras Times severely reprimands the Madras Government in this matter. It is not at all proper that the Madras Government should assume an attitude of indifference in this respect. . . We have once suggested that the Government would do well to call for a Conference of District Collectors here to ascertain the real state of each district, to invite some big merchants and ryots to this Conference and consider their views also on the subject. We are of opinion that our suggestion will be found to be useful, if it is acted up to even now.

86. Referring to the suicide of a school-final student in the Tanjore St. Peter's School, the Andhraprakasika, of the 4th March, remarks:— . . . We submit that it is not proper that the Educational authorities and the Government should not make some suitable change in the school-final system, which is responsible for such hard incidents.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The suicide of a school-final student.

87. In the course of an appeal to ryots to attend in their largest numbers the seventh Kistna District Ryots' Conference to be held at Tadepalligudem on 13th March 1919, the Secretaries write in the Andhraprakasika, of the 4th March:—The series of troubles created from time to time by the system of foreign administration is pursuing and greatly annoying the ryot population which is the backbone of the country and of the Government. The ryots have already lost lakhs of rupees on account of the penal taxes, the A.B. classification, the rejection of applications for water and the payment of bribes to subordinate officers. When the prices of such articles as yarn, iron, cloths and oil generally required by ryots have gone up ten times, instead of reducing them, that the Government should try to regulate the price of paddy which is the main crop produced by the ryot, and to create obstructions to the export of paddy, is as unjust as it is cruel. The unsteady Government settlement, the proposal to enhance the water-rate, the establishment of annoying toll-gates, the impoverishment of the people by opening toddy and liquor shops, the failure to introdure compulsory elementary education among ryots, the introduction of the new Rowlatt Bills which are subversive of the progress of ryots are some of the grievances which are now troubling the ryot population. God only knows the suffering of ryots. If the ryot seriously looks once at the cycle of time, it is feared that a deluge is impending.

The Seventh Kistna District Ryots' Conference, Tadepalligudem.

88. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 21st February, in a leading article under this heading, writes:—Nobody can deny the fact that wherever we may go, whichever district we may visit, there we find signs of a furious famine. As the days pass by, the fury is increasing and the past seems better than the present. Though it is true that the famine is due to the adverse seasonal conditions, it would be wrong to suppose that nobody is to blame for its being so terrible. A proper distribution of the food-grains available would not have rendered the situation so bad. The untimely rains affect only the coast lands and not so much the interior of the country where there are irrigation facilities. Thirty or forty years ago, the people of the interior had always three to four years' supply of food-grains in store against a possible famine, and they were even able to share it, if necessary, with the people of other parts of the country. But the famines of the present day are of a most terrible kind. Who is responsible for this? After the outbreak of the war even in England where a food-supply committee had to be established, the difficulties experienced do not seem to be so great as in India. We must say that they are caused by the unsettled condition of things created by the authorities, and their neglect and lack of zeal. When the whole country is wailing about the famine in the country, why do they not stop the export of food-grains to foreign countries such as England at least now? His Excellency the Viceroy told us of the quantity of leather, cloth, etc., supplied by India during the war. But did he tell us of the quantity of food-grains given by her? Can we not see from the reports which used to be published some time ago that more grain than was necessary was carried away from here and excessive freights were paid in carrying it to Mesopotomia, England, etc.? Admitting that it is necessary to take supplies from here during the war to which, of course, no one will object, why should they take more than what is absolutely necessary? If grain was allowed to be exported from here without guarding the interests of the people, who is responsible for the famine that has come now? In addition to these difficulties, there is now the food committee which, though intended to benefit the people, the latter have found in practice to be doing more harm than good. They feel the heigbt of inconvenience when even transport from one district to another is restricted, and consequently goods are transported in secret. The people therefore urge the removal of these restrictions; but the reply given by the Government the other day in the Council on this question is altogether unsatisfactory. If the authorities fail to remove the scarcity, what are the hungry masses to do? There is a classical Sanskrit say that the hungry know no law and equity. It is therefore necessary that the authorities should be more mindful of their duties in time. As regards the situation in South Kanara, the authorities cannot fail to see how grave it is. If so soon after the harvest and in the busiest part of the trade season the prices of necessaries have gone up to twice and in some cases even three times the normal prices, can we not foresee what the prices will be during the rainy season?

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 1st Mar. 1919.

The Mamlatdar murder case.

89. Referring to the case in which a Mamlatdar was murdered (at Akola) in the Bombay Presidency, the Sampad Abhuyudaya, of the 1st March, observes:—If those that are carrying on the administration are high-handed, the people attack them. Untoward consequences follow. We see even rulers attacked and revolutions brought about. Those who use their power justly and keep themselves calm have admittedly no danger of being murdered. But how can we expect calmness in persons who are blinded by power? Those who have good education from their infancy become capable of remaining calm, but the uneducated can seldom have this capacity. Those who are high-handed in their action, the moment they get a little authority to exercise must reap the fruit of their deeds.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 28th Feb. 1919.

Farewell address to His Excellency Lord Pentland.

90. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 28th February, writes:—A new controversy has arisen in the Madras Corporation. Mr. Tyāgarāya Chetti and one or two others want to present a farewell address to His Excellency Lord Pentland on behalf of the Corporation. This is not the place to discuss how far Lord Pentland deserves to be honoured by the public of this Presidency. It is not expedient that the Corporation should take up this question; nor is it likely that it will do so. Nevertheless, public opinion in Madras on this point is that since the Corporation has not taken the trouble of presenting farewell addresses to any other retiring Governors till now, why should it take upon itself to do so now? What benefit has Lord Pentland conferred upon the Corporation that it should now be at such pains to express its indebtedness? The Madras dailies state that Lord Pentland has exercised his powers with the utmost rigour in connexion with the Park Fire (sic) the Municipal Bill, etc. Though some of the Commissioners are actuated by the desire to curry favour with His Excellency, we think they would do well not to be meddlesome. For, although Lord Pentland's term as Governor was extended, the people do not seem to have liked the extension. Under these circumstances it would not be expedient to create room for proclaiming from a sense of honesty the defects of his administration on the eve of his departure. Blind worshippers like Mr. Chetti would do well not to forget this.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 28th Feb. 1919.

India in Parliament.

91. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 28th February, writes:—Is Lajpat Rai so extraordinary a personage that the peace of the United Kingdom or of the whole Empire might be suddenly upset by permitting him to return to England? Why should the British Cabinet which so utterly defeated the enemy on the battlefield and won so glorious a victory be in such dread of the advent of Lajpat Rai to England? The fact is that once the authorities give up their sense of discrimination, they can find almost anything conform to their notions of propriety. There is nothing surprising in this. Again, as regards the Arms Act, although Indians will not have the right which the Europeans and Eurasians have of using arms without licence, we must nevertheless thank the Government for the proposal to issue licences more freely than before, on the principle that something is better than nothing. But we wonder how the proposed relaxation of the Arms Act is consistent with the Rowlatt Bills. Perhaps the magic powers of the Rowlatt Bills will counteract the evil effects of the Arms Act; or it may also be that the bureaucracy has hit upon the trick of inducing the people to give up their opposition to the Rowlatt Bills in their eagerness to see the Arms Act amended. Again, as regards the transport of rice from Burma, experts are of opinion that the cost of transport per ton can be reduced to Rs. 20, while according to Mr. Montagu, after putting pressure on the Shipping Controller, it is Rs. 30 per ton. It is no wonder that the people should urge the abolition of the restrictions on transport when they find that these restrictions render the situation worse instead of improving it. The Government of India state that provincial restrictions on transport have been removed as early as January. In practice, however, the people have been unable to see any change in the control of transport.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 6th Mar. 1919.

92. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 6th March, writes:—Sir James Meston has himself called it a relentless budget. It is truly so. The budget is highly disappointing and is worse than a war budget. An enormous sum has been set apart for military expenditure. For the past four years there has been no adequate provision for education, industries, sanitation, etc. This year's budget too does not make proper provision for these. The Military service and the railways have abundant provision. How is the country to prosper if the revenues should be spent in this manner? How is the country to promote her economic advancement? The provision under military expenditure in the same way as in war time shows how the revenues are being spent in an irresponsible manner owing to the lack of responsible government. The people are suffering on account of war, famine and pestilence. Good statesmanship requires that the budget should show a surplus to guard against bad times. The pesent budget on the other hand shows a deficit of £4½ millions. £42 millions have been allotted for military expenditure though the war has ended. This expenditure would not have been possible if we had responsible Government. The prices have gone up enormously. It behoves the authorities even to raise a loan if necessary to prevent people from dying of starvation and recover the money paid in the shape of relief when better days come. £24 millions have been set apart for railway extension. Though this may be considered beneficial in view of the increased facilities for the transport of food-grains, it is asked in some quarters why so much expenditure should be incurred under this head when the scarcity of food-grains is so great, and more attention should be paid to increased production by extending irrigation facilities. The military expenditure forms more than half the revenue, while the allotment for famine relief is only £17 lakhs. Compared with the salaries paid in the western countries and Japan, the salaries here are very much higher, though India is much poorer than those countries. This lavishness in expenditure is possible because we have no responsible government and the authorities have autocratic powers. In all democratic countries, popular welfare has the first claim on the revenues of the Government. Where Civil and Military services receive better attention and use up a large part of the revenues, there it is found impossible to help the people even to get food and clothing. When we contrast the condition of those poor people who work day and night and die for want of food with that of the officials who find this world a paradise because of their fat salaries without working even one to two hours a day, we realize the stupendous consequences of the absence of responsible government.

93. Referring to the appointment during the last year of four Assistant Civil Surgeons to deliver popular lectures on Hygiene, in various districts, and the intention of Government to continue the arrangement for another year, the Manorama, of the 21st February, admits the utility of such lectures, thinks that they are more urgently needed in the interior parts of each district than at district headquarters, and observes that these lectures will do immense good to the people if the Assistant Surgeons do their work according to a programme prepared in consultation with the heads of districts.

still fighting for it, takes exception to Sir William Meyer's statement that India cannot expect to get self-government on colonial lines at an early date, and observes that Indians will remember Sir William Meyer's name with gratitude if on his return to England he places before the Members of Parliament his experiences and observations in the Philippines in a way beneficial to Indians.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 28th Feb. 1919.

The outlook of the sugar industry in India.

95. In the course of a long article on the outlook of sugar industry in India, a writer in the Yogashemam, of the 28th February, remarks that it will cause pain and shame to both the administrators and the people when confronted with the question why India's need of sugar cannot be met by Indian manufacture when more than the required quantity of sugarcane is produced in the land. The article notes that the increase of import duty on sugar, already introduced by the Government of India, will stimulate Indian manufacture and offers the following suggestions:—

(1) that the Government should help small factories with grants-in-aid ;

(2) that suitable lands should be placed at the disposal of the sugarcane cultivators ;

(3) that factories should be given the benefit of supervision by officers of the Department of Industries ;

(4) that water for irrigation may be made freely available.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 21st Feb. 1919.

The future of the Congress.

96. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 21st February, in a leader on this subject writes:—On the 18th instant Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal delivered a speech at the Ghokale Hall in which he commented on adverse criticisms relating to the Congress in a manner which shows that he possesses the enthusiasm of the extremists.

The Jaridah quotes a portion of Mr. Pal's speech and regrets that he has tried to prove the entire Indian population to be as selfish as himself.

Mr. Pal says "As the British Crown is connected with India he is loyal to it".

Had Mr. Pal said that, as the British Crown is a well-wisher of the entire world and of all human beings, we are loyal, it would have been more to the point.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 23rd Feb. 1915

India and the Khalifate.

97. The Qaumi Report, of the 23rd February, refutes Mr. Welby's remark that the Mussalman connexion with the Khalifate is a recent invention, and observes that the connexion of Mussalmans of India with the Khalifate goes back to date long previous to the elevation of the Turks to this exalted office. The Abbasido existed in Bagdad and Egypt for eight hundred and five years, when Mussalmans recognized the authority of the Khalifate and minted their coins with the inscription "Amir-ul-Mominin". Most Mussalman potentates in India publicly declared their connexion with the Khalifate. This is a title especially intended for the Khalifa for the time being and for none others.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

The assassination of Habib.

98. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 26th February, referring to the lamentable and sudden assassination of His Majesty the Amir of Kabul, writes:—It is extremely regrettable to learn the sad news of the death of the Amir encompassed by wire-pullings and internal intrigues.

Addressing the Islamic world the editor says. No greater opportunity for taking to heart a great lesson could possibly be afforded.

The editor in giving a biographical sketch of the late Amir observes that he remained a staunch and loyal ally of the British Crown, and on this account His Excellency the Viceroy has directed that all public offices be closed and flags hoisted half mast, on Friday the 28th instant as a mark of respect to his late Majesty's memory.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 29th Feb. 1919.

The murder of the Amir of Kabul.

99. The Qaumi Report, of the 25th February, deploring the sad news of the untimely death of His Majesty Amir Habib-ullah Khan writes:—The dreadful murder of the Amir darkens our vision and fills our minds with perplexity. It appears that it will take a long time to destroy the germs of sedition and intrigue that are floating about the world, and that the proposals for restoration of peace and tranquility will not materialize in a hurry.

If regard be had to the late Amir's life, his worldly wisdom, and his piety, His late Majesty was from the political point of view a force, in fact a great force. His loyalty and neutrality were of the utmost benefit to the British in securing peace and tranquility within the confines of India. A thousand pities that that personality has been laid low!

100. The Sahifa, of the 27th February, publishes a translation of an article on the assassination of the late Amir that appeared in the Hyderabad Bulletin of the 25th February 1919. SAHIFA, Hyderabad, 27th Feb. 1919.

His Majesty the late Amir Habib-ullah Khan.

101. The Qaumi Report, of the 2nd March, in a leader on this subject writes :— QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 2nd Mar. 1919.

A complaint against prevailing high prices.

We find that the question regarding high prices is one of the items in the programme which is to be placed before the Legislative Council on the 18th instant. This matter assumes a new aspect everyday, and the symtoms point out that evil consequences will follow if the matter is passed over. Patience and perseverance have reached their extreme limits and if we should even, at this stage, not pay any attention to the question, we should understand that either the public or we are mad. The high prices of grain are strangling the poor and at present there do not appear to exist any means whereby their lot might be ameliorated. Rice is sold at 2 or $1\frac{3}{4}$ of a measure per rupee. Kerosene oil, firewood and other commodities have become so dear as to exceed famine rates.

It is regrettable that the authorities are silent and take no preventive measures. When the authorities cannot comply with these requirements, their sympathy and their friendship are unreal and in fact they are acting unjustly towards the poor.

We invite the attention of the Government so that it may very carefully consider and adopt such measures as may put an end to the hardships caused by the prevailing dearness. There are many ways open to the Government and the matter is so important that it requires extraordinary investigation. It is not sufficient to rely on official and demi-official reports.

III.—LEGISLATION.

102. The Desabhimani, of the 22nd February, publishes in English a leader under the heading "The Rowlatt Report and the Government Bills" in which the following finds place among others :—. . . DESABHIMANI, Cuddalore, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The country was looking forward to an era of peace and prosperity and mutual good-will between the Government and the people after the enormous sacrifices of men and money made by India for the war, and was expecting that the ideals for which the war was fought in Europe would be applied to India as well. But the two Bills recently introduced in the Council have evoked strong opposition in the whole country and created discontent in the minds of men. Even before we have fully realized what the consequences of the victory over the Germans will be for us, we are made to submit to a piece of legislation which will make life very troublesome and dangerous to all honest and well-meaning citizens. . . A mere perusal of the two Bills is enough to convince any one of the fact that the Bills are quite unnecessary and uncalled for at the present time. . . One wonders how the same British people who in England did not scruple to associate with General Smuts after he had fought with the forces of His Majesty, would ever be inclined to propose a drastic and hasty legislation of the kind in India. When we find that General Smuts is even admitted into the inner Councils of the Empire, we have the spectacle in India of humiliating conditions being imposed on one convicted of sedition. No chance at all of leading an honest and gentlemanly life ever afterwards is given to him. There seems to be no reason for the Government being so hard at the present time. It cannot be said that sedition and crimes against the State have increased in any way during the war. India has, on the whole, been very loyal to the Crown. It is unfortunate that Britain which has so highly evolved liberal instincts as to wink at the declaration of independence by Ireland should seek to impose fresh shackles on peaceful and mild India.

The second Bill seeks to continue the provisions of the Defence of India Act during peaceful times as well. . . The first part of this Bill provides for a special tribunal being constituted for the trial of offences given in the schedule, whose decision is final, no appeal being allowed to any court whatsoever. It is remarkable that even non-political offences are included in the schedule. . .

Part 2 of this Bill gives wider powers to the Executive. . . We have in this part provisions which take away a man's liberty without the judgment of an ordinary court of law authorizing the same. . .

The powers proposed to be taken by the Government under the Bills are extraordinary and may not conduce to a healthy relationship between the people and the Government. There is no urgency for passing the Bills at the present time, and the Government could have waited for sometime to see if even the semblance of anarchism in the country would not disappear under better conditions to be inaugurated by the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. The Government have ample powers under the Defence of India Act until then. The haste displayed by the Government in the face of strong non-official opposition cannot be said to be commendable.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, 31st Jan. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Dwelling at length on the provisions of these Bills, the Dravidabhimani, of the 31st January, observes:—The liberty and the peaceful life of bygone days are not to be had again. The lot of the editors of newspapers has come to be miserable. The life of the politician will be one of perpetual anxiety. When a person is once imprisoned, there is no hope of his going back to his house. Danger is standing at the very threshold with a greeting. Under these Bills, politicians and journalists cannot exercise the liberty of criticising the system of administration freely. Though the liberty of the loyal subjects is not affected, still even persons like the Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale, Mr. Gandhi and Lord Sinha, known for their loyalty, were on several occasions viewed with suspicion and shadowed. Had Swami Vivekananda been alive at present, a case of sedition can be brought even against him. It is, therefore, certain that every one will be afraid of the character of these Bills which is such as to make the Indian subjects of His Majesty the King Emperor, lose faith in their liberty.

YATHARTHAVACHANI, Kumbakōnam, 17th Feb. 1919.

The Yatharthavachani, of the 17th February, remarks that the existing law is sufficient to put down sedition, and the enactment of any new measures is likely to cause greater hardships and observes:—It is the belief of every one at present that India will get the promised Home Rule from the British Government. If now, these Bills are passed, there is room for doubt that the promised liberty might be withheld. What is the special advantage secured in limiting the duration of the Bills to three years? How can it be possible to put down sedition within these three years unless by prosecution? If seditionists keep quiet for three years and begin their work again, should a new law be enacted then? When the Indian Income-tax Act was first passed, what was its duration? How long has it since been in force? So every one is getting suspicious whether these new Bills also will not, if they become law, be in force for ever. It is not satisfactory that the Government should have brought forward these Bills in haste at a time when the people are anxiously awaiting the Mantagu-Chelmsford reforms, reposing full confidence in the Government, and at a time when the cruel war with Germany has come to an end.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 24th Feb. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 24th February, reproduces in Tamil an extract from the Young India commenting on these Bills, in which the following observations find place among others:—A large number of public meetings have been held all over the country to protest against these Bills. The main feature of these meetings is the interest evinced by the audience in closely hearing the lectures and understanding the situation. When the extraordinary provisions of the Bill were explained, the excitement of the people knew no bounds. The public are well convinced that the present juncture needs very careful and calm deliberation and action. They did not pay any consideration for the words of Mrs. Besant, when she spoke criticising certain leaders and warning against passive resistance. Every one is expecting orders to issue in regard to passive resistance, from the leaders in whom he has confidence. If all this agitation and protest are disregarded, the people will not remain quiet.

The Swadesamitran, of the 25th February, reproduces in Tamil the proceedings of a public meeting recently held in Dadar in the Bombay Presidency to protest against these Bills in which Mr. B. G. Horniman, as the President of the meeting, is reported to have appealed to the audience to be prepared to adopt the method of passive resistance in respect of not only these Bills but also other laws which the Government may enact, as an effective means of making the Government yield to the wishes of the people.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The same paper also publishes a communication from a correspondent who advocates incessant constitutional agitation throughout the country against these Bills and observes that, if even this does not accomplish the object of the people, the non-official members of the Provincial and Imperial Legislative Councils should immediately resign their seats and, touring round the country, and raising funds send a deputation of not less than 100 men to England to inform the people there of the 'atrocities committed by the bureaucrats,' here, which is sure to help India in getting rid of these Bills.

The Swadesamitran, of the 26th February, reproduces in Tamil an article appearing in the Indian Social Reformer protesting against the passing of these Bills.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the petition said to be submitted to the House of Commons by the Indian public protesting against these Bills, the Swadesamitran, of the 26th February, observes:—It is necessary that such petitions should be sent from different parts of India. It is but right that a telegraphic information should be sent to the British Government in advance of the petition. If we are to lead a respectable life, we should protest constitutionally against the passing of the Bills in all possible ways.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Reproducing in Tamil an article from the Amrita Bazaar Patrika, detailing the reasons for the origin of the revolutionary movement in Bengal, and remarking that it will be clear from this article how far the actions of the Government have contributed to rouse the people of India, naturally inclined to lead a peaceful life, into agitation, the Swadesamitran, of the 27th February, observes:—First to create excitement among the people, then, if they agitate in consequence, to provoke them further by passing repressive measures as if to put them down and then declare that anarchical movement is spread in the country and enact cruel laws—what policy this! The Rowlatt Bills now brought forward by the Government are in full accordance with this policy. The adage goes that, when afflicted, even a small worm attempts to resist. It is our request that the Government should realize the truth of this.

SWADESAIMTRAN, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 1st March, welcomes the news that Mr. Gandhi has decided to lead a passive resistance movement against these Bills and remarks that it is the duty of every Indian to transgress the Rowlatt law, which aims at murdering India, and other unjust laws like this.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

Referring to the observation of the London Times that it is very necessary that the Rowlatt Bills should be passed into law in order to prevent the increase of unrest and anarchism and that it was a mistake to have announced that the first Bill would be in force only for three years, the Desabhaktan, of the 3rd March, remarks:—There is no ground for believing that a law passed only for a temporary period now will not be made permanent at the end of that period. The uncontrollable bureaucrats are sure to make this law a permanent one. Having perpetuated an irresponsible bureaucratic administration in India, the British Government are expressing outside, to satisfy the world, that they are going to introduce a government responsible to the people in this country. Though their internal idea may not be noted by the people of other countries, can the Indians forget it? Let the British Government note that the more the liberty of the Indians is forfeited in India and they are afflicted, the deeper will discontent and unrest take root in the country.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Lokopakari, of the 3rd March, is surprised at those who strongly objected to the Bills during its discussion in the Council having signed the report of the Select Committee and adds:—A division in the country only strengthens the officials and the Rowlatt Bills are sure to become law. Mr. Gandhi advocates resort to passive resistance against the Bills and, if this suggestion is acted upon, it may land the country in a critical pass. We hope the Government will avoid giving room to it by acting in accordance with the opinion of the people.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Reproducing in Tamil an extract from the speech of Mrs. Annie Besant on these Bills at a public meeting in Bombay, the Desabhaktan, of the 26th February, observes:—England is famous for her justice and impartiality. It is at present the experience of many that her liberal views are getting narrow in regard to Indian matters. It is our request that every British subject should ponder over the valuable words of Mrs. Besant. Wise men say that such Bills are not in vogue even in Ireland, a country ever seething with unrest and confusion. We are at a loss to understand why the bureaucrats should attempt to enforce such a cruel law in India alone. It is not known what sin India has committed to deserve such a treatment under the bureaucratic rule. The Government of India should desist from passing these Bills, if they wish that British prestige should remain untarnished for ever.

DESABHAKTAN & SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan and the Swadesamitran, of the 3rd March, reproduce in Tamil the Satyagraha pledge of Mr. Gandhi and his adherents and also the letter of Mr. Gandhi to the Press detailing the necessity of resorting to passive resistance at this juncture.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

Referring to the manifesto issued by some moderates, who signed the Special Committee's report, objecting to the course adopted by Mr. Gandhi, the Swadesamitran, of the 3rd March, remarks that, as the English expression goes, they have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage.

The same paper also reproduces in Tamil the comments of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika on the Select Committee's report on these Bills, approving the action of Messrs. Malaviya, Khaparde and Patel in having desisted from signing the majority report.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

Remarking that the Madras Government are now testing the patriotism of this Presidency by means of the action they have taken against it, the Desabhaktan, of the 4th March, refers to the strong opposition raised by the late Mr. Gokhale to the Press Act when it was introduced and to his subsequent acceptance of the same with some modifications, and observes:—The Government are well aware that the moderates will only talk, and the latter are no better now. The Government are now determined to push through the Rowlatt Bills in spite of opposition. They expect perhaps to get the Bills passed like the Press Act. They may enact the Bills by dint of their power; but we know the fate that is in store for it. We want the Government to note that there is difference between the time of the Press Act and the present period. Our words may appear venomous to the Government now; but we prophesy that a time will come when they will be considered to be saintly advice. When the Press Act was introduced, the soul-force theory of Mahatma Gandhi had not spread in India. Now it is recognized by many. Indian women are prepared to adopt passive resistance as can be seen from the signatures to the Satyagraha pledge of Mahatma Gandhi. If mothers descended from Sita and Pānchāli begin to exert their soul-force, who can curb it? We warn the bureaucrats on account of our feeling that no harm should befall the British Government. It is only the soul-force theory of Mahatma Gandhi that can relieve the misery of India and the Almighty is pleased to ordain the development of this force throughout India. Let all people be prepared to follow Mr. Gandhi.

The same paper expresses its surprise elsewhere at Sir William Vincent having made no mention of the dissenting minutes of Messrs. Malaviya, Patel and Khaparde while placing the report of the Select Committee before the Council and says:—Does this not indicate partiality? If he did not like to publish their views, why should we have requested them to sit on the Select Committee? Is not the conduct of Sir William Vincent an insult to the three gentlemen? Need we state explicitly what the object of the Government of India is in acting like this?

The paper also refers to the reply of Mr. Montagu to a question in the House of Commons about these Bills that the Government of India will see that the main principles of the Bills are not dropped and remarks:—This reply shows that even Mr. Montagu is for the Bills being passed. This is highly regrettable.

It is stated that Mr. Montagu is a person of liberal principles and it was expected that he would not approve of the Bills. But it is now patent that he too has yielded to the Government of India. What can we do for this? Mr. Montagu! Will you not be pleased to pay some attention to the opinion of the Indians on these Bills?

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th March, publishes in Telugu and English the comments of the Amirta Bazaar Patrika, on the Select Committee's Report on the Rowlatt Bills, which contain among other things the following remark:—It was proper on the part of Messrs. Malavia, Khaparde and Patel to have refused to sign the report of the Select Committee. No patriotic or self-respecting Indian could act otherwise.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Criticizing in its leader the changes made by the Select Committee in the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 4th March, says:—There is only one test for repressive measures. Do they or do they not violate the principles of justice? Do they or do they not deprive the Courts of Law of their authority? If they do, there can be no doubt that these measures will affect the innocent as well as the guilty. Even Mr. Banerji and others say that they do not approve of the provisions of the Bill. If so, why should they sign the report of the Select Committee? Yesterday's Mail says that by signing the report, they have approved of the principles underlying the Bill. It is regrettable that they have given room for such a surmise. Even in matters affecting the primary rights of man, the moderate leaders have not acted firmly but have taken a wrong step. They have weakened the firm opinion of the people's representatives. While Mr. Gandhi and many other leaders have declared their determination to have recourse to passive resistance, Mr. Banerji and others are spreading a movement which is opposed to it. Though the Select Committee has made slight alterations, no changes have been made in the principal clauses of the Bill. . . The non-official members required that a certain clause in the Bill should be made to apply only to anarchical crimes, but their request was not complied with. By this, the promise that this emergent law will be enforced only against anarchical crimes has been broken, and other crimes too will be tried under this law without proper inquiry. . . The request of the non-officials to provide for a right of appeal has been rejected. Readers can easily understand that without this change in the Bill, all other changes are useless. . . Clauses 25 and 26 of the Bill deprives the individual of his liberty and the Courts of Law of their authority, and increases the arbitrary powers of the Executive Government. The Select Committee has not made any considerable alteration in this. . . Though it is stated in the preamble that the law will only apply to anarchical crimes, other crimes also have been included in the schedule. . . If His Excellency the Viceroy learns from Mr. Gandhi the intensity of public feeling in this matter and without caring for prestige, withdraws the Rowlatt Bills, he will earn the eternal gratitude of the people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and the memorial of the people.

Referring to the memorial addressed to the House of Commons by Anti-Rowlatt Bills Executive Committee in Madras, which it publishes elsewhere in Telugu, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th February, observes in its leader under this heading:—. . . Whatever be the decision of the Imperial Legislative Council, the people should try by constitutional means to prevent the enactment of the Bills into law. No sacrifice can be regarded as too great for the preservation of our birth-rights. . . Such a great man as Mr. Gandhi is firmly convinced that there can be no room for progress, until and unless the Rowlatt Bills are withdrawn. It may be inferred that he is determined to try to the best of his ability to prevent the enactment of these Bills. If he leads his countrymen in the new agitation, the new Bills are bound to fail. . . It behoves the people to address petitions for the preservation of their birth-rights to the British public which has such glorious liberal traditions. They must make them realize to what unrest the enactment of these repressive laws will lead in the country. If an unprecedented indignation is roused in the country from one end to the other, it cannot be believed that the English people will consent to the enactment of these Bills. . . Should the British people who always show their anxiety when freedom is suppressed in any part of the world, be indifferent when it is threatened in their own Empire the modern world cannot respect them.

Considering all these facts, the Madras Committee have addressed a memorial to the House of Commons, in which they have expressed the popular opinion in unambiguous terms. If other provinces also follow suit, it cannot but rouse the conscience of the British public. . . It is a fact known to everyone that whatever repressive measures are passed in the country, they will not affect papers like the Madras Mail. The increase of repressive measures will proportionately enhance the pleasure of those who are accustomed to be glad at the suffering of others. It is the duty of Indians to agitate constitutionally and to let the British people understand the difficulties which will befall them. Should the British public fail to pay any heed even then, there will be no limit to the unrest which will prevail among the people in this country. The future is dark. We appeal to the Government to view the present situation with foresight, and without driving the people to despair, to earn their everlasting gratitude by withdrawing the Rowlatt Bills.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 22nd Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and the duty of the popular representatives.

Continuing his criticism on the Rowlatt Bills the same correspondent writes to the Andharavani, of the 22nd February, under this heading. . . The 6th, 7th and 10th February, should be regarded as important days in the political history of India. These days have determined the future prosperity of the country. It has been clear that the Government have forgotten the services rendered to them by India during the great world-war. It is regrettable that the English Government should do things in the spirit of burning the boat after crossing the stream. It is not possible to look into the future and say what is going to happen. But this much is certain that there will be unrest and agitation among the people. . . Mr. Rowlatt was brought here all the way from England. The Government have spoken of him as an eminent judge. Regarding his judicial talents, do we not know what the 'John Bull' has written? . . . Does not the manner in which His Excellency the Viceroy defended the Bills amount to a whole-sale condemnation of Indians as anarchists? It cannot be British statesmanship to regard Indians as loyal subjects during the war and to call them anarchists after the war. . . To advocate the enactment of a legislation similar to the Defence of India Act on the ground that anarchy was averted during the war on account of the latter only shows the shortsightedness of the Viceroy. His words are a commentary on the administration of the British Government and makes it evident that the British have been carrying on a bureaucratic rule in India. They show that it is the British Government itself which has promoted anarchy in India. . . Neither Sir William Vincent who has introduced the Bills, nor Sir G. Lowndess, nor Mr. Lovett has given satisfactory reasons for the enactment of these new Bills. . . Sir G. Lowndess has made some irrelevant remarks in this connexion. His analogies are none but fallacies. . . All the popular representatives have done their duty. Mother India! An auspicious day! An auspicious day!! For that was the day when all your sons had combined together to undo the repressive measures which aim at destroying your ancient glory! Though they may fail temporarily in this great struggle for freedom, they are bound to triumph in the end. Success will surely attend that side which follows the Dharma. This is an eternal truth.

The question is: Reform or repression? The Government have at last made their answer clear by saying 'repression'. . . At a time when a calm atmosphere should prevail, it is regrettable that the Government should try to defy the wishes of the people. Such a policy will shake their confidence in the government. . . Do we find such unheard of laws in any country in the civilized world? Such laws can have a place only in times of war; and the present is a period during which hostilities have ceased. . . Strictly speaking, it is England which now requires such laws in view of the headstrong action of labourers whose constitutional agitation seems to give place to unconstitutional methods. They are threatening to enshroud London and Glasgow in darkness.

Even in such a critical situation, the British Government show no mind to enact repressive laws like these. . . In these circumstances, what necessity is there for our Government to make these laws in order to stifle the freedom of Mother India? . . . No Indian, not even an Indian child, who has self-respect and patriotism in him will consent to the enactment of such laws, though they are to be in operation, not for three years, but even for three seconds. Every Indian will utter the name of Mahatma Gandhi and take up the vow of passive resistance. Do not Indians know the value of the Government promises? What did the Government say when they passed the Press Act? What did they say when they passed the Defence of India Act? What has become of the Queen's Proclamation of 1858? Why should we go so far? Is not their present action against the spirit of the announcement which the Secretary of State made on the 20th August 1917? . . . The promise of Sir William Vincent to have the Emergency Powers Bill in force only for three years seems to be a device to create dissensions among the popular representatives. . . Mother India appeals to the popular representatives not to take part in the Select Committee. Will they defy their mother's word? Or, will they uphold their self-respect and the ancient glory of the mother? When our birthrights are in danger of being robbed, what matters it whether reforms are granted or not granted? . . . The popular leaders should have nothing to do with the committee, when the Government have flouted their opinion. . . Let them all adopt, therefore, the vow of passive resistance in this connexion, thus setting an example to their countrymen and maintain the fair name and prestige of India!

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

103. The Dravidan, of the 25th February, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments appearing in the Justice, of the 24th idem, suggesting the withdrawal of the present Bill and the introduction of another congenial to the evolution of local self-government. — DRAVIDAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The Indian Arms Act.

104. Referring to the restrictions imposed by the Arms Act in India which prevent the Indians from possessing arms without licences, while the Europeans and 'faringhis' in India are freely allowed to possess the same irrespective of their status in life, the Hindu Nesan, of the 25th February, observes:—If those who complain that, in ancient days, partiality was shown to the Brahmans in the laws of the State, rules favourable to them having been framed by virtue of their influence, compare this partiality with the laws in force at present, such as the Arms Act, they can clearly see the difference between the two. In his reply to Commander Wedgewood in the House of Commons about this subject, Mr. Montagu has said that a new Arms Act will be enacted enabling all persons with good position and character to obtain licences and carry arms. So the restriction to get a licence will continue even under the new Act; but we feel elated that, in spite of this, facilities will be afforded for all deserving people to carry arms, and that the class distinction recognised in the existing Act and the distrust of the Government in the loyalty of the people will disappear. We cannot understand how the enactment of repressive laws is in consonance with the amendment of the Arms Act in he way suggested. The Government of India alone must know it. — HINDU NESAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

The Madras City Municipal Bill and a special meeting of the Corporation.

105. Referring to the resolution which will be moved at the special meeting of the Madras Corporation to be held on the 4th March requesting the Government to withdraw the Madras City Municipal Bill as it is disappointing, the Andhrapatrika, of the 25th February, writes in its leader:—. . . Officials are generally in the habit of saying that self-government cannot be successful without sufficient progress having been made in local self-government. The non-official members have requested the Government to afford an opportunity for the growth of local self-government. But the Government have refused to grant that request. The rejection of even such petty requests will only increase the disappointment prevailing among the people. The Madras City Municipal Bill will certainly be an eye-opener to those who think that it will be possible for the people to have their training in self-government at the hands of the bureaucracy. . . Even Doctor Nayar and his party — ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

are asking in wonder why the Madras Government should work out the Local Self-Government Act with such a narrow spirit.

The resolution to be moved in the Corporation represents the opinion of the people unambiguously. There are two essential conditions the fulfilment of which is necessary for the progress of local self-government. There must be ample funds, and the local bodies in question should have in their own hands the control over the expenditure of these funds. . . Happily, plague has not spread in the city. If it had spread, it is easy to imagine what a crisis the Corporation would have been called upon to face. It is the duty of the Government to afford every possible facility for the Corporation to increase its income, so that it may be in a position to discharge its responsibilities properly. But instead of increasing such facilities, the Municipal Bill would curtail the income of the Corporation by exempting the Port Trust buildings from taxation. . . Since the Bill thus violates the two important principles of local self-government it is only proper that the Corporation should resolve to request the Government to withdraw it. The Justice strongly supports this resolution. . . But however much we sympathize with the Nayar party in their attempts to promote the cause of local self-government, we are not so confident of the result, for we know that the authorities would care more for their own prestige than for popular opinion to accept which there is no sort of binding on them. . . We, therefore, wish that Doctor Nayar and his followers would realize the simple truth that the people cannot gain their desires however petty they may be, unless they get self-government and that they would earnestly work for its attainment.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 23rd Feb. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

106. In criticizing the Criminal Law Amendment Bills, the Hitakarini, of the 23rd February, says:—The representatives of the people have emphatically pointed out the impropriety and danger of the provision by which the burden of proof is thrown on the accused. So long as the power of authority dominates the power of the people, public opinion cannot but be a cry in the wilderness. The Government knows how many innocent people have suffered horrible punishments under the Defence of India Act. Until the above-said provision is put into practice, its real nature cannot be understood. . . Though Sir Chandavarkar has emphatically represented that there has now been no necessity for the amendment of the Criminal Law, though the popular leaders have unanimously shown the red flag, and though the whole of India is sending protestation after protestation, the Government have made up their minds to run on the wheel of authority. This is improper. Commotion has already sprung up in the country. The people now surmise that the political reforms will not be in accordance with their wishes and that the Government have resorted to this device to stop agitation, to muzzle their mouths and to fetter their hands, with the idea that in the teeth of such repressive laws, the people will listen to whatever may be said to them. . . If the leaders of the people who opposed the introduction of the Bills should consent to serve as members of the Select Committee, they will betray their ficklemindedness, which will be taken advantage of by the Government in proclaiming the success of their cause. It is to be deemed that the frequent recurrence of such conduct on the part of popular leaders weakens their power. . . If once the Criminal Law Amendment Bills become law, they will find a permanent place in the statute book, even though they may be said to be temporary measures.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

Passive resistance.

107. The Andhrapatrika, of the 4th March, publishes in English and Telugu the telegram showing the attitude of the New Times with reference to the declaration of passive resistance by Mr. Gandhi in respect of the Rowlatt Bills.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Budget statement and the Imperial Legislative Council.

108. Referring to the draft Budget statement presented by the Financial Member in the Imperial Legislative Council at Delhi, the Andhrapatrika, of the 3rd March, observes in its leader:—. . . To calculate military expenditure to the same extent after the war as during it does not show any farsightedness on the part of the Financial Member. . . When the Commission which was appointed to inquire into the economic condition of the enemy countries has also definitely stated that it would be impossible for Germany to wage another war in the near future, it does not look proper that the Financial Member should allot such a large amount for military expenditure. . . The land revenue for 1918–19 has shown a decrease by one million sterling. At such a critical juncture, Sir James Meston proposes to spend only £400,000 on irrigation. From this small amount which has been allotted for a branch most useful for the progress of the country, it will be easy to understand the character of the Budget. Sir James Meston ascribes this to financial weakness. But he proposes to spend 17¾ millions sterling on railways as against 12½ millions last year on the ground that the additional expenditure would improve Indian commerce. Indians have all along been complaining that such a heavy expenditure on railways to the detriment of agriculture will be productive of many evils. Anyhow, Sir James Meston's proposals cannot but be disappointing to the people in the country. It would be highly beneficial for India if the Indian gold standard reserve which is at present in England is transferred to India and the gold coins required for the country are prepared here. The Government's currency system should undergo a thorough change. Our readers will see how necessary it is for India to secure fiscal autonomy along with the privilege of self-government. . . . The condition of the country will surely go from bad to worse unless the power to control her export and import trade and to impose duties on foreign articles is soon granted. . . It must be said that the Budget statement is on the whole open to objection.

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, March 1919.

The Sedition Bills.

109. Criticising the provisions of the first new Sedition Bill, the Desabhimani observes in its leader:— . . . The first Bill which will be the first boon to be conferred on India by the Government after the war, has for its object the introduction of certain alterations in the existing Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure. Chapter VI of the Penal Code which deals with sedition contains all the possible provisions which a foreign Government which does not enjoy the confidence of the ruled may like to see on its statute book, and it is already severe. It is not possible to find such severe punishments in any self-governing country. Such being the case, it is highly regrettable that attempts should be now made to render those provisions still more rigourous. It is nothing else than the misfortune of the people of India. . . It is proposed to add one more sub-section to section 124. The sub-section 124-A which is already in force is stringent enough, and was objected to by many well-known lawyers, when it was introduced. Under it, any criticism of the Government, in whatever good faith it may be written, is liable to be treated as sedition. If an Indian Civil Service officer happens to be the trying Judge, there can be no limit to the misfortune of the accused. Such severity cannot be met with in the Penal Code of any other country. . . The newly proposed sub-section becomes more drastic than the existing one by the definition of the word 'sedition' which it gives. Much of the present political literature in the country will become seditious matter under this definition. If any person is found to be in possession of any lectures of Lokamanya Tilak or any book containing extracts from those lectures, he will become liable for prosecution under the new sub-section. There is no doubt that such provisions will make the power of the bureaucrats boundless and will increase agitation in the country, besides curtailing the primary rights of the people. They will be subversive of the principles of British justice. . . Section 5 of the Bill makes it an admissible evidence to prove whether the accused has been formerly convicted for sedition or has associated himself with persons so convicted. A more regrettable provision there cannot be. Many of our political leaders such as Lokamanya Tilak, Mr. Bannerjea, and Mr. Pal have been convicted. If this Bill which penalises our association with such men should be passed into law, it is time for us to bid 'good-bye!' to our rights and give up all our hopes.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 30th Nov. 1918.

Self-determination.

110. In its leader under this heading, the Andhravani, of the 30th November, writes:— . . . British Premier Mr. Lloyd George has sent a message to President Wilson, expressing his hope that England and America can work together in the Peace Conference for the establishment of peace, freedom and democracy in the world. . . We should presume that the British Premier has used these words wholeheartedly and after due deliberation. If we are right in our presumption, he must try to introduce democracy in India soon. Otherwise, we shall be obliged to say that his message was only intended to please President Wilson with its grandiloquent statements. There seems to be no distinction drawn between the western and the eastern countries in the message of Mr. Lloyd George. . . He has also subscribed to the principle of self-determination. Some may argue whether a promise on the part of the ruling power to concede a democratic government in a decade or two would not be in accordance with that principle. It cannot be. To think so is a great blunder. When the Austrian Government made such a promise to the Czecho-Slavs, President Wilson has objected to it saying that it is only the form of Government desired by the people's representatives, when free from all sorts of restraints that will be in accordance with the principle of self-determination and not any responsible government which the ruling race may confer. . . It is understood that countries such as Mesopotamia, Arabia and Syria will be granted freedom in accordance with the principle of self-determination. In that case, are the people of India who can boast of a glorious civilisation doomed to pine under an absolute Government? Is it for this purpose that India has sacrificed her men and money? All the people should express their firm opinion that the principle of self-determination should be applied to India which has such ancient civilisation. O Indians! Let us not, therefore, lose this opportunity! . . .

Qaumi Report, Madras, 18th Feb. 1919.

The need of self-respect among Muhammadans.

111. The Qaumi Report, of the 18th February, referring to the question of separate Muhammadan representation at the Corporation which was rejected by the Government observes:—The Muhammadan community should, as a matter of duty, object to the procedure adopted by the Government by which the aims of the whole community are thwarted through Yaqub Hasan's camouflage.

The Hindus whom we dreaded had not worried us, nor spoken a word against us, but the Government from whom we had expected support of our cause, turned out to be unfavourable to us and broke the promise which it had made through its member before the Select Committee. Mr. Yaqub Hasan gave strong evidence of his independence by declaring before the Council "this is a case of promise breaking."

The community should now prepare itself and express its dissatisfaction and disappointment at the Government's refusal and should yet again knock at the door of the Council Chamber. Possibly the Government, which bears no malice against Muhammadans but persists in its policy owing to misunderstanding, may be convinced of the truth.

In conclusion the editor advises the community to send a deputation to His Excellency the Governor and in case of failure to approach the Government of India.

Qaumi Report, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

The excitements over the Sedition law.

112. The Qaumi Report, of the 27th February, has a leader which is briefly to this effect:—When the Rowlatt Committee's report was published we criticised it. From a religious point of view it is a decree issued against the national aspirations and religious susceptibilities of Mussalmans. It contains reports on Mussalmans furnished by the Criminal Investigation Department.

The Committee has taken advantage of extraordinary events to prove the existence of sedition and anarchism in India, and now two laws have been framed based on the report. The attitude of the Government proves that there will be no delay in passing and bringing them into force.

There is no doubt that anarchism exists in certain parts of India in a marked degree, constituting a smouldering fire which we should strenuously endeavour to extinguish before it bursts forth into a flame, but we cannot allow that two laws should be framed on the report to deal with the evils of anarchism. The Honourable the Law Member says that loyal people should not oppose the measure. This is in our opinion an error in logic.

IV.—Native States.

113. Remarking that the appointment of Rao Bahadur T. Vijayaraghava Achariyar as Diwan of Cochin will cause general satisfaction to the people, the Desabhaktan, of the 25th February, observes:—It is in no way appropriate for the Anglo-Indians to wish that a European should be Diwan in a Native State. However it may be we congratulate His Highness the Raja of Cochin for his having secured an able Indian for his Diwan without getting beguiled by the Anglo-Indians.

The Diwan of Cochin.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

Adverting to this appointment, the Hindu Nesan, of the 26th February, observes that it is the good fortune of the Cochin State to get, as its Diwan, one with the sterling qualifications of Rao Bahadur T. Vijayaraghava Achariyar.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 26th Feb. 1919.

Reviewing the administration of Cochin by Mr. Bhore, the outgoing Diwan, the Yogakshemam, of the 28th February, observes that though his administration did not exhibit any remarkable skill, yet it was on the whole fairly satisfactory. He steered the finances, clear of shoals and quicksands, in troublous times. He deserves praise in that the first experiment of a Christian Diwan for the Cochin State, which is governed by a Hindu Raja, could be carried out without any religious complications. Though his relations to the Nambudiri community could not be said to have been most cordial, some important steps for the diffusion of education among that community were taken during Mr. Bhore's administration.

The Diwan of Cochin.

Yogakshemam, Trichur, 28th Feb. 1919.

Referring to the appointment of Mr. T. Vijayaraghava Achari as the next Diwan of Cochin, it observes that in this case there is the consolation that the various industrial schemes planned by Mr. Bhore are now entrusted to the care of an experienced officer having expert knowledge of matters industrial.

The Malayala Manorama, of the 4th March, also observes that Mr. Bhore's administration was, on the whole, successful, and has laid the foundation for several big projects of lasting benefit to the State.

Malayala Manorama, Kottayam, 4th Mar. 1919.

Adverting to the appointment of the new Diwan, it congratulates the people of Cochin in that the Madras Government did not find it possible to ignore the grievances of 83 per cent of the subjects of the State and accordingly strongly advised the Raja to appoint an officer from British service and in that the benevolent Raja accepted that advice.

114. Referring to the request of the Travancore people for the grant of greater power to them in the administration of their State, the Andhrapatrika, of the 27th February, remarks: . . . It will be proper on the part of the ruler of the State to grant the wishes of his people, before unrest spreads among them. . .

Travancore and political reforms.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 27th Feb. 1919.

115. Referring to the prosperity of Kapurthala and to the policy of the Raja of appointing members of the Ruling house and the people of the State to important posts and of not importing officers from outside except on absolute necessity, the Kerala Sanchari, of the 26th February, observes that the policy conduces to efficiency and may well be copied by other Native States under British protection.

The administration of Kapurthala.

Kerala Sanchari, Calicut, 26th Feb. 1919.

116. Referring to Sri Moolam Popular Assembly which recently closed a ten days' session at Trivandrum, the Nazarani Deepika, of the 28th February, while noting with satisfaction that the proposals made and the way of presenting them showed a marked improvement on previous years, regrets that the replies of the Diwan to such representations were, as usual, unsatisfactory, and thinks that in its present condition this assembly, which the people of Travancore would fain call the Parliament of Travancore, has no higher status than that of an assembly for presenting petitions. It points out in brief that this assembly has not been productive of the desired results, nor can be, until the necessary changes are made in the constitution of the assembly as well as in the method of conducting its business.

The Sri Moolam Popular Assembly.

Nazrani Deepika, Mannanam, 28th Feb. 1919.

SAMADARSI, Trivandrum.

Writing on the same subject, the Samadarsi compliments the Diwan on the patient and tactful way in which he heard and replied to the representations of the members.

YOGAKSHEMAM, Trichur, 28th Feb. 1919.

A note in the Yoga'shemam, of the 28th February, observes that if all the proposals made by members of the Sri Moolam Popular Assembly were accepted and carried out, Travancore would, in the course of the next year, be transformed into a second heaven. All imaginable counsels of perfection were brought forward but no one pointed out a gold mine to finance the schemes.

II.—Home Administration.

(e) Local and Municipal.

1. The Hindu, of the 11th March, writes:—"The position as set forth by the Chamber, thus reduces itself to this: that European businessmen, having business relations with the Corporation, have, in spite of this fact, in spite of the question of purity of administration involved in it, and in deliberate defiance of express provisions of law, been allowed to be members of the Corporation by the European executive heads of the Corporation and, presumably, by European Members of Council—allowed, be it remembered, in a manner not generally known to even the most prominent, long-standing and active of the Indian Members of the Corporation. This is a very ugly revelation, involving the reputation of European officers holding the highest appointments in the Presidency when matters relating to their community are dealt with by them. Were the assertions of the Chamber true, their significance cannot be mistaken; they would establish beyond all doubt that European officers do not overcome the weakness, perhaps natural, of shrinking from the even-handed administration of express mandates of law when the interests of their community come somewhat into conflict with such provisions."

Hindu, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

Municipal Commissioners and contracts.

(k) General.

2. The Commonweal, for the week ending 7th March, says:—"The Press Act has lately had another victim in Madras. This time it is a Tamil daily, Desabhaktan. . . . In its propaganda Desabhaktan has never once given utterance to seditious feelings. Yet this does not matter to the Press Act, which is as elastic as India rubber. In fact the articles which have been pointed out by the Madras Government as objectionable do not appear to us to warrant the action taken by the authorities. We trust it will be challenged in the law courts.

"This blow at the Desabhaktan is being strongly resented in all the Tamil districts."

Commonweal, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The forfeiture of the British India Press security.

3. Writing under this heading the Indian Patriot, of the 8th March, observes:—"The Government has already appointed an influential committee to inquire into and report upon the advisability of reorganizing the services with a view to redressing the grievances of all. . . The personnel of the committee is rather discouraging, and the work they have set about to do remains shrouded in mystery. Witnesses are examined in camera, investigation is held in camera and the whole is a farce. We do not know what real purpose is served by such 'purdah' committees, which are paid out of public funds for little advantage. When it was announced amid a flourish of trumpets that a committee will be appointed to do solid work in the matter of finding ways and means to effectively organize the service, expectations ran high and enthusiasm was unbounded. But later performances have completely defeated the real purpose. Complaints have been made from several quarters with absolutely little effect, and the Government apparently is unmoved by public feeling.

Indian Patriot, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

Medical Services in India.

The Hindu, of the 12th March, says:—"The Indian Medical Service is twin-brother to the Indian Civil Service; it enjoys similar rights, privileges, and immunities; its might and influence are as potent and great as those of the heaven-born service, and no power on earth can shake its position in the scheme of things in India. It is a pampered service which has been allowed octopus like to spread its tentacles over a wide area and tighten its grasp on whatever it holds. . . Interested agitation is carried on in England and in India on behalf of the close service only to obtain increase of pay, and a policy of surrender to this ignoble cry cannot by any means turn mediocres into efficient men. We are far from sanguine, however, that the packed committee consisting of two members of the Indian Civil Service, nine members belonging to the Army and the Indian Medical Service and one independent medical practitioner introduced by way of sop, will take a just, comprehensive and equitable view of the whole question with special reference to Indian interests and the claims of indigenous talent. Indians have been taught by sad experience not to put much faith in committees and commissions and when they work in secret conclave, take evidence in private and shut out all light from outside, the prospect of a satisfactory scheme being evolved becomes remoter still."

Hindu, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

NEW INDIA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The Tramway strike.

4. The following appears in New India, of the 11th March:—"The Tramway strike, the attendant inconveniences to the public and the misery to the hundreds of workmen, is a fresh reminder of the unnatural way in which India is being at present exploited. We do not think the strike would have occurred if the Board of Directors had been in India, or had been Indians. . . . Finally, they are not Indians, and therefore cannot be expected to look at problems from the same standpoint as the countrymen of the suffering labourers. . . . Is it not abnormal, if not monstrous, that a few individuals living thousands of miles away in a distant land, should control such an institution? The arrangement is of course very convenient to the captalists. They are immune from the influence of public opinion, which cannot make itself felt even through the Government. . . . Uncontrolled captalists are a positive danger all over the world. That is the experience of even the most democratic countries; and in India, the captalists are even more secure by reason of their convenient position in a distant country."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The Indian Civil Service and the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms.

5. Writing under the heading "the Revolt of the Indian Civil Service," New India, of the 11th March, observes:—"It is significant that the Government pretends not to have noticed it till the non-official members of the Legislative Council actually questioned the Government on the subject. This demonstrates in the most glaring manner how far our executive or the bureaucracy at present is guided by public opinion, as expressed in the widely circulated and responsible Indian journals in the country. Its attention is drawn to these papers only when they keep up a persistent agitation till the Government feel uncomfortable, and then they wreak their vengeance by using the Press Act, forfeit the security and impose a new one so heavy that few presses in India can afford to live at such a price, or forfeit the press on the next occasion if the press can somehow manage to satisfy the executive's new and higher demand. Anyway public opinion is being disregarded by the authorities in the most flagrant manner—the latest and the most notorious instance being the conspiracy of the Indian Civil Service in this Presidency. This is therefore an additional and strong reason why such a bureaucracy does not deserve to be in charge any longer of the destinies of this country. . . But what steps do the Government intend to take at the attempt for conspiracy? Are the Indian Civil Service to go scot-free especially in a matter so vital as this?"

MYSORE PATRIOT, Mysore, 11th Mar. 1919.

India and the Peace Conference.

6. The Mysore Patriot, for the week ending 11th March, states:—"The position of India under the scheme of the League of Nations is highly anamolous. Article 7 of the Covenant excludes India from being admitted into the League of Nations by confining it only to the fully self-governing countries, including the dominions and the colonies. . . India has every right to be represented in the Peace Conference. It has a right to sign the peace treaty and yet it will not be represented in and will not form part of that League of Nations which will be an integral part of the same peace treaty. Can this be tolerated? Is not India as much entitled to sit on this League of Nations as it is on the Peace Conference?. . . India will raise a storm of agitation and shower a volley of protests, as our contemporary of the Mahratta says, if the Peace Conference will not recognize its claims."

III.—Legislation.

Mr. Gandhi and the Rowlatt Bills.

7. The South Indian Mail, for the week ending 3rd March, remarks:— "Mr. Gandhi rightly points out that the Rowlatt Bills block all progress. . . The remedy suggested by Mr. Gandhi is to refuse civilly to disobey them, Mr. Gandhi has studied the conditions very closely and has come to the conclusion that civil disobedience to law is the only remedy. This is passive resistance of a vigorous type and unless that drastic remedy is applied the disease in the governing body cannot be got rid of. . . We believe that in his endeavour to rally round his banner all the elements of progress, he will be heartily supported by the people in this country. The step indicates that the constitutional fight between the bureaucracy and the people is to be of a stubborn kind."

South Indian Mail, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Wednesdny Review, for the week ending 5th March, has the following:— "Sanity in politics is almost a lost virtue in India just now and it is, therefore, a little gratifying to know that leaders like Sir Dinshaw Wacha have expressed their disapprobation of Mr. Gandhi's threat to organize a passive resistance movement if the Rowlatt Bills became law. . . It is amusing to see that the Viceroy has been so alarmed by the threat that His Excellency is reported to have invited Mr. Gandhi for an interview. The policy of placating those who hold out threats of sorts to the Government and parleying with them while ignoring responsible leaders who are anxious to co-operate with the Government, not to curry favour at their hands but to uphold law and order in the interests of the country, has been carried to rediculous lengths and it is time the Government gave it up in favour of something more rational and dignified. . . If the Government are anxious to uphold their authority, they must put their foot down upon movements of this kind and not enter into pourparlers with those who threaten to organize them. As we have said, we do not think much of Mr. Gandhi's threat.

Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly, 5th Mar. 1919.

The West Coast Spectator, of the 6th March, writes:—"We would have regarded the talk of passive resistance as mere bluff and bluster, but we cannot get over the fact that it is Mohanlal Gandhi who has talked of passive resistance. He is far above the Indian politician of the Congress platform and the market place. There is no jesuitry or sophistry about him and he generally means what he says. And when he goes out there will be many to follow him. We have absolutely no sympathy for passive resistance, but facts are facts to which we cannot close our eyes. The 'Monford' scheme is the issue, and the moment that is mutilitated and the Sydenhamites succeed there will break out in India an agitation, call it artificial if you will, which they will not be able easily to quell."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 6th Mar. 1919.

In a leader under the heading "Mailed Fist Revealed" the Nationalist, for the week ending 9th March, observes:—"Mahatma Gandhi has had an interview with the Viceroy. It was not an interview sought by the Prince of Passive Resisters. It was an interview offered by the Indian Pro-Consul who really felt that the name of the Mahatma was a name to conjure with, only if it could be acquired for one's own cause. Lord Chelmsford has failed in his endeavour. . . . No officer of the crown shall have the right hereafter to say that the people of the country have undertaken extensive opposition without due notice to the Government. Lord Chelmsford, who ought to have known better, is reported to have characterized Mr. Gandhi's appeal to passive resistance as hasty. If there is one leader of India, who is never open to the charge of haste, it is Mahatma Gandhi. He is no fussy politician. He is no enemy of the European. He is really the cool, calm, Mount Kailas. . . . Lord Chelmsford seems inclined to believe that the foundations of British Government in India are based on physical force. His Rowlatt Bills and his hardhearted budget taken together with this wonderful indication of his iron fist, make it clear that he is after all an exponent of the conquest theory. We must thank His Excellency for making this clear; and reply, unequivocally with Gandhi that if force should be the basis of the British Government in India then all India should be considered disloyal."

Nationalist, Madras, 9th Mar. 1919.

COMMONWEAL, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

8. The Commonweal, for the week ending 7th March, observes:—"The Rowlatt Bills have emerged from their committee stage. But in measures of such a character as these Bills, subversive as they are of all elementary principles of civilized jurisprudence, no changes in the committee can be of much avail. . . When all is said, the essentially objectionable features of the Bill remain, namely, the substitution and predominance of the executive over the judiciary. . . So in no way are the Bills made less unacceptable. They cannot be because the difference, between the Government and the people, in this matter, is really one of principle."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

New India, of the 10th March, observes:—"Persecution for religious opinion has not quite disappeared in England; persecution for political opinion is still active in India, where a foreign Government regards 'absence of affection' as sedition, and criticism of officials to be 'prejudicial to public safety'.

"The result of bad man-made laws during the middle ages in Europe was the suffering of thousands upon thousands for heresy, religious and scientific, and the consequent opposition between 'Liberty' and 'Law'; such opposition threatens the very existence of society where liberty is rightly exercised and law is morally illegitimate, until liberty is established; it is always dangerous, even where necessary, to that reverence for law which is the fundamental difference between a civilized and a barbarous State. To strike at that reverence by substituting the arbitrary will of the executive for the supremacy of the judiciary, and to place unbridled power in the hands of the ruler of the State to restrain the liberty of the subject and to confiscate his property, is one of the worst crimes which a Government can commit. When this is done by a foreign autocrat at the head of an obedient bureaucracy, against the unanimous opinion of the representatives of the nation—such restricted representation as is permitted—it poisons reverence for law, the only safeguard of society against anarchy, at its very source. It consecrates anarchy over a whole nation under the pretence of curbing the anarchy of a few."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

In a second article under the heading "Laws" New India, of the 11th March, says:—"In the mind of the Briton Liberty and Law are—or were?—interdependent. If all attempts to change a bad law legally fail, then recourse must be had to breaking it."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

In the third article on this subject, New India, of the 12th March, observes:—"In ancient India, all human laws were seen as subordinate to the supreme law, Dharma, and as deriving their sanctity from their agreement with it. . . During the last century and a half, foreign rule—changing the laws, passing laws not understood that created new and unintelligible offences, laws not founded on Dharma but ignoring it, the passing of coercive and unjust laws incompatible with the protection owed by rulers to the people, and the unfair administration of laws as between members of the ruling and of the subject race—has weakened among Indians their old reverence for law. Their natural tendency to resist passively rather than actively and to appeal to God against injustice rather than to man has been increased by their helplessness through disarmament and by the success of local 'passive resistance'. Hence the general welcome extended to Mahatma Gandhi's appeal."

NEW INDIA, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

Rowlattism and passive resistance.

9. New India, of the 12th March, has the following:—"We presume, on the excellent authority of the London Times, that England has been accustomed to rule herself for thousands of years and that her people have made their own laws; and yet these have not only been resisted, but because her kings would not tolerate a breach of what was considered by a minority as unjust law, one was brought to the block and the other sent into exile. This is a much more rigorous remedy, it will be agreed that the sober Indian method of Satyagraha when their circumstances are infinitely more provocative than the English circumstances of the seventeenth century."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

Coolies in Ceylon.

10. A correspondent from Ceylon writing to the Swadesamitran, of the 5th March, observes that the planters in Ceylon appear to have influenced the Government of Madras through the Government of Ceylon, to remove the restrictions preventing the coolies from emigrating to that place, and remarks:—If at the time of removing these restrictions, popular leaders had been consulted, we in Ceylon might have attempted to get rid of the restrictions in the laws relating to labour here. When Diwan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai recently came here, he took evidence to the effect that the Superintendent of an estate stripped an Indian girl working as a coolie in that estate of her cloth up to the waist and whipped her severely for the fault of not having cleaned a rubber cup. In addition to many such hardships, the places they live in are very small and their wages vary from only $4\frac{1}{2}$ to 8 annas a day. In some plantations even children of 10 years are made to work. The Indian coolies should be prevented from emigrating to Ceylon until such hardships are removed.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The German colonies.

11. Adverting to a statement recently made by Sir Frederick Smith in England, that none of these colonies can be restored to the Germans and that Mesopotamia, which is a fertile tract of land, should be retained to make good the expenses of the war, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th March, writes:—Brethren, what should we learn from this? Have you noted that Sir Frederick Smith has not realised that he has in him to a very large extent the very feature for which he found fault with the Germans? Has not Sir Frederick Smith spoken contrary to the principles of the League of Nations.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

India and the Peace Conference.

12. The Desabhaktan, of the 7th March, observes:—After all, it appears there is no representative for the Indians in the Peace Conference. Though Lord Sinha was one who was not elected by the Indians, there was some consolation in that he is an Indian. But having been appointed as the Under Secretary of State for India and raised to the Peerage, it is said that he has become ineligible to hold a seat in the Peace Conference. Mr. Montagu has now appointed himself as the representative of India! This is really curious. But it is more curious to see that our people are merely witnessing such things. Our humble opinion is that for the 25 crores of people in British India there should be 25 representatives in the Conference. But we do not know whether we should laugh or weep, when we see that there is not even a single representative for us. Human beings should not put up with such a condition.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

13. The Hindu Nesan, of the 10th March, observes:—The proposed League of Nations may as well be called the League of White Nations In the world the white races are a few, while the coloured ones are very numerous. It is stated that the few white races are to control and hold sway over the innumerable coloured races and look to their progress. We thought that the European war had come to an end. We never dreamt that a struggle of this kind would come into existence between the whites and the coloured races.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 10th March 1919.

Observing that it is the object of the League of Nations to devise suitable measures for properly acquitting the onerous responsibility of taking under protection the people who cannot stand by themselves and look after their own interests, and that those who, by virtue of their material resources and other worldly status, are competent to discharge this responsibility should, it is said, be monitors of the inexperienced people on behalf of the League, the Hindu Nesan,

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 10th March 1919.

of the 10th March, observes:—If so, what has become of the statement of Mr. Lloyd George that the German colonies in Africa will, in point of administration, act according to their own determination? Perhaps, it served only to enable those colonies from severing their connexion with Germany. The regulations of the League require that the monitors should be appointed by the League and those monitors are not only to protect the interests of the people in their charge but have also to rectify their moral codes. As the monitors are only whites, will they not try to effect reforms according to their own views? Will they permit the erection of forts and fortifications? Will the military training given be restricted only for police bandobast and for the defence of the country, or will it be extended further? Will they keep those subjects untrained in the use of arms as in India? If so, those subjects should continue to be for ever under the control of those white monitors.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 8th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

Continuing its criticism of the League of Nations, the Kistnapatrika, of the 8th March, observes in its leader:—. . . There is no harm in each nation manufacturing in its country the articles required by it. But more than a half of this labour is being contributed with an eye upon the money of the people in Asia and Africa. Britain uses only 10 per cent of the articles manufactured in Manchester, the balance being utilised to meet the demands of Asia. When the Asiatics themselves begin to produce the cloths required by them, what is to become of the 90 per cent of labourers in Manchester? . . . The League of Nations now advocates the policy of gaining the money of foreign countries through commerce. It maintains that the wages of labourers should be the same in every country. This is altogether impossible. . .

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 11th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

A writer in the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 11th March, observes:—We had thought President Wilson to be an incarnate being when he propounded the scheme of the League of Nations But these thoughts about him are disappearing fast like the clouds of mist before the morning sun. It is now clear that the Westerners are a selfish people and that the League of Nation is only a league of the stronger powers. Even schoolboys are ridiculing the trend of the Peace Conference where selfishness predominates. "Are they so meek a race as the Indians to give up their greed of women, gold and land"? Ask some people. The smaller nations of Europe are beginning to say that they would have nothing to do with the bigger nations. America entered the war because she thought Germany would prove a menace to herself if she triumphed in Europe. President Wilson professed to establish justice. Germany and her allies, either because she feared this would be so, or perhaps for some other reason, surrendered. The true nature of the Westerners is now becoming evident, and we now see that what President Wilson said is all jugglery. President Wilson, even before the league was formed, saw that his object was gained and returned to America after receiving all honours from the Allies. Revolutions bigger than those that can be seen at present are impending. Discontent is at its highest in every country. Bolshevism is spreading everywhere and the lives of autocrats are being aimed at. Bolshevism is spreading even into Moslem territory. The Amir who was a staunch ally of the British was assassinated and this untimely death has created grave fears. To ward off all these evils it is imperative that the League of Nations should be established, but before this can be done, the Allies should recognise the principle of the gretest happiness of the greatest number. It is believed that unless the Allies realise this, the world can possibly have no peace and happiness.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

The King of Italy.

14. Referring to the reported murder of the King of Italy and the subsequent refutation of the same by Reuter, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th March, remarks that information is being constantly received of such barbarous acts as the murder of kings and the torture of women in Europe and adds:—Though Europe is said to be advanced in civilisation, numerous are the murders and other wicked acts committed there, and the reason for this is only the absence of a spiritual feeling in that continent, which has been long in existence in India, and avoiding such occurrences here. In this matter, Europe has to follow India and learn a lesson at her feet.

15. Reiterating that attempts are being made to oust from Krugerstorf near Johanesburg in South Africa the Indian merchants who have been there for a long time, the Desabhaktan. of the 11th March, writes:—Mr. Horniman sent to the Viceroy a telegram which he received from the British Indian Association in Transvaal and the Government of India have merely acknowledged the receipt of it. What does this signify? Perhaps the Government of India will help the ousting of the Indian merchants from South Africa and the colonization of those parts by the whites.

The Indians in South Africa.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

16. Referring to the draft rules of the League of Nations, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th March observes in its leader under this heading:—. . . The draft rules of the League of Nations have been published. They are disappointing to all those who have been hoping that a new era would dawn. The suspicion arises whether the grand ideas of Doctor Wilson have, after all, proved to be pious wishes only. . . The whiteman's burden is sure to continue in the future also and the white nations cannot help acting the trustees and guardians of Africa and Asia. . . The League of Nations turns out to be a League of White Nations.

Pious wishes.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

It is no wonder that there should be disappointment in these circumstances about the reconstruction of the world. It seems doubtful whether even the Americans have any faith in the results of the peace. They are making every effort to increase their navy and to make it second to none. From the cables received of late, it does not seem that either the republicans or the democrats in America have been satisfied with the proceedings of the Peace Conference. . . . Other nations than the white races should be allowed representation on the League of Nations. The Peace Conference does not appear to consider the question of dependent nations. . . The statement of President Wilson that Ireland can have no place in the League of Nations, that the Peace Conference cannot do anything with regard to the Irish ploblem, and that it should be settled by England and Ireland between themselves cannot but be disappointing. When the colonies have been accorded each a separate place in the League of Nations, it is not understood why India and Ireland should be refused the same privilege. The proposals of Doctor Wilson point out that it is necessary to grant the right of self-determination to every nation. Freedom is being granted to many parts under the enemy domination in accordance with those proposals. When the independence of Poland has been recognized by Britain, why should not the Peace Conference urge the necessity of applying the principle of self-determination to countries like India, Egypt and Ireland? Why should there be exceptions to general rules? Since the rules of the League are still draft rules, they require to be further discussed and finally settled at the Peace Conference. Doctor Wilson should ascertain the opinions prevailing in various countries on these draft rules.

17. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th March, writes with reference to the League of Nations:— . . . The League of Nations will surely require force to enforce the observance of its rules. It cannot be asserted that the League will use this force for the attainment of freedom by every nation and for the establishment of the well-being of the world. . . The League decides that Britain should be the mandatory of the Western and Central Asia and that Japan is to be the mandatory of the Eastern. This decision leaves the dependent condition of countries like India, Arabia, Persia and Mesopotamia quite intact. When the League thus follows the principle of might for which Germany has been condemned, there is no wonder in thinking men having their own suspicions about the triumph of justice and about the establishment of everlasting peace. . . The cries of a dependent country like India may not be heeded. But the complaints of Persia which has been a free country deserve consideration. The rules of the League itself will clearly show that the nations which have joined it are all concerned about their own interests and not at all about those of dependent countries, and that they are not prepared to make any sacrifice for the establishment of justice. They are keenly devoted to the increase of their own wealth, power and commerce. . . Is the League following the principles laid down by such eminent men as President Wilson and Mr. Asquith for the preservation of the rights and freedom of every nation in the world? Though these principles are observed to some extent with regard to the white nations, they are not at all being applied to the coloured races. . . The revolution now spreading in the European countries causes terror to the whole world. Whereas the havoc of the war was confined to the actual fighting area, the consequences of this social revolution are being felt in every house and village. Those who pose as the preachers of the world will do well to first set their own nations and countries in order. That those who cannot redeem themselves should try to redeem others is none but a figment of arrogance. . . Countries like Germany, Austria and Russia which were once reputed for efficient constitutions are now scenes of the worst chaos and revolution. . . The present European revolution shows that the very fundamental principles on which society is based there, are entirely defective. That, in these circumstances, the European nations should dare to be the mandatories of the eastern countries clearly proves the arrogance which is so natural to those nations. . . Proper economic adjustment is the key for the peace and well-being of the world. When there is food enough, there will be salvation also. It is money which is the main cause for all jealousies and quarrels in the world. . . It is impossible for the League of Nations, prompted as it is by self-interest, to be of any use in maintaining its own reputation for justice or in establishing justice all over the world.

The state of the world.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

Sudarsini, Viswasarayapuram, 15th Feb. 1919.

Peace negotiations.

18. In its leader under this heading, the Sudarsini, of the 15th February, writes:— . . . It is clear from the cables received so far that the Germans have been delaying the fulfilment of the armistice terms with some motive. The French Press doubts the wisdom of the Allies in disbanding their forces, while millions of soldiers are still kept in uniform in Germany. . . But the British strongly assert that the armistice terms imposed on Germany by the Allies are such that they will disable her for a long time to come, from waging another war. In whose words are we to believe? The present critical position and the recent proceedings of the Peace Conference lead us to doubt whether the French have, after all, greater political sagacity. It is, no doubt, right that every nation should care for its own interests in the Peace Conference, but it does not seem proper that some should make proposals which go against the principles laid down by Doctor Wilson. . . It is regrettable that those who are for having no more wars in future should be the first to increase their naval and military forces. . .

II.—Home Administration.

(c) Jails.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

The Jail administration.

19. Referring, with satisfaction, to the announcement made by Lord Chelmsford regarding the proposed appointment of a Commission to inquire into the Jail administration, the Hindu Nesan, of the 6th March, observes:—There are many reforms yet to be effected in the Jail administration. All the cruel actions committed within the jail premises do not become public. They cannot be brought to light unless a careful investigation is made by a Commission. It is but appropriate to have Diwan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai, who has very carefully studied the question, as one of the non-official members comprising the Commission.

(d) Education.

Samadarsi, Trivandrum, 26th Feb. 1919.

Madras education.

20. In an article under the heading 'Educational matters', a correspondent of the Samadarsi, of the 26th February, refers to the Madras report on education for the last year, deplores the fewness of schools and the low percentage of school-going children in this Presidency, and points out by reference to statistics that the Madras Presidency lags far behind Travancore (and other Native States) in educational progress, and that this comparison discloses the advantages or disadvantages of foreign rule. He notes the fall in number of secondary schools and the fall in strength of industrial and technical schools and draws attention to the fact that for the education of an Indian pupil the Government do not spend even a seventeenth part of what they spend for a European pupil and observes that this is an instance in point of the 'impartiality' of the Government of Madras. He also refers to a similar inequality in the pay of teachers in Indian schools and European schools and to the desirability of the Government doing something to ameliorate the condition of the helpless poor, and says:—The Madras Government have yet to do several things in the matter of education. When Native States, like Baroda, Travancore and Mysore, have made great progress in education and are still earnestly trying to advance, is it not disgraceful that the people of other parts of India should continue ignorant and weak?

(h) Railways.

Railway administration.

21. Referring to the railway administration report for 1917–18, the Swadesamitran, of the 8th March, observes:— Though the traffic in goods and passengers has decreased during the year, the receipts have increased and almost every item connected with the railway administration has a tendency to increase. Similarly, the difficulties of the third-class passengers have also increased, inasmuch as the railway fare has risen, tickets have to be secured only with very great difficulty and the overcrowding in carriages has also become greater than before. From the statement in the report itself that, though several reforms have been effected during the past few years to remove these hardships, it must be admitted that several other matters requiring improvement have yet to be attended to, it is apparent that the managers are not unaware of the difficulties of the passengers. It is not known when these difficulties will cease to be. Why should not the fare be reduced at this famine-time? There does not seem to be any sign of its reduction even next year. It is stated in the report that the increase in the fares has been made in view to reduce journey by railways. Why not the procedure now adopted of refusing the issue of tickets beyond the number for which accommodation is available, be followed after the reduction of fares? We trust that the authorities will pay attention to the matter and afford relief; 177½ lakhs of pounds have been provided in the budget for the ensuing year for the construction of new lines of railway, and at this stressful situation it is not desirable to lay new lines at such a heavy cost. It is, however, proper that a provision of 65 lakhs has been made for remedying the defects in the old lines. If this expenditure is mainly incurred on the improvement of facilities for internal transport in India, the present difficulties of the people will decrease at least after a year. If, on the other hand, it is incurred on items calculated to provide facilities for quickly transporting the raw products of India to sea-ports with a view to assist the industrialists in foreign countries, there will be no hope for our difficulties to minimise. It behoves the Government to see that the railway administration is carried on more for securing the happiness of the people and the advancement of the industries of the country, than for securing large income. But, considering the fact, that, during the past four years from 1914–15, the railway administration has been so conducted as to result in a steady increase of the net profit after the payment of interest on the capital, one has to conclude that the primary object, namely, that of promoting the interests of the country by means of these railways has been lost sight of, and that the yearly increasing profit has become the chief consideration. We think, therefore, that the Government should determine what exactly should be the object of the railway administration.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

Paddy on railway platforms.

22. Referring to the complaints from merchants of Rajahmundry, Madras and some other places that lakhs of paddy bags have been lying on railway platforms for about 40 days, without being exported, and that they are all becoming spoiled, the Andhraprakasi a, of the 5th March, remarks:— . . . The authorities should consider these facts well, and leave no room for repentence afterwards, by running a special train at least till all the paddy bags thus lying on platforms are exported.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 25th Feb. 1919.

A hymn in praise of mother Bharata.

23. The Desabhaktan, of the 25th February, publishes a number of verses, from the pen of a correspondent in praise of mother Bharata, one of which is to the following effect:—What is the use of the hand that does not worship the sacred feet of our mother, who shines as the sun to dispel the darkness of the bureaucracy, which does not favour the idea of conferring sweet home-rule on all people alike.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

The Imperial budget for 1919–20.

24. Remarking that nearly a half of the total anticipated revenues of the Government of India for the next year is set apart for military expenditure, the Swadesamtran, of the 3rd March, observes:—It is because the military expenditure during the past several years has been absorbing half the total revenues, sufficient funds are not available for purposes conducive to the advancement of the country. It is justifiable that a large military expenditure should have been incurred during the past three years as the war was raging, but it is most painful that this expenditure should increase even after the successful termination of the war. Evidently Sir James Meston has realised this for he has stated that out of the 412 lakhs of pounds to be incurred in connexion with the army, 87 lakhs have to be spent on account of increased expenditure undertaken in September last, and that after that is completely defrayed, military expenditure will come back to normal conditions. As this excess has to be met in parts every year, it will have to be incurred for two more years; meanwhile, we do not know what changes may take place in the military conditions and what new items of expenditure will have to be met. Past experience shows that military expenditure of the Government of India has only been increasing year after year. This expenditure is incurred not only to protect India's safety but also in view of the welfare of the British Empire. India has, however, to bear the whole charge. Two hundred and forty lakhs of pounds have been set apart for the construction of railways. Though the extension of railway lines is advantageous, still those advantages are shared by the European merchants and owners of factories in a greater proportion than the Indians. By such extension, increased opportunities are afforded for the articles made in the factories in Europe being brought over to the nooks and corners of India for sale. We are not unmindful, however, of the fact that this extension of railways will also be conducive to the improvement of the industries of this country But it is preposterous to speak of railways being conducive to the growth of industries before steps are taken to start the industries. Irrigation works will confer more lasting benefits on the country than railways; but only four lakhs of pounds have been set apart under this head. The increase and the improvement of irrigation facilities will add to the economic resources of India, while the increase of railways would only afford means for foreigners to drain the wealth of India. The necessity for laying out railways at such a financial stress as the present is not apparent. Slight relief will, of course, be afforded to a large number of persons as the result of the taxable minimum being fixed at Rs. 2,000 for income-tax purposes. While the Government of India are taking this step, it is noteworthy that the Government of Madras are amending the Madras City Municipal Act so as to make all residents in the city with an income of Rs. 500 and above liable to profession tax. The people should feel grateful to the Government of India for having accorded permission to provincial governments to utilize their surpluses on the improvement of education, industries, and forests, in view of the altered conditions of the war. Our attempts to ransack the budget figures to find out whether the Government, who decided, in view of the present high prices, not to levy income-tax on persons with a poor income of Rs. 1,000, have reduced the salt tax which oppresses even those with an income of less than Rs. 1,000, have not been successful. Though the Government reduced this tax only a few years ago, raised it soon after the war broke out. Why was it not reduced again after the close of the war? The Government have resolved to borrow 15 crores of rupees even next year. It is no doubt true that money is required to pay up some of the old loans. Cannot these loans be discharged by curtailing military and railway expenditure without going in for fresh loans? Sir James has stated that, in consideration of the expenditure to be incurred in the interests of this country, expenses on unnecessary items should be minimsed. Indeed, this is a good maxim; but why can it not be brought into practice? Is it necessary to spend 45 lakhs of rupees for the new Delhi? Can that not be postponed? Cannot increased expenditure be incurred on irrigation works yielding revenue, deferring at the same time expenditure on items yielding no revenue? It does not appear, from the Budget estimate, that Sir James has realised the stressful condition of the people.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

Adverting to this budget, the Hindu Nesan, of the 4th March, observes:—The important lesson we learnt from the European war is the truth that both the Government and the people can practise economy giving up the old practice of spending on unnecessary items. Sir James says that we should be sparing in our expenditure in accordance with this lesson. Is it proper economy to incur heavy expenditure on the army, the railways and the salaries of big officials and curtail the expenditure incurred in view of the welfare of the people and of their material prosperity?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 4th March, also refers to this subject and, while expressing its satisfaction at the proposal to raise the taxable minimum under the Income-tax Act to Rs. 2,000, remarks that this is not a mighty help to the tax-payers who have been undergoing much suffering for the last four years and says:—It is regrettabe that the budget should have been introduced in the Imperial Council at this juncture when the whole country is busy condemning the Rowlatt Bills. All the same the budget should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. The military expenditure should be reduced at least a little. Our opinion is that, if the budget is approved by the Legislative Council without any alteration, the financial position will become slightly difficult.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The Dravidan, of the 5th March, thinks that the budget estimate has been prepared in a liberal spirit to relieve the distress of the people and expresses its satisfaction at the statement of the Finance member that the taxable minimum for income-tax purposes will be raised to Rs. 2,000.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

The Imperial budget.

The Desabhaktan, of the 6th March, observes:—The Government of India are spending the revenues of India blindly as they like. There is none to check or question them. Before the war the Government were pleading want of funds for the improvement of industries and education, and when the war commenced, they said that India's advancement was impeded by it. Now even when the war has ended, they have disregarded such items as industries and education. The reason for India's income not being spent for the advancement of the Indians is the irresponsible system of administration prevailing. How long are the Indians to put up with such a system? In the budget recently presented in the Imperial Legislative Council, it is stated that half the total revenues of India will be set apart for military expenditure. Our friends will certainly tremble to note this. Military expenditure has been increasing year after year, and the Government have estimated that in 1919–20, it will come up to about 48¼ crores of rupees. This expenditure will only go on increasing. Should we state that, if Indian revenues are thus spent, the progress of the Indians will be but a dream?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 8th March 1919, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments of the Hindu of the 5th idem under the heading 'Military expenditure'.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

Imperial budget.

Adverting to the statement of Sir Dinshaw Watcha at the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, that this budget has been very skilfully drawn and that it is necessary to spend more money for the military and the railways, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th March, observes:—Perhaps Sir Dinshaw thought that be need not give proper reasons for the latter part of his statement. He glorified himself saying that for the last fifty years he had been condemning military expenditure. We do not belittle his greatness or experience in this matter. However we cannot but note that the reason for his speaking in support of the military expenditure in the budget is a very trivial one. Sir Dinshaw said that the military expenditure might be curtailed next year or the year after the next. We say that his observation is wrong. Sir James Meston has not even hinted that this expenditure may go down in future years. That Sir Dinshaw Wacha should, under these circumstances, speak in support of the military expenditure of the year is only madness.

Mysore Star, Mysore, 9th Mar. 1919.

The Imperial budget.

The Mysore Star, of the 9th March, writes:—It is becoming more and more evident that the military expenditure will be steadily rising year after year despite the plaintive representations of all classes of people that this burden should be lessened. Railway extension has received an allotment of £17,75,000, which is unprecedented. It is grossly unjust that irrigation works which are so indispensable to the economic advancement of the country have received only 4 lakhs sterling. As regards the importance of educational progress the Finance Member has shown only lip sympathy. Neither education nor sanitation has received liberal provision in the budget. It is a welcome piece of news, however, that incomes up to Rs. 2,000 will be free from tax. From the tone of the Finance Member in regard to the currency question, deploring the melting and hoarding up of coins, we may expect that even nickel rupees might be introduced.

Malayali, Quilon, 8th Mar. 1919.

Indian Budget for 1919–20.

A note in the Malayali, of the 8th March, says:—It is to be regretted that the Indian Budget for 1919–20 is seen to have caused public disappointment. The huge figures under the heading 'Military expenditure' is causing great alarm among the people.

Another note in the Malayali, of the 8th March, approves of the raising of the minimum taxable income under the Income-tax Act to Rs 2,000 per annum.

Manorama, Calicut, 4th Mar. 1919 & Kerala Sanchari, Calicut, 5th Mar. 1919.

The Imperial Budget for 1919–1920.

Referring to the Imperial Budget for 1919–1920, the Manorama, of the 4th March, and the Kerala Sanchari, of the 5th March, point out that while no additional amount has been set apart for education and the allotment for irrigation purposes has been reduced, the amount under the head military expenditure has been doubled, and they think that the raising of the minimum taxable income under the Income-tax Act to Rs. 2,000 is the only relieving feature of the budget in question. The former adds that the Hon'ble Members will not pass the budget as it is.

Yogakshemam, Trichur, 7th Mar. 1919.

Writing on the same subject, the Yogakshemam, of the 7th March, points out that while nearly three-fourths of the revenue has been absorbed for military expenditure, it has not been made clear why such a large army should be maintained in spite of the conclusion of the war and that the allotment of such a large sum for military expenditure has caused the Government to be miserly in the matter of education and sanitation. It also takes exception to the allotment of 240 lakhs for the extension of railways.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

The Imperial Legislative Council and the Budget criticism.

Commenting on the Budget statement presented in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th March, observes:—. . . It is true that the extension of railways would be beneficial for European merchants and millionaires. As has been pointed out by the Honb'le Mr. Sarma, it is but just that expenditure on irrigation should have a superior claim over that on railways. . . It is a great drawback that the economic resources of the country should be utilized not for the prosperity of the country but for the benefit of foreign merchants. . . Neither the criticisms of the members nor the defence of the Finance Member reveal any special technical knowledge. The reason for this is to be found in character of the Budget itself.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

India Office.

25. In a lengthy article under this heading the Hindu Nesan, of the 1st March, makes the following observations among others:—The Indians demand that the India office should be abolised as, in their opinion, it stands in the way of the Government of India being reformed. The majority of those belonging to this office aim at keeping the Indians as slaves. They think that the Indians have not the capacity and training to conduct the administration of a country and that they are governing India only for the welfare of the Indians. Such a view is greatly prejudicial to the progress of India. The efforts of our people to abolish the India office have, however, proved futile on account of the narrow-mindedness of the Indian Civil Service officers. . . It must be said that, by the appointment of Indian popular representatives as members of the India Council, the members of the India office will become somewhat liberal-minded in respect of Indian affairs, and that the selection of Anglo-Indians, who were serving in India will only be transporting to the India office their long-cherished administrative principles and prejudices. We trust that much good will result by increasing the number of the Indian members on the Council of the Secretary of State. They will turn out good councillors to the Secretary of State besides getting sufficient training in administrative matters and, on their return to India, they will be of great use in the administration of this country. The India office should be serviceable in improving the Indian administration and bringing forward the Indians, but should not be an instrument for impeding reforms and marring the progress of the Indians.

26. Referring to the necessity for obtaining a licence for the import of rice and other grains from Burma, the Swadesamitran, of the 3rd March, observes:—It was expected that keeping the merchants under control by the issue of licences would be highly beneficial but owing to the defect in the system, only evil is said to result. According to the present system, licences are granted to a few and refused to many. Instead of the room available in the ships being allotted fairly among the applicants, some are granted licences for importing 1,000 or 2,000 tons of rice with the result that a good number of persons cannot find space in the ship and the trade gets into the hands of a few. But it may be argued that this is not likely to cause any hardship inasmuch as the Director has issued orders prohibiting the sale at a profit of more than 8 or 10 annas per bag. But where is the guarantee that the Director's order is strictly carried out in practice and that the merchants do not get any additional profits, while acknowledging formally the receipt of a profit of only 8 annas per bag? If the importers are many, there will be competition among them in the matter of sale and the prices will then go down of their own accord. It appears, therefore, justifiable that, in the interests of the public, all applicants for licences should be given a portion of the accommodation available in the ship. Why should the mufassal merchants be made to crowd together in Madras seeking the favour of the importing merchants in the city? Why should not licences be granted to the mufassal merchants to import articles direct? Until licences continue to be issued only to a few, without the retail prices being regulated, there is no hope of any benefit for the consumer.

The food situation.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

Referring to the details of the production of food stuffs furnished at the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, by the member in charge of the Agricultural Department, the Hindu Nesan, of the 3rd March, observes:—The attempts made so far for improving agriculture are not adequate. Besides finding out scientific ways to improve the yielding capacity of lands, ways should be devised to improve the quality of the grains. We trust that our Government will impart agricultural instruction to our people through schools in the manner in which it is being done in the Punjab. The sooner the Government and the people take to improving the old methods of cultivation and reclaiming waste lands, the greater will be the benefit. It is certain that the situation will become much worse very soon. Want of proper attention to the food situation till now has resulted in this state. The measures taken by the Government to relieve the food stress in the different presidencies were mostly ineffective. The efforts made by the Director of Civil Supplies in one province to relieve its hardships in a way acted prejudicially against the other provinces. Perhaps so much difficulty might not have arisen, had there been one central authority to look to the interests of all the provinces. We are at a loss to understand why the Government have not yet prohibited the export of foodstuffs from India, though such a stress has happened. Lootings of the nature of those that occurred during the latter part of the year 1918 can be expected to occur at any time. The Government should come forward to relieve this distress with the utmost expedition. It appears that alleviating the difficulties of the poor in Madras is a comparatively easier task than in other places. Those experienced in rice trade consider it possible to arrange for the sale of rice at four measures for a rupee in retail. Why have not the Government then attempted to relieve the distress of the poor people in the city? In Madras, associations like the Madras Corporation may purchase rice wholesale and sell it to the poor in retail. Such an attempt will, we trust, meet with the support of the Government. A reduction may also be effected in the price of rice and other foodstuffs by increasing the number of co-operative stores here. We hope that the Registrar of Co-operative Societies will consider over the matter and adopt the necessary measures.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 3rd Mar. 1919.

Referring to the scarcity of kerosene oil throughout the Presidency and to the inordinate increase in the price of rice and other foodstuffs and remarking that the situation is giving cause for anxiety, the Lokopakari, of the 3rd March, observes:—The people do not know what relief measures the Government have adopted. It is said that the Government are busy with the affairs of foreign countries and are not devoting their attention to the internal affairs. There is some truth in this as well. It is the primary duty of the Government to attend to the requirements of the people suffering for want of food and raiment, and relieve their distress.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The food situation.

Commenting on a telegram said to have been sent by a correspondent from Rajahmundry to the Hindu to the effect that 50,000 bags of grains are lying on the railway platforms for want of wagons, the Hindu Nesan, of the 5th March, writes:—It is invariably complained that the railway authorities do not supply wagons in such a way as to facilitate trade and that this should be rectified. It is intolerable injustice that, in this time of famine, the bags of grains lying at Rajahmundry should remain without being transmitted to Madras or other places. In the matter of food situation in our province, even the papers conducted by Englishmen find fault with the Government, saying that, either for lack of interest or strength, they are keeping quiet without promptly remedying the situation and relieving the distress of the people. When food is scarce in this province, is it right to permit export of grains from here to other provinces? Everyone regrets that, at this juncture, the Government of Madras should remain dormant without evincing any interest in the matter.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madura. 6th Mar. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 6th March, repeats in a leader on this subject some of the observations contained in its issue of the 3rd idem regarding the inconvenience caused to the people by the procedure adopted at present by the Director of Civil Supplies, and adds:—It is rumoured that those who do not get licences for importing rice, secretly enter into some agreement with those who get such licences. Thus it appears that bags of rice have to pass through several hands before they are loaded in the railway wagons, and the price is enhanced at each stage by 8 annas per bag. Unless the authorities who have fixed the price of rice in Burma also specify the rates at which it should be sold in particular places, there will be room for profiteering in the intermediate stages. So, they should calculate the railway freight, etc., and order that in particular places rice should not be sold above certain fixed prices. If, for want of accommodation in the ship, some are denied licences in one month, they should be given preference in the next month. In the matter of granting licences, preference should be given to merchants of Salem, Coimbatore, North Arcot and other districts, where there has been failure of crops, and not to big companies which will stock rice in Madras and supply the same to those who would sell it in those districts. If this is not done, the distress of the poor will be relieved only if the Government import rice and sell it direct to mufassal merchants. The prices will also be reduced if a larger number of ships are engaged in the transport of rice and licences granted to the merchants in the mufassal districts to the extent they require.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

Inviting the attention of the Government to the necessity for making increased efforts in the matter of relieving the distress of the people, the Dravidan, of the 6th March, observes:—Till now the provincial authorities were preventing foodstuffs from getting out to other provinces. Hereafter, dry grains will, it is understood, be transported to other provinces also for consumption. It appears that the Government of India have withdrawn the control of the Government of Madras over the transport of dry grains, at the instance of the Bombay Government. This will, doubtless, cause much hardship to the people of this Presidency.

It is also stated that the Mysore Government will similarly be divested of their power to retain their foodstuffs in their own State. Then the stress for foodstuffs in our province will become indescribable. It is not right, that, for the comfort of the Bombay Presidency, our Presidency should starve. The people of the Bombay Presidency are already rich and our people cannot compete with them in the matter of the purchase of foodstuffs. We fully endorse the opinion of the Madras Times that our Government should not keep quiet in the matter but should resolutely protest againt the action of the Government of India, and that the latter should keep their order in abeyance until the views of the people of this Presidency are communicated to them through a special meeting of the Madras Legislative Council convened for the purpose.

The paper also reproduces the sentiments of the Justice of the 3rd idem under the heading 'Prices' and strongly urges that the Government should find out the real cause of the present stress in regard to scarcity and high prices of foodstuffs and adopt systematic measures of relief.

The food situation.

The Swadesamitran, in its supplement of the 8th March 1919, publishes an article on this subject, which contains the following observations among others:—While large sums have been provided in the budget estimate for relief of distress in other provinces, it is unfortunate that in our Presidency the Government have set apart only Rs. 25,000 for the purpose. It is regrettable that the Government should remain without understanding the real situation and realising their responsibility at a time when the country is rent with the cry of famine. If, perhaps, certain municipalities come forward to afford relief and apply to the Government for loans required for the purpose, the Government should not decline to grant the loans asked for. A refusal on the part of the Government to grant such loans will make it practically impossible for several municipalities to work in this direction. Further, the condition of the people in villages also should be attended to. For this, the taluk and district Boards should be made to purchase large quantities of rice and, establishing depots in various places, sell rice to the poor. It is essential that the restriction that rice can be transported only from certain specified mills in the delta tracts should be removed. It is stated that permission has not been accorded for the transport of stocks of rice already collected from mills other than those specified by the authorities. For example, Mr. Mohen Lal Kanniya Lal, a merchant of Madras, who had stocked 2,000 bags of rice purchased from the mills in Gōdāvari, Kistna and Nellore districts was, it seems, refused permission to transport them by rail. It appears he even offered to the Director of Civil Supplies that he would sell rice at 4 measures per rupee in Madras if this permission was granted. But to what effect? The Director is but a member of the bureaucracy! He seems to have declined to grant the permission asked for. If this were a fact, it is a matter for regret.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

The food situation.

Observing that some merchants in Madras have come forward to sell Rangoon rice at more than 4 measures per rupee, if they too are granted licences like Messrs. Best & Co. who have undertaken to sell at 4 measures, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th March, writes:—It is hoped that the authorities will pay attention to this request. We have to think that, as these merchants say, there is much profit to the Anglo-Indian company even in selling at 4 measures per rupee, and that, by having granted them licences the authorities have allowed the company to make a profit. It will not, therefore, be too much for us to state that it is both necessary and just that they should grant licence to the merchants who come forward to sell at more than 4 measures per rupee.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

Reproducing the sentiments contained in New India of the 8th idem under the heading "The Monopoly in Rangoon rice", the Hindu Nesan, of the 10th March, makes the following remarks among others:—If the Government would show to the Indian merchants also the concession they are showing to Messrs. Best & Co. in the matter of importing Rangoon rice, some of our merchants are ready to take the responsibility to sell this rice at the rate of 4 measures and 1 ollock per rupee. Then as regards boiled rice got from the mills in the delta districts, which now sells at about 3 measures per rupee, if the Government would afford the necessary facilities by removing the present restrictions, the local merchants agree to sell it at not less than 3½ measures per rupee. It is the opinion of the merchants that the present high prices is due to the unnecessary restrictions imposed by the Director of Civil Supplies. They loudly complain that the Government do not treat them properly. Profiteering is now going on freely. Unless the Director entirely changes his ways and methods, the merchants consider that the hardships of the consumer will be increasing. If he cannot change his methods, they are not for his exercising any control in the matter of trade.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Indian Munitions Board.

27. Observing that it appears from the reply to an interpellation by the Hon'ble Mr. Patel at the recent meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, that out of 365 officers in that Board inclusive of Europeans and Anglo-Indians there are only three Indians, the Swadesamitran, of the 4th March 1919, remarks:—Are there not many Indians competent to sit on this Board? There is nothing strange about the Indian merchants complaining that their interests are not well attended to, seeing that the foreigners are there in large numbers. It is this Board that is to take steps to hasten the industrial advancement of our country. This is curious indeed!

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

28. The Desabhaktan, of the 5th March, publishes six verses, from the pen of a correspondent, in which, while reproducing some of the sentiments expressed in the leader of the Desabhaktan, of the 1st idem, the writer asks whether the action of those who do not understand the times, bestow attention on the cruel famine and heed the words of eminent Indians and who claiming a superiority for their own acts try to keep others under subjection, is in consonance with their love of liberty.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras. 10th Mar. 1919.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

The Lokopakari, of the 10th March, writes on this subject as follows:—The Desabhaktan is at present in the stage of an infant and needs much external help to reach the further stages of boyhood and youth. Until it reaches the stage of adolescence, it should attempt to walk but cautiously. If it should begin to run while it is in the stage of a baby with tottering steps, it would meet with a fall and subject itself to danger. Vernacular papers are very few in our country and still more few are those that do service to the country. It is essential for the progress of the country, that at present when many papers are required to point out the mutual duties of the Government and the public, the existing papers act cuntiously so as to avoid falling into the clutches of repressive measures. We expect that the Desabhaktan will pay some attention to this fact.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

In its leader under this heading the Desabhaktan, of the 10th March, writes:—The Desabhaktan has to-day become a twice-born. Hereafter, it will serve the country with a hundred times greater vigour than before. It will show in action that it is subject to none. It is certain that the Tamil land will rejoice to see the Desabhaktan, demonstrating that it cannot be opposed by any. The light of patriotism is flashing upon the tree of liberty. Darkness of bondage has fled away. Whether the laws which afflicted the Bhaktan will affect it again is doubtful. There is the soul force of Mahatma Gandhi to do away with these laws. Friends should understand that the Desabhaktan is one that grows by means of the soul force of Mahatma Gandhi. . . We have not forgotten to express our gratitude to Lord Pentland who, by forfeiting the first security of the Desabhaktan, has caused its name and fame to spread everywhere and made all the patriots in the Tamil land its friends. . . It will shine for ever in the Tamil land. It is possible for none to crush it.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

The Desabhaktan, of the 7th March, has a long leaderette dwelling at length upon the 'excellent' services rendered by it to the people, especially by way of improving their political knowledge and observes:—The friends of the Desabhaktan might have known that it would not perish merely by its security having been forfeited by the Government of Madras and if there are any who are not aware of this they should even now know it beyond doubt. If the Bhaktan were one of the so-called newspapers, it would be dispirited by this affliction. Will this paper, that moves about with worthy objects and an undaunted spirit, mind all this? It will not flinch even if danger several times greater than this should befall it.

The same paper reproduces a lengthy article from the Janamitran of Ceylon on this subject, which contains the following observations among others :—Though the articles referred to by the Government were published in the months of June, July and November last year, no warning of any kind appears to have been given to the Desabhaktan until the order of the forfeiture of security was communicated to it. When anything seems to be offensive, if a warning is at once given in regard to it, it may prevent the commission of such an offence thereafter. If, without doing so, crimes are allowed to accumulate and steps taken to award punishment, can it be called just procedure? But when one closely considers the fact that the articles were collected one by one and grouped together later on, one has reason to think that the administrative machinery comprising the bureaucrats had an ulterior motive of crushing the Desabhaktan. Though the Desabhaktan has much of loyalty and patriotism, it has not the least devotion for the bureaucrats. It is interested in condemning their unjust actions and giving them good advice. Will the bureaucrats favour such qualities? Will they brook to see a paper that decries their actions? Will they remain without seeking the means and opportunity to crush it? We would but consider it strange that this kind of difficulty had not befallen the Desabhaktan ere now, though the influence of the bureaucrats is predominent in administration. If we consider the nature of the articles, there does not appear to be any justification for the present action. When would the true nature of a thing be revealed? How can the true significance be realised, if the spirit of the articles is to be gauged by means of some sentences or words here and there? Further, there is no room to think that even the expressions and sentences selected savour of sedition. They describe only the obstructions caused by the bureaucrats. Could this be sedition? Could it be creating class hatred to speak of the relation between the Anglo-Indians and the bureaucrats? Do not the Anglo-Indians and the bureaucrats publish things which would create disgust and displeasure in the Indians. Probably, the arrow of the Press Act cannot be effective in the case of papers, which are finding fault with the Indians and their aspirations! There is also room for thinking that the attitude of the Desabhaktan in having strongly protested against the Rowlatt Bills and shown clearly the hardships likely to result therefrom may be a reason for the present action of Government against it.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

The Desabhaktan, of the 11th March, fully endorses the comments of the Mahratta on this subject which contain the following observations among others :—The forfeiture has made it perfectly clear that it is the work of the bureaucrats in Madras to repress those papers that condemn their actions. We should take care to see that, so long as the bureaucratic rule continues in India, they are not given any kind of powers under any law.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

The Desabhaktan and the Swadesamitran, of the 4th, 6th and 10th March, and the Hindu Nesun, of the 7th idem, publish, some in full and some in abstract, the proceedings of meetings held in Madras to sympathise with the Desabhaktan and protest against the action of the Government, while the Desabhaktan, of the 4th to 8th and the 11th idem, the Swadesamitran, of the 5th and the 7th idem and the Dravidan, of the 5th idem, publish abstracts of similar meetings held at Tuticorin, Vengandur, Arni, Kurtalam, Trichinopoly and Shiyali, at Vengandur and Arni and at Tanjore, respectively.

The Philippines and India.

29. Referring to the demand of the Philippines for Home Rule, the Desabhaktan, of the 5th March, observes :—Though it is more than 150 years since India came under the British rule, the Indians are still in a state of slavery and famine and pestilence are afflicting them. But, within twenty years of coming under the rule of

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

America, the Philippinos have had a responsible form of government, have improved in all directions and are now demanding the right of self-determination. Brethren! Think of the nature of the British rule in India. It appears all appointments in the Philippines, except that of the Governor-General, are held only by the Philippines and even this Governor-General has to conduct the administration only in accordancee withthe wishes of the people in the island. But in India all the higher appointments are conferred only on Europeans, on the score of capability. And again the authorities here do not hesitate in the least to revive unjust laws and misuse existing ones. They have made it their business to flout Indian public opinion. What can we do with such an irresponsible system of administration?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 5th March, invites the attention of those here who are provoked by the demands of the Congress and the Muslim League, to the readiness of the Americans to grant the request of the Philippinos.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The Press Act.

30. The Swadesamitran, of the 5th March, writes a long leader to the following effect:—Only those who patiently endure the hardships that they have to suffer in serving their country are people who render real service to it. Great men like Mr. Tilak and Mr. Lajput Rai are born to serve their country and suffer on that account. Great is the number of such unselfish workers in this world. With an increase in their number, the fitness of this country for democracy becomes patent. Like these people, the newspapers which are conducted with strict regard to conscience and the presses that print these papers are doing their duty conscientiously regardless of all danger, difficulty and aspersions cast against them by the opponents. The word of the Press Act is hanging over their heads ready to come down at the will of the authorities as influenced by the Anglo-Indian Press. The river of fire of the Rowlott Bills will perhaps flow under their feet hereafter. Our Desabhaktan, having fallen a victim to the Press Act, is waiting to be rescued through the love of the public, who, we trust, will enable it to render service to the country again. While in England and other western countries newspapers are regarded as the means of expressing popular opinion, the Indian newspapers are always viewed with suspicion by the authorities here. It is only why the Government themselves conducted newspapers in several provinces spending largely from public funds, to give wide publicity to war news. If the Government, who command unlimited powers, should try their strength with the papers which are generally doing their work subject to many risks, what is to be the fate of these papers? . . . If any offence is committed by them, there is the Penal Code under which these can be punished. If they are punished by the courts of law, the people will have nothing to complain of. Without adopting this straightforward course, the authorities apply the Press Act against papers which do not anticipate any danger. They point out an article written on a particular date as offensive. A very extensive net is spread for declaring an article to be offensive. When the accused pleads that the article is not offensive, there is no direct means of getting it out of this illusive net even in a court of law. So a newspaper can be conducted only so long as it is in the good graces of the Executive Government. Why should the Government wield this special power even after the war has come to an end? What can the Indian papers do after all? That the people of this country should, like those of other countries, get power is their only aim. They trust that by divine will, and for her own welfare, India has come to be connected with Britain and it is their hearty desire that this connexion should continue for ever. That the Executive Government should wield authority to suppress papers holding such views is quite an anomaly. The permanency of this Act will only be detrimental to the purposes of fostering the loyalty of the Indians. It is only if their wishes are fulfilled that the Indians who are known for their meekness will be bound by a sense of gratitude and unwaning love towards the British Empire. But many among the bureaucrats who conduct the administration of India prefer the interests of their own party to those of the British Empire and India and want to keep the papers in such a condition that they cannot make any efforts which will affect their influence. Lord Chelmsford has no reason to cherish that party love. If, in his time, he does away with this wretched Press Act, his name will for ever shine in India. Otherwise, the Indian papers will do their duty suffering any kind of hardship.

Observing that the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Madras agreed at first to grant permission to one Mr. Dandapani Pillai to open a press in Madras, under the name of Gandhi Press, and that on the afternoon of the same day when the petitioner appeared before him with a security of Rs. 2,000, the Magistrate said that permission could be granted only after inquiry, and adjourned the case to the 17th March 1919, the Desabhaktan, of the 7th idem, remarks:—According to the Press Act, when a security of Rs. 2,000 is deposited in the first instance, the Magistrate has to grant permission at once. It is not known for what reason he has made the petitioner wait till the 17th instant.

31. In a lengthy article dwelling on the progress of the Japanese trade, the Hindu Nesan, of the 5th March, remarks that, while the Europeans were hitherto monopolizing the trade of other countries, time has come for them to fear that the Japanese have risen to appropriate their trade and throw them into oblivion.

32. Adverting to the statements of the Englishmen and the Statesman of Calcutta, that the Government should not mind the threats of Mr. Gandhi, that the Viceroy should impress upon him the responsibility of the Government and the condition of the country and teach him a lesson, and that, in the present condition, the Government should pass the repressive Bills into a permanent law, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th March, remarks:—What to say of the wicked tendency of these papers? Perhaps these papers are ignorant of the observation of Mr. Gilbert Murray that the entire military strength of the Government will be of no avail against followers of passive resistance like Mr. Gandhi! Why have not these understood the significance of Mr. Murray's warning that the Government should behave with great care towards Mr. Gandhi? Let these papers realize that sporting with and ridiculing him are like sporting with fire. The Viceroy also will do well to note that Mr. Gandhi will fear only truth and not the threats of the Government.

Passive resistance and the Anglo-Indian papers.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

In the course of an article about a public meeting recently held at Delhi to condemn the Rowlatt Bills, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th March, observes:—There have appeared good signs of passive resistance spreading vigorously in the city of Delhi. Mahatma Gandhi has started to travel place to place. Patriots! Arise to discharge your duty. Know that the vow of passive resistance is the only means of redressing your grievances.

Passive resistance.

33. Observing that the British Government have given some submarines and other ships to Canada and Australia, and referring to the statement of a member of the Parliament that some ships may be given to other colonies also, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th March, remarks:—How many ships are the British Government going to give India? India is not a colony; so we think that nobody will ask the British Government on behalf of India! What can anybody do when India is suffering between Great Britain and the colonies? Though a fleet may probably be formed in India through the efforts of Lord Jellicoe, neither will the Indians be admitted into it, nor will they be allowed to manage it. It will be nominally called the Indian fleet and will be maintained from Indian revenues. Will the leaders be unmindful of the fact that it is going to turn out like this?

Adverting to the statement of a correspondent in the Bombay Chronicle about the grievances of the telegraphists, chiefly among the members of the Local Service, that a distinction is made in this department between the members of the General Service and those of the Local Service, and that such distinction being based on racial differences is against the spirit of the Proclamation of Queen Victoria, the Swadesamitran, of the 7th March, observes:—Should we again urge that the public cannot in the least put up with such racial distinctions? The authorities of the Telegraph Department should attend to this matter at once and adopt such measures as would redress this grievance.

India and its laws.

35. The Desabhaktan, of the 7th March, writes:—It is well-known to the world that India is a peaceful country and that the Indians hate rebellion, disturbance, etc. While so, it is indeed surprising that new laws which are not in force anywhere should be coming into existence in India alone. The Press Act, the Seditious Meetings Act and the Defence of India Act were enacted in succession, and now the Rowlatt Bills stand prominent. All these Acts were brought into force only in opposition to the opinion of the Indian public. When the Press Act was brought into force, the Government drew some of the moderates to their side. The popular representatives opposed the Bill in several ways, but the Government remained without giving ear to all their representations. The same was the case with the Defence of India Act. And now, we need not dwell on the case of the Rowlatt Bills. If we consider a little about the application of the Press Act, we can very well realise the severity of that Act. The Executive authorities are given free scope to make use of this Act as they like. As many of these are not conversant with the vernaculars properly, they apply this Act to vernacular publications. This Act is drafted so cleverly that it permits the authorities to take action under it as they like. This is being applied against innocent people, loyal persons and patriots equally. We may take, for instance, the case of our Desabhaktan which has fallen a prey to it. Perhaps the Press Act trembles at the papers which engender treachery to the country and class-hatred. By means of this Press Act the authorities repress the patriots and those that render service to the country. We need not say how many have been subjected to misery by the Defence of India Act. Though this Act was enacted on account of the war, it was being applied in other directions as well. Those who are now imprisoned under this Act are innocent people and do not know what crime is. This truth will become patent by a perusal of the letter of Darsi Chenchayya. As if these Acts were not enough, Sir Harcourt Butler applied an Act known as the Post Office Act against the newspapers. The Government of India, who have a craving for applying new laws, have now introduced the Rowlatt Bills. The Government anticipate that, by this law, peace will be secured. But, it is certain that on the other hand there will be unrest. Though there are many evils in these Bills, we think there is also some good in them. They convert into patriots even those who do not seek the good of the country. Has the strength of the Desabhaktan been affected by the arrow aimed against it by Lord Pentland? Has its real attitude been altered? Has it been enveloped by the illusion of the bureaucrats? No, no. The Press Act may threaten the Desabhaktan and may try to repress it. But so long as it has got the support of the brethren and sisters of the Tamil land, it is certain that it will not perish. The influence of the bureaucrats cannot be used against the Desabhaktan.

New laws that have come into existence in India! When are you to perish? On account of you, only unrest and disturbance and not peace crop up in the country.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

Influenza.

36. Adverting to the report published by the Government of India furnishing particulars of the losses caused by this disease, the Hindu Nesan, of the 7th March, observes:—Such a heavy mortality appears to be due mostly to the want of proper medical aid in the rural tracts. The Government not only allow the indigenous medical practitioners to dwindle away without any encouragement, but also fail to appoint in their stead a sufficient number of men trained in the western system of medicine. Hence it was that the poor villagers found themselves helpless at the time of need.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

Religious institutions.

37. The Hindu Nesan, of the 7th March, observes:—Though the British Government say that they do not interfere in religious matters pertaining to Indians, still in view of the progress of the most of the subjects it is but proper for them to keep our religious institutions in order. In spite of their non-interference policy in the matter of religion, are not the Government maintaining in India a separate department under the name of the Ecclesiastical Department at the cost of the taxes paid by non-Christian subjects? Further, all the manyams granted in ancient days for the benefit of the religious institutions in our country are being administered by the Government. Is this an indication of their non-interference in religious matters? They grant only a portion of the annual income of these manyams for the expenses of the institutions concerned and credit the balance to their own revenues. Instead of helping the religious institutions of the Indians, the Government are thus obtaining in a way an income through them. The case of Srirangam temple may be taken as an instance. The way in which the Government took over the properties of this temple is curious indeed. The temple now stands in need of great repairs and its affairs are not properly administered for want of funds. According to a joint memorandum presented by two of the residents of Srirangam, it is 80 years since the tasdik allowances given to that temple by the Government have been curtailed, and the total of the amounts thus curtailed comes to 5 lakhs of rupees. All this is temple money and should legitimately be spent for the temple and not utilized by the Government.

38. Referring to the apprehension of St. Nihal Singh expressed by him in his article to the Commonweal that India might be seriously affected by the attempt made by every nation since the close of the European war to set right its own industries and increase its trade and prosperity, the Hindu Nesan, of the 10th March, observes:—Some people are contemplating to enforce the prohibition that India should sell all her raw products only to the British Empire. If so, will the Indian products get a fair price? There are no factories in India to enable us to convert these raw products into manufactured articles here alone. The Peace Conference has since met and is determining the ways in which the affairs of the world have to be managed. According to that determination, the countries that are not yet sufficiently trained will be under the tutelage of those well trained. Before the poor countries under such tutelage get the required training, is there not the possibility of the latter profiteering in those countries? This is like blessing the people to be ever in poverty.

The industrial advancement of India.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 10th March 1919.

39. The Desabhaktan, of the 6th March, publishes in Tamil a letter written in 1910 by Count Tolstoy to Mr. Gandhi, in which the former makes the following observations among others:—Passive resistance is a policy which is the outcome of love, and love which works for harmony among men is the best principle. Though love is also the underlying principle of Christianity, Christians have been for the last 19 centuries using force to secure their material prosperity. The question, therefore, arises whether we should reject religious teachings, or do away with compulsory taxation, police administration, armies, etc. An attempt will have to be made at some stage or other to put an end to either of these conflicting factors, though now it may be accepted that armies should be maintained for purposes of war. This disagreement is realised by all Governments, who, perceiving where danger to them lies, are engaged in solving the problem 'to be or not to be', so that they may be on the alert to guard themselves.

Count Tolstoy and passive resistance.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th March 1919.

40. Referring to the specially stressful condition of the country on account of the high prices and scarcity of articles of food and clothing, the Lokopakari, of the 10th March, observes:—While keeping body and soul together has become a matter of difficulty, the people are getting anxious about liberty. The Government are attempting to impose on the people repressive laws to curtail even their existing liberty, as if the Press Act and other repressive measures are not sufficient. That the Government of India should, even after a lapse of 150 years of British administration in India, distrust the Indians will be deemed to be a defect in the administrative policy. The Rowlatt Bills appear only to root out the natural meekness and loyalty of the Indians. It is essential that the authorities should pay heed to the fact that, if those Bills are passed into law in the face of the unanimous opposition by the whole Indian community, the popular leaders are prepared to oppose them by means of passive resistance. The Government should not give room for unnecessary agitation. The European war has opened the eyes of the people of the world and has set up the agitation for self-determination and liberty. As liberty is man's birth-right, an agitation for liberty cannot be

The present situation.

Under this heading, a correspondent from Nellore writes to the Hitakarini of the 9th March:—. . . What is the use of appointing Aga Khan and Lord Sinha to high offices? What is the present state of the country? Are peace, health and contentment to be seen in any home? These Bills (the Rowlatt Bills) are the reward which the Government are pleased to thrust upon us for the service rendered by our people without foresight. . .

The Press Act and the Government securities.

41. Remarking that, when Government securities happen to be deposited as security for starting a new press or for renewing an old one, the Magistrate accepts them only at their market value, the Desabhaktan, of the 10th March, observes:—In the Act it is provided that the security amount should be paid either in cash or as Government securities. Let us take the case of a press which has to deposit a security of Rs. 10,000. The Magistrate says that securities which are now available for Rs. 10,000 should be furnished and not promissory notes of the face value of Rs. 10,000. If it is stated that the Act does not say so, he replies that the Government have ordered to this effect. Securities are issued only by Government. Even though the public purchase them at convenient prices, could not the Government take them for their real value? If the Government themselves depreciate the value of their securities, who else is to value them at their real price? Of what avail is our arguing like this? Is there anything like justice in regard to unjust laws and rules? Is the action of the authorities in matters like these based on law or on their own sweet will?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

The Press Act and the authorities.

Remarking that the Press Act has given unlimited powers to the bureaucrats, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th March, observes:—In fact this Act is applied in accordance with the wishes of the authorities who do not follow the procedure prescribed in the Act If the bureaucrats are bent upon enforcing the Press Act as far as they can, all the papers in India will disappear immediately. That is to say, the little liberty now enjoyed by some of the papers is only due to the good graces of the bureaucrats. Even as the number of repressive laws are being increased on the score of the actions of one or two anarchists, the Government of India have planted the Press Act. As this plant resembles the prickly-pear, it is growing luxuriantly without any water, etc. But as the result of it, the liberty of the Indian Press has fled away. Those who support the Press Act may, however, ask how papers can exist if they have no liberty. The existence of the papers is due not to their liberty but to the approval of the authorities. If one makes a close study of the Press Act, one will realise well that it is impossible to conduct a paper in India. Papers cannot refrain from dealing with politics. While doing so, it becomes necessary for them to bring to light defects as well as merits. It is only exposing defects that does not, at times, please the bureaucrats. Decrying the King or the Government and trying to cause discontent among the people will be considered to be sedition and anarchism. If so, the papers think that finding fault with the authorities who are representatives of the Government is not unlawful. But if the bureaucrats do not like their administrative policy or acts being condemned, they at once think of crushing the paper which so condemns, and resort to the Press Act. The excellent Press Act which is susceptible of a wide interpretation welcomes them with a smile. The section which provides that writing against the Government or the administrative policy established by law in India is unlawful, stands prominently before them. The authorities immediately try to do away with the papers which they do not like, charging them with the offence of writing against the British administration. Even though the Anglo-Indian papers speak disparagingly of the Hindus and the Muslims and write in such a way as to create mutual hatred between them, it is not deemed to be unlawful, as they have the full support of the bureaucrats. The papers that are hated by the authorities are supposed to violate law even if they protest against the actions of the Anglo-Indian merchants. Class hatred, it is said, will be created by writing in this strain! Consequently, such papers should, it seems, be brought under the operation of the Press Act! As the authorities are accustomed to suspect and afflict true patriots, it is no wonder that the Desabhaktan has been attacked by the Government of Madras. However, genuine papers like the Desabhaktan and venerable men like Messrs. Tilak and Gandhi will not become disspirited and flinch in their work even if two hundred Acts like the Press Act are enacted and eight thousand Acts like the Defence of India Act are enforced. Ah! When is the time for these cruel Acts to disappear. It is indeed ludicrous that we, though subject to the rule of England which is the abode of liberty, are bound by such uncivilized laws. . . . The Desabhaktan is lying with languor on the lap of Goddess Tamil with a wound that is being healed. However, its face is as ever resplendent with cheer and courage. Goddess Bharata is consoling goddess Tamil. The maid of liberty and the God of Justice are guarding the Desabhaktan on either side. The grace of sage Tilak and the veracity of Mahatma Gandhi have taken shape and are before it. The love of the Tamilians encircles him. Vandé Mátaram.

42. Dividing the articles appearing in the Desabhaktan, into those infusing piety, those infusing loyalty and those infusing patriotism, and stating that no other paper has, till now, written like it on loyalty, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th March, observes :— With the object of creating love for the British rule in those who have become disgusted by the acts of the bureaucrats and of some Anglo-Indians, we have stated that the administrative policy of the bureaucrats is likely to change with the times, that British rule is one which will not transgress the path of righteousness, that we should, in several ways, attempt to promote this righteousness and that, for this purpose, we should agitate within constitutional limits. The reason for our frequently protesting against the improper actions of the bureaucrats and the rude acts of some of the Anglo-Indians is that the loyalty of the public should not wane. The Desabhaktan used to strongly condemn those who entertain the idea of getting rid of the British rule in India. It is full of articles which decry sedition and anarchism. It has aided Mahatma Gandhi in his efforts to recruit men for the war. There is no limit to the articles it has written exhorting the public to contribute funds for the war. Our friends would not have forgotten the fact that the Bhaktan has clearly pointed out that the British rule is not responsible for the cruel deeds of the bureaucrats. . . . The Desabhaktan has, as a result of its great patriotism, won a medal in protesting against the cruel actions of the bureaucrats which are contrary to British justice. It is a fact known to our friends that Pentland's Government have got bewildered by its patriotism. We will never forget Lord Pentland who aimed his arrow at the Desabhaktan which has thus been fostering piety, loyalty and patriotism. The administrative policy of Lord Pentland in the British rule which is full of righteousness and justice is rotten. It is not known whether this rottenness will be remedied under the Government of Lord Willingdon.

The work of the Desabhaktan.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

43. Referring to the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma at the last meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, that the budget allotment for the improvement of sanitation in India be increased by 50 lakhs of rupees, the Desabhaktan, of the 11th March, observes :—Sir James Meston said that he could not accept the resolution though he appreciated the spirit of it. It is regrettable that Sir James did not accept the resolution though he was aware of the hardships suffered by the people by defective sanitation. The Government of India are willing to spend money in useless ways, but do not consent to spend it in ways serviceable to the people. In these circumstances how can we say that the Government of India are carrying on the administration with due regard to the interests of the people.

The meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

Adverting to the resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. B. N. Sarma that the expenditure under education be increased by 150 lakhs of rupees for making primary education free and compulsory, and to the opposition this resolution met with 'as usual' at the hands of the official members, the same paper remarks :— It has become a principle with the Government of India to plead want of funds when funds are demanded for elementary education and plead scarcity of teachers when funds are available. It is not fair for a responsible government to do so. Primary education is free and compulsory in all countries of the world. But why has not primary education spread in India though the British have been conducting the administration here for over 150 years? Need we state that it is because of the lack of attention on the part of the Government of India and the irresponsible nature of their administration?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The tramway strike.

44. Referring to this strike the Desabhaktan, of the 11th March, writes.—Though it is regrettable that the tramway employees should have struck work at this time, it is still more regrettable that the authorities concerned should have been indifferent to their grievances for three months. That such petty grievances as the curtailment of one hour from the total number of working hours for the day and the increase of the daily wages of the workmen by two annas, should remain without any redress, does not speak well of the nobility of the tramway authorities. The Directors of the Madras Tramway Company, who are Europeans, care only for their own profits and convenience but do not in the least care for the poor workmen. We do not know whether the tramway authorities are aware of the present high prices of foodstuffs. In view of the stress the poor workmen ask for an increase of their daily wages only by a couple of annas. Even at this stressful period the income of the company does not seem to have gone down. We trust that the authorities will take the necessary remedial measures realising that the public are put to great hardships on account of this strike.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

In writing about this strike the Swadesamitran, of the 11th March, remarks:—It is a matter for consideration whether, at this stressful period, so many employees will venture to go on strike without any real grievance. We would urge that the authorities should pay proper attention to this matter and try to act with sympathy and nobility.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

The tramway employees' strike.

Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th March, writes about the present strike of the tramway employees:— . . . It is not proper on the part of the tramway managers to fail to carry out their promises. We request them to take immediate steps to satisfy the employees and to give no room for inconvenience to the Madras public.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The tramway workers' strike.

With regard to the Tramway workers' strike, the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th March, requests the managers to satisfy the demands of the workmen at once in view of the great inconvenience to which the public are put.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The tramway employees, strike.

With reference to the tramway workers' strike, the Andhraprakasika, of the 11th March, observes in its leader:— . . . It is regrettable that political agitators like Mr. Subrahmanya Siva and others should not understand what effect their interference in the strike would have on the Tramway authorities. It would afford room for them to say that their workmen have been instigated by political agitators to strike work, and would displease them. . . Outsiders should, therefore, have no hand in it. The workmen know by experience that those who instigate them to head-long action cannot save them. It is an ill-considered step for them to go on strike so suddenly for the redress of their grievances. . . We think it altogether improper especially that they should have chosen such an important festive occasion for their purpose.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The Indian Civil Service officials and Mr. Montagu's compliment.

45. Referring to Mr. Montagu's euology of the services rendered by the Indian Civil Service officials, the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th March, observes:—Whatever be the administrative efficiency of the Indian Civil Service officials, it is quite clear that they have shown little sympathy in the matter of training the people in self-government. They have done their best to obstruct the fulfilment of the local self-government movement inaugurated by Lord Ripon. They have evinced an attitude of hostility to the popular movements. Very recently they have sent up a memorial objecting to the grant of even the Montagu reforms to the country. While, in these circumstances, the working out of the Montagu scheme of reforms is left to these men, there is no room to hope that the scheme will be a success. That the success of the scheme should be made to depend on these officials is its chief defect. That is why the Delhi Congress has asked for full provincial autonomy. The people were greatly astonished at the assurances which His Excellency the Viceroy thought fit to give to the Indian Civil Service officials. Doubts have begun to spread regarding the efficacy of the reforms. A perusal of Mr. Montagu's letter in connexion with the speech of Sir J. D. Rees on the reforms will further strengthen these doubts. . .

The Indian Civil Service.

In the course of an article under the heading 'The Indian Civilian officers', a correspondent in the Malayali, of the 5th March, refers to their fat salaries and autocratic powers and points out that the high expectations raised in the minds of Indians by the declaration of the 20th August 1917 have been laid low by the recommendations contained in the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme, because none of these recommendations came up to Indian aspirations. Such being the case, it is difficult to understand why the Civilians and other Anglo-Indians should protest against and oppose the scheme. In some places these civilians are known to be secretly conspiring to oppress the people without caring a straw for the Government. Inasmuch as they have to live on the salary which they receive from public funds, he asks who has given them the authority to dictate terms to Government, observes that the Viceroy ought to have checked their vagaries when these were brought to the notice of the Government during the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council in February, and expresses surprize at the surrender of His Excellency Lord Chelmsford to the Civil Service. . . . These Civilians are envious of the uplift of Indians and are intoxicated with autocratic authority. The Government should drive out this perverse tendency of Civilian officers. If, on the other hand, things turn out in accordance with the Viceroy's reply in the Imperial Legislative Council to questions on this subject, it is likely that there will be only an unprecedented increase in the autocratic power of the Civilian officers and consequent popular agitation. Indians are not jealous of Europeans. They only claim to have a share in the administration of India. It is a consoling fact, however, that there are both in India and in England many administrators who truly love India and Indians, without caring for the criticisms or threats of the Civilian officers.

The Industrial Commission Report.

47. Referring to the report of the Industrial Commission, the Andhrapatrika, of the 6th March, says:—The well-known scientist Sir P. C. Ray expresses his dissatisfaction about the report in an article contributed by him to the modern review for the current month:—"Pandit Malaviya has argued the Indian view with ability. . . If it is desired that enough money should be saved in the country to be devoted to national purposes, it will be useful to employ Indians only in all departments. If the present princely salaries should continue in all departments in future also, the country will be doomed." The increase of the salaries of the Medical Services are going to be increased. If the salaries of high-paid officials are to be still further increased there is no doubt that the administration will become even more costly.

Andhrapatrika, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

Foodstuffs.

48. In its leader under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 6th March, writes:— . . . On the orders of the Collector, the Headquarters Deputy Collector and the Tahsildar of Cocanada, it is said, have gone to Velangi, opened the granaries and got the paddy to Cocanada on carts paying Rs. 6–8–0 a bag. . . When merchants and big ryots are realizing large profits without any effort, is it right to expect them to dispose of the paddy stored by them and to help the reduction of prices? We, therefore, think that the Government will do well now to take possession of all the paddy in the Presidency, to export it wherever necessary and to sell it at a cheap price, thus protecting the poorer classes.

Andhraprakasika, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

Foodstuffs.

In its leader under this heading, the Andhraprakasika, of the 7th March, writes:— . . . The secret sale of rice in mills at a price higher than the one fixed by the Controller by a rupee or two may be asserted with certainty to be due to the restriction that the quantity intended for exportation should be purchased only in mills. This restriction should be removed. Facilities must be afforded to merchants in localities where there is dearth of rice, to purchase it from whomsoever they can get it. . . They say that there is plenty of raw rice in the Kistna and Guntūr districts. We are glad to hear that some merchants are prepared to open depots and sell rice at fair prices like Messrs. Best & Co., if only they are given permission to import it freely from these two districts. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

Agitation among the rice merchants.

49. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th March, writes:— . . . The representative of the Madras Times states that Messrs. Best & Co. will, in future, supply the rice required for the whole city of Madras. . . When one European firm is given the monopoly of selling rice, it is sure to raise the prices, though it may lower them for a while in the beginning. The people will have to depend on the mercies of Messrs. Best & Co., as the smaller merchants are denied the right to import rice. The method adopted by the Director of the Civil Supplies will be regretted by many merchants with whom the people also are bound to suffer. . . When the European merchants get exclusive privileges, it will surely be an eyesore to the Indian merchants. . . When the commerce within the country also is taken out of the hands of the people, there will be no limit to the discontent that may spread in the country. The American commerce being in the hands of a limited few, it is productive of endless evils to the people. If similar conditions are to prevail here also, the country will be in trouble . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

"Paying still more to those who are already well-to-do."

50. Under this heading, the Andrapatrika, of the 7th March, writes:— . . . Mr. Montagu has proposed to increase the salaries of the Indian Medical Service officers. In addition to this, Mr. Fisher has stated in the House of Commons that the Government have also under their consideration the increase of pensions. . . When provision could not be made in the budget for works of national utility, it is not known what justice there is in spending money in these ways. . . This state of things will not change, unless the people get the control of the purse into their hands.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras. 7th Mar. 1919.

Famine.

51. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 7th March, writes:— . . . The Controller's circular itself is the cause of high prices. However well this fact may be explained to him he does not seem to have the intelligence to grasp it. Moreover, he is giving trouble to merchants who pay thousands of rupees as income-tax. As the Controller acts as he pleases on the strength of the Defence of India Act, the prices have arisen, and both the ryot and the people suffer. . . When the rice crop has given a good yield, why should the prices rise? . . .

Yesterday's Senate meeting.

52. Commenting on the proceedings of the last Senate meeting, the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th March, remarks. . . When the whole world is adopting new methods in education, the inability of the Madras University to move with the time only shows its lack of initiative power.

VYKHANASA PATRIKA, Egavarpalayam, 2nd Mar. 1919.

News.

53. Under this heading, the Vykhanasa Patrika, of the 2nd March, observes:— While the temple-priests (members of the Vykhanasa creed) have been from time immemorial enjoying the inams and conducting the service of the idol, the Dharmarakshana Sabha, we regret, is trying to take away the living of the temple-priests, and doing them injustice by means of suits praying for schemes of management. . .

54. In its leader under this heading, bearing on a variety of topics, the Andhrapatrika (Weekly), of the 5th March, writes:— . . . The time has gone when a single king or a small body of men carry on their rule as they like. The time has gone when the rich oppress the labouring classes and the strong, the weak. . . Signs are not wanting to show that the competition for economic sovereignty in the world would lead to consequences even more disastrous than those of the war. . . The war has dispelled the fallacy that the economic condition of India is satisfactory. . . For the reasons stated above the budget statement of Sir James Meston cannot satisfy the people. . . The troubles of the ordinary people are endless. They have no food to eat, no oil for light and no rag to wear. . . Unless the export of paddy to foreign countries which is going on even now is stopped, there is no chance of the prices falling or paddy being available to all. The authorities will have to take drastic action in the matter, as otherwise there will be room for lootings and disturbances in the country. . . The changes effected by the Select Committee in provisions 21 and 28 of the Rowlatt Bills, which would upset the present just system of trial, are insignificant, and this is the root cause for anxiety. . . It may be said with certainty of the Rowlatt Bills that they are the most powerful enemies of the popular aspirations. The least sign of approval shown to such measures will strengthen the hands of the bureaucracy and weaken the cause of the people's freedom. It is not proper on the part of Messrs. Bannerjea, Sastri and Shafi to sign the Select Committee's report, opposing, as they say, the main principle of the Bills. Mahatma Gandhi has resolved to undo the Bills by following passive resistance. Two hundred persons in and about Bombay and Mrs. Besant have accepted his pledge. . . New ideas are spreading. . . But the future of India is at present beset with darkness on all sides. Absolute power is trying very hard in India and in the world to maintain its own prestige. Though Dharma is sure to triumph in the end, the history of the world teaches with a thousand tongues that a great sacrifice is needed for the establishment of the kingdom of right on the earth. By the grace of God, may that sacrifice take a soft, sweet and mild instead of a cruel, dreadful and monstrous form, under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi!

SUDARSINI, Viswasarayapuram, 15th Feb. 1919.

A leading article in the Nazrani Deepika, of the 11th March, complains about the scarcity and bewildering price of kerosine oil in Travancore about the greed and profiteering of wholesale and retail dealers who systematically discard proclamations prescribing maximum rates at which the oil can be sold and punishments for breach and about the tardiness of authorities in taking the required action to check and punish profiteering and in finding out the real causes of scarcity of supply and the required remedial measures.

dispensed with. . . Mr. Welby's surmise tallies with the views of the Pioneer. It is understood that the Provincial Governments have opposed the system of diarchy in the Government. The Indo-British Association as well as the Indian Nationalists are at one in condemning this diarchy. The opinion of the people on this question was made sufficiently clear even prior to the Delhi Congress which has only emphasised it in unequivocal language. . . Judging from the views of Mr. Welby and the Pioneer, it may be said beyond doubt that the Delhi Congress has displayed much farsightedness. . . As has been pointed out by the Bombay Chronicle, the bureaucracy would not be willing to grant provincial autonomy not in six but even in sixty years. . . India is not making any extravagant demands. She simply wants those opportunities which are absolutely necessary for her own happy living in this world. The least reflection on the fair name of the National Congress would be fully taken advantage of by the opponents to the national cause. 60. Referring to the increase in the Abkāri Revenue to the Government and to the drink problem, the Dinabandhu, of the 15th February, writes in its leader under this heading:— . . . We, therefore, request the Government to be kind enough to introduce a law prohibiting drink as has been done in America. If this is not possible, we request them to cut short the number of liquor shops, to remove them from public places and from the neighbourhood of village, and to order their complete closure during the Hindu festivals, and beg to point out that the Government will be doing a great reform, if by passing such stringent rules they look no more to the Abkāri revenue as a source of income to them.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 8th Mar. 1919.

What a contrast!

61. Under this heading, the Kistnapatrika, of the 8th March, writes:—. . . Though the South African Government did not approve of the policy of some nationalists who were for making South Africa, a republic independent of the British Empire, it has not prohibited a deputation from proceeding to Paris to lay their case before the Peace Conference. Similarly, some Irish representatives are proceeding to Paris to place the claims of Ireland to be constituted into a Republic, quite independent of British Imperial control. No party of Indian politicians desires severence of imperial connexion. They have not asked even for the immediate grant of full responsible government, all that they want being an instalment of reforms which constitute a genuine beginning of self-government. It is within the knowledge of every one what impediments were thrown in the way of a deputation of Indians proceeding to England to press this point. Mr. Tilak who is now in England and who wants to go to Paris to confer with some of the members of the Peace Conferece not on any Republican scheme, mind you!—but on the Congress-League Scheme only, is unable to get a passport. We cannot understand the strange propriety of the British Government denying, to such loyal citizens of the British Empire as Indians who do not want anything more than some reforms, that freedom which it is allowing to rebels who desire a Rebublic.

The manliness of Bhimasena.

62. Under this heading the Kistnapatrika, of the 8th March, reproduces in Telugu prose an extract from Bharavi's Kiratarjuniam in Sanskrit where Bhimasena exhorts his brother Yudhishtira, leading the life of a hermit in forests having handed over his kingdom to Duryodhana, to get his kingdom by acting in a way which becomes a man. The passage contains:—. . . It is not good that any one should be averse to human endeavour. The renouncing of human activity is not conducive to progress in any direction; please therefore give it up. Those riches which should be the possession of the brave alone cannot keep company with men devoid of enthusiasm. If you look to time as your saviour, will Duryodhana who has tasted the pleasures of kingdom so long, give up the kingdom voluntarily? Can self-respecting persons put up with mean living? For instance, the lion is satisfied only with the flesh of an elephant which it gets by exercising its prowess.

The truth has come out!

63. Referring to the correspondence relating to the Indian Civil Service Memorandum, the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th March, writes in its leader under this heading:—. . . Mr. Montagu has recently praised the Indian Civil Service officers for the services rendered by them and said that their co-operation is necessary for a successful working of the reforms. If the success of the reforms is to depend on the Indian Civil Service officials, all the hopes of the people are only destined to be idle dreams. . . Be it as it may, the admission by Indian Civil Service Association itself has cleared the doubt as to the genuineness of the draft memorandum. . . It will be seen from all this that it is simply an idle dream to expect any help from civilians in the matter of training the people in self-government. That Mr. Montagu should rely upon them shows his short-sightedness.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The draft memorandum sets forth the evils which are likely to befall the Civil Service, if the reforms should prove a success—evils such as the lowering of the prestige of civilian officials, and the chance of their living insignificant lives in this country. It is understood that the Provincial Governments have followed the views of the Indian Civil Service officials. Unless the people get complete provincial autonomy, there will be constant deadlocks as a result of the system of diarchical government which is not conducive to political progress. All those who have the country's interests at heart should, therefore, work for the realisation of the Congress resolution. Otherwise, the relations between the popular leaders anxious to secure greater and greater responsibility on the one side and the Indian Civil Service officials jealously guarding their power and prestige on the other will be very much strained, and the administration may come to a standstill. Should matters come to such a pass, not only will there be a set-back of all progress, but the position of the Indian Ministers will also become intolerable.

Export of foodstuffs and differences between Governments.

64. Adverting to the correspondence passing between the Government of India and the Madras Government regarding the export of foodstuffs, the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th March, appeals to both of them to understand the grievances of the people now suffering from famine and devise means to redress them, without minding their disputes.

65. Stating that contrary to the course adopted by the central and many other Provincial Governments the Madras Legislative Council will have a re-election of its Members in June next as has been observed by the Madras Mail, the Andhrapatrika, of the 11th March, remarks:—. . . It is clear that the discord between the Imperial and the Provincial Governments is becoming greater.

The Special Kistna District Village Officers' Conference.

66. The Andhrapatrika, of the 11th March, publishes in Telugu the proceedings of the Special Kistna District Village Officers' Conference which met at Bhimavaram and the resolutions passed thereat.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The Indian political arena.

67. In its leader under this heading, the Hitakarini, of the 9th March, writes:—. . . The agitation created by the Rowlatt Bills in the minds of the people has already given place to the faith that the pledge of Mahatma Gandhi would lead to the withdrawal of those Bills. This great vow of peace, this flame of the fire of truth has already spread from province to province. It has moved the king in the palace and the saint in the forest and prompted them to sign the pledge. Truth and righteousness know of no defeat in nature. The passive resistance pledge of Mahatma Gandhi surpasses the roar of a lion from its bush. It is more powerful than a bomb. . . There has been a great awakening in the country since it heard of this. . .

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 9th Mar. 1919.

Lokamanya Tilak's case.

68. Referring to the judgment in the Tilak-Chirol case, the Hitakarini, of the 9th March, remarks:—. . . The case has brought to light an important fact, and that is the partiality of Westerners to their own race. This is no fault, no sin. It is natural. It only shows that they are in the habit even of sacrificing justice, yielding to racial bias. Mr. Tilak also might have brought the suit just to reveal this secret and not in the hope of getting justice at the hands of foreigners in a strange continent.

HITAKARINI, Ellore, 9th Mar. 1919.

A deluge in future.

69. The Hitakarini, of the 9th March, reproduces in Telugu an article under this heading written by Dr. M. Nobles, a well-known scientist in Philadelphia. According to him a great deluge will occur in the life-time of the present generation, which would involve the obliteration of certain parts of Europe and Asia, and the formation of new continents in the Pacific and the Western seas.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

The second anniversary of Justice.

70. Giving the details of the recent celebration of Justice anniversary, the Andhraprakasika, of the 11th March, reports Dr. T. M. Nayar to have said:—The Secretary of State, having been already won over by the Extremist leaders before the non-Brahmana leaders approached him, could not realize the needs on the non-Brahmanas. . .

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 7th Mar. 1919.

Import duties.

71. The Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th March, writes:—The extent to which indigenous industries can be promoted by Government by increasing the import duties can be easily ascertained from the fact that the increase of the duty on sugar from 5 to 10 per cent led to a direct increase of the area under sugar-cane cultivation to the extent of 5 lakhs of acres and also of the quantity of sugar manufactured. It is to be hoped that the Government will likewise revive other indigenous industries by increasing the rate of import duties on other articles.

SWADESHABHIMANI, Mangalore, 7th Mar. 1919.

The dearth of coins.

72. In a lengthy leading article dwelling on the question of currency, the Swadeshbahimani, of the 7th March, observes:—Although from the standpoint of economics it is not objectionable to introduce paper money into currency, it is not expedient to issue notes of such low value as 1 rupee. Not only are the poorer classes unable to keep these notes in good condition, but these notes create in their mind a sense of insecurity regarding their money when they find it difficult to cash these small notes, and they, therefore, refuse to accept these notes when they are offered to them. The poor thus begin to suspect that there is great dearth of coins in the country. When such is the situatiou in regard to currency, we hear a rumour that the Government are thinking of creating, or have already created, still smaller notes of the value of 5 annas and 4 pies. This has led to the belief that even copper coins are becoming scarce. This is, indeed, most deplorable. The reason why we dwell on this topic to-day is that a journal of North Kanara brings us news of the great difficulty experienced by the poorer classes owing to the great dearth of small copper coins in Sidhapur taluk in that district. This dearth is, in truth, experienced also in this district (South Kanara) and may be said to exist in the whole of India. Again, paper currency is of no use in foreign trade. Has the Government strictly followed the rules in regard to the currency reserve in issuing notes? For our part, however, we suppose that the Government have not disregarded the statutory provision on the point. But the heaps of currency notes so prominent of late in place of the jingle of coins at the Banks, the Post office and other big offices of firms, railways, etc., are naturally apt to make the ignorant masses believe that there is great dearth of coin in the country. It behoves the Government, therefore, to inquire into the truth of the situation at present in regard to currency and ascertain why there is such great dearth of small coins and in case the poor are found to suffer in consequence, withdraw all money of artificial value from currency and facilitate the free circulation of metallic coins. We would ask the authorities to calmly consider how far it would be expedient to introduce notes of the value of 5 annas 4 pies when the 1-rupee notes themselves are not acceptable to the people. The termination of the war should naturally have led to great rejoicing everywhere. But unfortunately for our country, the epidemics and famine have left the people in a most prostrate condition. The introduction of paper money even for small coins might increase their suffering immeasurably. The adverse effects of such artificial currency have already been established in political economy. The experiment need not again be tried here at present.

73. The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 7th March, writes:—The British Parliament promised to grant us responsible Government. Some of the Anglo-Indians say that they would rebel in case it is granted. The British Government has been frightened by these threats. The members of the National Congress say that they would resort to passive resistance in case the promise is not fulfilled. The British Government as well as the Government of India are thus at a loss to know how they should act. The task of administration is, indeed, a most difficult one.

Responsible Government.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 7th Mar. 1919.

74. In an article deploring the steady increase of military expenditure, a correspondent of the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 10th March, writes:—When we look at the invidious distinction between Europeans and Indians in regard to the higher administrative posts and their rates of salary, we find ourselves unable to say that the Government of India is either democratic or responsible like the British Government. The records of the Government of India itself show that it is full of gross partiality. A Government which is impartial which identifies the interests of its subjects with its own, and which does not withhold anything in regard to political matters and takes the people entirely into their confidence is always looked upon and worshipped as Providence and Protector, and such a Government will remain for all time. The British traditions are the cause of the stability of that Government. Nevertheless, the loyalty of the people is greatly affected by the fact that some of the authorities do not follow these traditions in practice. We trust that the British Government will take steps to see that their traditions are strictly maintained.

Military expenditure.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 10th Mar. 1919.

Referring to the budget statement in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Kistnapatrika, of the 8th March, observes:—Before the war, 35 crores of rupees or the whole of the Land Revenue used to be spent on the army. . . This rose to 65 crores during the war. . . But contrary to the expectations of the public, the Government have thought fit to spend 62 crores now after the war has come to a close. When the army swallows one half of the country's total revenue and when, in addition to this, the Railway expenditure also has been increased such other useful matters as health, education, etc., will, of course, be neglected. When the army maintained by India is used not for her own defence but for the defence of the Empire as well, it is not understood why India alone should be required to contribute the whole cost of it. . . Sir James Meston does not tell us how he proposes to spend the 62 crores, whether he would increase the Indian regiments or the British regiments in the country, whether he contributes any amount to the British navy and what return India would get for it. Such details are held in secret. Why should the Indian Regiments be still retained in Mesopotamia even after the war? How is India going to profit by this expense? Who is to ask these questions? And who is prepared to answer them? This waste of military expenditure is sure to continue unchecked, so long as the people have no control over the exchequer.

Heavy Military expenditure.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 8th Mar. 1919.

75. Referring to an article in the Madras Mail regarding profiteering in rice and the prevailing high prices in Madras, the Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 11th March, writes:—The Government's prestige is gone. Their administrative capacity has decreased. How can those who are unable to regulate prices be entitled to hold sway over others? This state of things is most deplorable. Granting that the local produce is not sufficient, with the supply of rice from Burma, the price can be reduced to 8 seers per rupee. If the situation be reduced to such a pass that it is difficult to obtain even 2 seers per rupee, how can the administrators be considered competent to hold sovereignty? Even an intelligent constable with full powers can help the people to obtain all foodgrains without difficulty. It is deplorable to find that those who pose themselves as omniscient beings are incapable of protecting the people in their present distress. If the people die of starvation, are not the administrators to be regarded as worse than dead? If any people die of starvation through the wicked greed of others, why should not the latter be held responsible for those deaths and be sent to the gallows? If the Food Controller is unable to suggest apt arrangements to prevent people from dying of starvation, is he not to blame for it? If his suggestions are not carried out by Government, is not the Government to blame for it? Are not the Food Controller and the Government responsible for the untimely death of those who died of starvation? If they are subjected to a judicial inquiry and the panchayats hold them guilty, do they not become liable to capital punishment? Nobody seems to give a thought to these matters. They think that they shall have done their duty if they sign some stale papers and receive fat salaries. They do not even care to inquire what has been done in other countries in similar distress. A merchant of Northern India was prepared to spend 8 to 10 lakhs of rupees in order to prevent famine in his village. He bought foodstuffs to the value of 8 to 10 crores at the market rate and sold them at cheap rates to the poor. The famine had disappeared before he lost 10 lakhs, and none died of starvation. Are there not thousands of such millionaires in our country? Are the chiefs all paupers? Have they no money with them? Are the Government of India paupers? Is it impossible for them to prevent death from starvation? It behoves the Government of India, the Provincial Governments, the millionaires, merchants, brokers, Indian Chiefs and all to consider the situation and not behave like people who would lift a pie from the dung heap with the tip of their tongue.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 11th Mar. 1919.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 5th Mar. 1919.

High prices.

An article in the Kerala Sanchari, of the 5th March, trusts that the Government will realize that unless immediate action is taken to relieve the situation caused by the enormous rise in the price of the necessaries of life—rice, cloth and kerosene-oil—intense distress will spread throughout the land. "As it is, the secrets of Government are not known to the people and the distress of the people is not realized by the Government." It points out also that the distress in the interior parts of the district, consequent on scarcity of work, low wages and high prices, is several fold more than that in towns.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 4th Mar. 1919.

High price of rice.

In its leading article the Manorama, of the 4th March, refers again to the high price of rice in Malabar and to the consequent distress, and regrets that the efforts of the Government to relieve the tension caused thereby have been so far abortive, and that the statement of the Government of India on the subject has been disappointing in the extreme. It points out that while the adjoining Native States of Travancore and Cochin have somewhat successfully tackled this problem, the severity of the famine is felt keenly in British Malabar, and thinks that the Collector should hold a special inquiry into the matter of profiteering by merchants and should take vigorous action so as to teach the merchants a good lesson at this juncture.

LOKAPRAKASAM, Trichur, 24th Feb. 1919.

The Walluvanad riot.

76. A note in the Lokaprakasam, of the 24th February, admits that it was certainly the shooting down of the rioters that quelled the recent Mappila riot in Walluvanad so quickly, but remarks that since the rioters were only nine in number while the officers of Government, the reserved police force and other people that surrounded the rioters were quite numerous, it should have been easy and it was certainly a duty to catch the rioters alive.

KERALA SANCHARI, Calicut, 5th Mar. 1919.

Malabar land tenure.

77. The leading article in the Kerala Sanchari, of the 5th March, considers that the greatest obstacle to the improvement of agriculture on the West Coast (Malabar) is the unsatisfactoriness of land tenancy, and expresses surprize that, in spite of continued outcry for the improvement of the janmi-tenant relationship, the subject of land tenure has not yet been taken up by Government. If the Government are afraid of the anger of the janmis they have to remember also their responsibility for the welfare of the much larger community of tenants, the improvement of the land which depends entirely on the labour of these tenants and the income of the Government which depends on the produce of the land. Uncertainty of tenure is the crying evil of the day. It is this which makes the tenant callous, and the endeavours of the Agricultural Department fruitless.

78. The Qaumi Report, of the 5th March, has a leader which is briefly to this effect:—The Pal Mall Gazette had a letter from Mr. Ignatius which has been reproduced by the Madras Times in the issue of the 28th February, and thus both these journals have been combined in an unholy attack on the sacred personality of the Apostle, upon whom be the blessings of God and peace!

Qaumi Report, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

An unholy attack on the most noble Apostle.

A slight and insult to Islam and the Muhammadans.

Mr. Ignatius, writing against Lenin, compares him with the Apostle and says.

'Lenin with his crazy belief acts with all the savage fanaticism of a twentieth century Muhammad!'

He concludes his articles with these remarks:

'Bolshevism is a Muslim creed which claims happiness of sight and barefaced highhandedness.'

Thus Mr. Ignatius has, in his shamelessness, given expression to words which cannot pass uncondemned. But the conceit and pride with which he has rebelled against the Truth clearly shows that his heart is dead and that being contaminated with the impurity of falsehood he is polluting the spotless robes of reason and justice with the drops of his erroneous vapourings. Why did this villain think of comparing two such opposites as Nikolai Lenin, the new Messiah of Russia, and the Apostle of God? Had Mr Ignatius searched the ancient history of his nation he would have found the names of a few deceitful rogues and anti-Christs among his own people perfectly suitable for comparison with Lenin.

We know that his forefathers have drawn still more degrading picture of us and our Prophet. But that was in the dark ages of the Church and the period of the Popes. Those who declared our Lord Jesus, upon whom be peace! to be accursed, a deceiver and a wicked one, denounced Muhammad the Apostle of God, as a barbarian and a mad man; but in this enlightened age when the shamelessness of the Church is a thing of the past and truth and liberty have been freed from the yoke of autocracy we were under the impression that no one would insult the Light of Truth in this manner.

Not long ago Mr. Lloyd George compared the Kaiser with the Prophet, but subsequently he apologised for having done so.

The editor proceeds to say 'the law of Government is a chain of selfishness.' If anyone should call an Englishman a German, he is punished or if some one compares Lord Sydenham, or perchance even Mr. Welby with Hindenburgh he is sure to find the jail ready to receive him. But those, who compare the Holy Prophet of seven crores of Indian Mussalmans with Nicolai Lenin and Islam with Bolshevism, and print and publish such scurrilous writings, are secure from the operation of the law; because the law is of their own making.

79. The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 8th March, on the authority of a reliable news, viz., Khan Bahadur Mr. Muhammad Usman Vapoochi has been made a permanent Collector of Guntūr, writes:—From the bottom of our hearts we thank the Government for their appreciation and recognition of rightful claims and congratulate Mr. Marakayar at this new appointment.

Jaridah-i-Rozgar, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

Encouragement given to an energetic officer.

We fervently hope that the Government will not limit their encouragement to this promotion, but will raise him to some higher position and thereby place us under a deeper debt of gratitude to them.

III.—Legislation.

80. Referring to the resolution passed by the Madras Corporation at its special meeting on the 4th March, protesting against this Bill and requesting the Government to withdraw it and introduce another, the Swadesamitran, of the 5th idem, hopes that the Government will note that the majority of the members of the Corporation are not in favour of this Bill.

Swadesamitran, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

Adverting to the resolution passed at the last meeting of the Madras Corporation suggesting the desirability of dropping the present Bill and introducing another which will be conducive to the progress of self-government, the Hindu Nesan, of the 6th March, observes:—This Bill is now in the hands of the Government just on the verge of being passed into law, while the Corporation declines to accept it. We trust that, if all the non-official members of the Legislative Council unanimously oppose the Bill, it will be dropped without being passed into law.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

The Madras City Municipal Bill.

Commending the speech of Diwan Bahadur P. Tyagaraya Chettiyar in the meeting of the Madras Corporation protesting against this Bill, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th March, observes:—This Bill, published after consideration for the last four years, is quite contrary to the expectations of the public. Since then, a number of modifications have been made in it. Though the Madras Corporation was reformed twice before this, the condition of the Commissioners continues without any change; nor is any change effected in it by the present Bill. Ever since the formation of the Corporation, the charges have been exceeding the receipts and this is due to their having increased the work in connexion with water-supply. The present Bill too does not devise means for removing this financial stress. It becomes greatly difficult for the Corporation to secure funds to meet the charges merely on account of the Local Government controlling the budget of the Corporation. What amount of liberty does the Corporation have, if it has to get the sanction of the Government even for enhancing the wages of sweepers by half a rupee.

In 1918–19 the Corporation has incurred a debt of Rs. 3,54,690. How is it to clear this debt with the sanitary grant of a lakh of rupees given by the Government? If the Corporation continues in this state, the debt will go on increasing. Some think that, if the debts should increase, the Government would come to rescue. Though this has hitherto been the case, the municipalities which get financial help from the Government are bodies that have lost freedom. The Decentralization Committee condemn pecuniary help being granted by the Government. According to their recommendations the Government can allot specified amounts for particular kinds of work of the municipalities. Much benefit will be derived by a specified grant being given every year for education and sanitation. This Bill is contrary even to the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals. In every section and sub-section of this Bill, means have been devised for curtailing the liberty of the Corporation. The Government authorities simply proclaim that the Municipal Commissioners should develop their responsibility without subjecting themselves to their control, but do not in the least consent to give them liberty. Hence, by this new Bill being passed into an Act, the Corporation is not going to progress in any direction.

DRAVIDABHIMANI, Salem, 21st Feb. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

81. In dealing with this subject, the Dravidabhimani, of the 21st February, observes:—Loyal people need not at any time have any fear. It is certain that no law will afflict them. However, considering that administration is being conducted only by human beings, people are afraid that even innocent people may be subjected to the restrictions of this new law. The new Bills will come into force very soon, and even if we demand our rights we have to do so in a calm tone and with submissiveness. As God, justice and the righteous rule of the sovereign will help us, we need not fear the new laws so much. As there are many tale-bearers among the Indians themselves, we have to fear them much. We hope that better days will soon dawn upon us, when we will have perfect liberty.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 1st Mar. 1919.

Adverting to the report of the Select Committee on these Bills, the Swadesamitran, of the 1st March, observes:—It is certain that the Government will not cease to pass these Bills into law, taking advantage of the split among the Indian members and of the fact that some of them are in their favour. We believe that the views now expressed by Mr. Gandhi will not fail to convince even the moderates about the untoward consequences likely to result from the Rowlatt Bills. Mr. Gandhi, besides condemning the Bills, has stated that it is clear from the fact of the Government having introduced these Bills, that the fault lies only at their door. As he considers that there is no way for salvation unless by resorting to passive resistance, even the moderates cannot help admitting that the situation has become stressful. All persons, whether moderates or nationalists, should join together and decide on the further action to be taken.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 4th Mar. 1919.

Adverting to the dissenting minutes of the Nationalist members on the report of the Select Committee appointed to consider these Bills, the Swadesamitran, of the 4th March, writes:—We are of opinion that Sir William Vincent has certainly no power to reject these minutes. Rule 39 of the rules for the conduct of business in the Madras Legislative Council provides that, when a Bill is referred to a Select Committee, all members or a majority of the members thereof should sign the report of the Committee and that any member can record his opinion separately. As the rules for the conduct of business in the Imperial Legislative Council will also be similar to those of the Madras Legislative Council, there is no justification for the statement that those who do not sign the report should not write separate dissenting minutes. When we consider what has hitherto been done in similar cases, Sir William Vincent's action seems to be wrong. The dissenting minutes written by Mr. Gokhale and Mr. Rash Bihari Gosh, when they were on the Select Committee to which the Seditious Meetings Bill was referred, were accepted and placed before the Legislative Council along with the majority report, though they declined to subscribe to this report. Similarly the dissenting minute recorded by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, when he was on the Select Committee for discussing the Indian Press Bill, was accepted and presented to the Council along with the majority report though he did not sign it. That the dissenting minutes now written by the same Mr. Malaviya and Messrs. Khaparde and Patel should have been rejected and kept back from the Council, because of their not having signed the majority report, is, besides being contrary to rules and practices, a system obtaining under an autocratic rule. The moderates have stated that they condemn the aim and the basic principles of the Bills. What then is the meaning of their having signed the majority report? Of course, they have written a separate minute of dissent. But they have not proposed in it any amendment to change the aim or the basic principles of the Bills. If the amendments suggested by them are approved, should it not be construed that they are prepared to accept the Bills? What benefit can result to the country by their signing the majority report and saying that they reserve the right of opposing the aim and the basic principles of the Bills? We think that the statement of Sir William in reply to Mr. Patel that, if a Bill is referred to a Select Committee it must propose modifications only after accepting the aim of the Bill, is wrong. This is evident from rule 40 of the rules for the conduct of business in the Madras Legislative Council. The rule of the Parliament too is to the same effect. While the Committee has the right to drop the Bills, every member of that Committee has that right. When, in the exercise of this right, Mr. Patel proposed in the Committee that the Bills should be dropped, why did not the moderates support him? Why did not the moderates, who very warily state that they have the right to oppose the aim and the basic principles of the Bills and that they have not relinquished that right, make use of it when the opportunity presented itself? It is why we ask whether the birthright can be sold for a mess of pottage?

The Rowlatt Bills.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 7th March, writes:—Mr. Surendranath Bannerjee writes that all the Indian members are going to oppose these Bills being passed into law. This news will gladden the Indians. If, as Mr. Surendranath says, he and his moderate brethren should oppose the Bills it is certain that they will not become law. If, even in spite of this opposition, the Government pass the Bills, we can agitate in such a way that the world may know that they have come forward to murder India. We request the Government to take this warning.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

Adverting to the fact that the majority of the Select Committee have yielded to the wishes of the moderates to have the first of these Bills republished, the Swadesamitran, of the 10th March, observes:—It is not known when this Bill will again be brought before the Legislative Council. Perhaps it may take a few months. We think that the authorities have consented to have it republished only with the object of allowing a respite for the fury of the country against these Bills to cool down.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

Observing that the majority report which was presented in the Legislative Council was signed by the Hon'ble Messrs. Bannerjee, Sastri and Shaffi subject to reservation of their right to oppose the principles of the first Bill and stating that they wish certain slight modifications in it, the Swadesamitran, of the 10th March, observes:—They made the same observation on the report relating to the second of the Bills. What does this mean? By declaring that they reserve the right of opposing the Bill and at the same time suggesting certain modifications therein, will they accept the Bill if these amendments are carried out? Or is it their intention to threaten the Government thereby and make them yield to effect certain alterations? It is such arguments of the moderates that gives a handle to the Anglo-Indian papers like the Madras Times to write disparagingly that their arguments can very easily be met. The Madras Times has said that the objection of the moderates will become void, if the power of enforcing these Acts is entrusted to an Indian, inasmuch as the objection is mainly due to their fear about the misapplication of these Acts. This paper is probably under the impression that the moderates can be won over, if another high office is to be conferred on the Indians. Perhaps it is not aware of the political agitation going on for the last few years. It is not the desire of the people that Indian officers should be appointed in the place of European officers. It is a fact borne out by experience that the moment the Indians get an official status they too become clad in bureaucratic robes. That the officers, whether Indian or European, should be responsible to the people is all that the people wish for. The Rowlatt Bills have sprung up only to hamper the attempts of the Indians to fulfil this object. If these Bills become law, then political life may altogether become impossible. It is only in view of this that Mr. Gandhi has said that, in case these Bills become law, the policy of passive resistance should be resorted to until they are revoked. That policy is flawless, and it will not harm any one excepting those that adopt it. No one desires to adopt this policy and subject himself to bodily troubles. All other means have been tried but in vain. Mr. Sastriyar himself admits that if these Bills become law, the power of the bureaucracy will grow strong. At such a juncture where is the alternative but to resort to this policy?

In the vow published by Mr. Gandhi, he says that, if the Rowlatt Bills are passed, not only these laws but also some others will be disobeyed. If the vow is only for disobeying the Rowlatt law, then opportunities may not be afforded to many to adopt the policy of passive resistance. It should have been Mr. Gandhi's opinion that it is only by the addition of some other laws such opportunity will present itself to many. But he has said that a special committee will be appointed to determine what exactly these laws should be. From the letters that are being received by us, it is seen that the country is prepared to accept the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi till the other laws are decided by the committee. In these circumstances, only one way is open to the Government and that is to drop the Bills. Will they do so? It is the step to be taken by farseeing people.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills.

Referring to the Report of the Select Committee on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th March, observes:—The Select Committee has now published its report on this Bill, and seems to have proceeded with some sense of responsibility.. It is but proper that the section relating to the possession of seditious documents has been altogether expunged. . . Even associating with those convicted for sedition is an offence according to section 510-A. This has been criticised as being productive of many evils. Though it has been altered a little, its original character remains the same. . . It is understood that only this Bill will be published again with the alterations suggested by the Select Committee for public criticism. This is something. When the people do not accept the very principles of these repressive measures, they cannot be expected to be satisfied with small changes. . . The Madras Times suggests that the working of these Bills may be entirely entrusted to the Indian Member, since that is the only course open to the Government to allay discontent. . . There is no good of such dodges. We want the Government to understand that the only way of allaying public discontent is to withdraw altogether these repressive Bills which infringe the birthrights of the people.

The Rowlatt Bills.

A correspondent in the Manorama, of the 4th March, observes:—The moans of the mouse will not soften the cat's heart. For every cry for liberty for India, we receive a blow on the head. The Press Act itself has nullified the liberty of India. If now the present two laws are also enacted in India, no one can dare open his mouth. The people will become the slaves of Government officials. Speaking generally, the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms are only like baits placed in a trap for catching rats. What did the Viceroy say to the Indian Civil Service Association? This will certainly be an eye opener to those who were satisfied with the Reform Scheme. . . Sinha has become a Lord and some others, Members of Councils. Perhaps Doctor Nayar and others may hereafter become Lords. But all this will be of no use to India. India wants only that which will promote the welfare of all India, and this is the one thing that we have not received.

Manorama, Calicut, 4th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and Passive Resistance.

Observing that the prominent leaders of Bengal have wired to Messrs. Gandhi, Malaviya and Kelkar and Mrs. Annie Besant that they too support the policy of passive resistance and remarking that this policy is expected to spread quickly to the other provinces in India as well, the Desabhaktan, of the 6th March, writes:—Some efforts are being made in Madras in this direction. But all are eagerly awaiting the result of the conversation between Mr. Gandhi and the Viceroy. Let the Government understand that, if the Viceroy passes these cruel Bills into law, there will crop up unexpected agitation and passive resistance throughout the country and India will turn out a second Ireland.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

Giving a funny interpretation of the expression 'passive resistance' and pointing out that it is not in the least suited to the educated persons to adopt the practice commonly in vogue with certain classes of stubborn mendicants who refuse to budge unless their wishes are gratified, the Dravidan, of the 6th March, observes:—Is this the policy to be resorted to by the educated? Can any compact stand against the Government? We disapprove of all this. It is said that Mr. Gandhi is advocating a mild resort to passive resistance to demonstrate forcibly the protest of the people against the passing of the Rowlatt Bills. We cannot help construing this to be a mad policy. From a recent discussion in Parliament, it is clear that the Government will not yield even an inch in this matter. It is our opinion that the Rowlatt Bills will be of very great use.

Dravidan, Madras, 6th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and Passive Resistance.

The Dravidan, of the 7th March, reverts to this subject and reproducing some of the sentiments of the Justice, of the 5th idem, under the heading "Active anarchism and passive resistance", remarks:—The Rowlatt Bills have been introduced only for preventing crimes and not for stifling political discussions and agitations on constitutional lines. There is no room, therefore, for opposing these Bills. It is not desirable to cause impediments in the way of the Government under the name of passive resistance, which is not at all suited to the present civilized conditions, and which is not a step in the right direction.

Dravidan, Madras, 7th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and passive resistance.

Remarking that the bureaucrats are very crafty by nature, but for which they could not have governed India for more than 150 years, the Desabhaktan, of the 8th March, says:—These bureaucrats, whose main principle is to govern India on the policy of 'divide and rule', are doing many wicked acts so as to enable them to keep the Indians under subjection for several years to come, and the introduction of the Rowlatt Bills is one of such Acts. Though these Bills are opposed by Indian leaders and newspapers, the bureaucrats are ready to get them passed by gaining over some Indians to their side. Seeing that the opposition of the Indians is growing stronger day by day, these bureaucrats are prepared to come to terms with the Indian leaders at any cost. Any Indian, who gives room for these Bills being passed by yielding to the bureaucrats, will be committing the sin of having murdered his mother and be condemned both in this and the next world. O Indian sisters and brethren! Be up therefore and oppose the Rowlatt Bills by resorting to passive resistance.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

Referring to the unsuccessful issue of the conference between the Viceroy and Mr. Gandhi, the same paper remarks that the only thing to be done by the patriots hereafter is to hold meetings in different places promptly to promote the adoption of passive resistance and signing the Satyagraha vow inaugurated by the several local committees, transgress the Rowlatt Bills, if they are passed into law.

Quoting an observation of Mr. Gandhi that the Indians are the most patient among all the races in the world and that, as they possess a soul-force, they will not be afraid of the rude force of humanity, this paper writes elsewhere:—Without understanding the real nature of the Indians, the bureaucrats are conducting the administration by means of rude force. How long are the Indians to put up with their irresponsible and unjust administration, which is contrary to British justice and the like of which has not been seen or heard of till now? Is there not a limit for everything? Have the British come to rule, only to destroy the primary rights of the Indians by means of uncivilised laws? Is there no value for the promises given and the Royal Proclamations issued till now? We ask whether the object of the British Government is to govern the Indians by keeping them under subjection as they like. If so, we would say that the aim and trend of the British Government are wrong. We would apprise the Government that the Indians will not put up with the rude administration of the bureaucrats even for a moment longer. The Indians have woke up, and the Government should remember that they would adopt the method of passive resistance and keep on a struggle with the authorities until the repressive laws are cancelled.

Remarking that the object of the bureaucrats in introducing the Rowlatt Bills, while professing to have come here for governing India most sympathetically, is to keep the Indians ever in thraldom and destroy their primary rights completely, the same paper points to a letter said to have been written by Swami Saradananda to Mr. Gandhi, in which the former wishes that the saints and ascetics should now rise from their contemplative worship and says:—When even a great man like the Swami says that the Rowlatt Bills are terrible in their nature, and calls upon the saints and the great to come out of their meditation to oppose them, will his appeal be in vain? Will the saints of Southern India refrain from coming forward to protect Mother Bharata at this juncture?

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

Remarking that Mr. Gandhi has come forward to work in the cause of truth, the Desabhaktan, of the 11th March, observes:—Perhaps the Government of India have not yet realised properly that two incarnations (Tilak and Gandhi) have appeared for the establishment of liberty in India. The soul-force of Mr. Gandhi has now spread throughout the country. All are aware of the interview he had with the Viceroy. The Rowlatt Bills are standing like pillars of darkness at the present meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council. Let the Government do anything with these Bills, either pass them or drop them. We need not waste our time any more on it. Let us be mindful of our own duty hereafter. If the Rowlatt Bills become law, what is the course we have to follow? There are three different opinions in regard to this. The first is, without resorting to passive resistance, to wage a constitutional war through newspapers and public meetings. The second is to adopt passive resistance only in respect of the Rowlatt Bills. The third is to resort to passive resistance and do away with the Rowlatt law and other similar measures. The question is which of these is to be accepted and which to be rejected. As regards the first which is the view of the moderates, all are aware that it is an old tale, the reading of which will serve no useful purpose. Is it not because that the late Mr. Gokhale and others followed this method that the cruel adder of the Press Act has bitten the damsel of liberty and poisoned her? It is regrettable that the moderates have not as yet realised how arrogant the bureaucrats are and set at naught the lawful words of the public. As regards the second view, we should thank Mrs. Besant for espousing this view; but we should admit that it is not practicable to adopt passive resistance only in respect of the Rowlatt Bills. If these Bills are to be got rid of, passive resistance should be resorted to in respect of other laws as well. The third view, which is Mr. Gandhi's, is at once in consonance with both justice and experience. We endorse Mr. Gandhi's pledge in this matter. Let all those who have the welfare of the country at heart sign this pledge.

The Rowlatt Bills and passive resistance.

The Andhrapatrika, of the 10th March, gives in Telugu the proceedings of the meeting held by the Anti-Rowlatt Bills Committee on the 8th March on the beach to protest against the Rowlatt Bills, summaries of the speeches delivered, and the resolutions passed thereat.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and passive resistance.

The Manorama, of the 7th March, gives an abstract of Mr. Gandhi's letter published in the Bombay Chronicle advocating passive resistance in connexion with the Rowlatt Bills and a translation of the vow.

MANORAMA, Calicut, 7th Mar. 1919.

The leading article in the same paper records how the Bills were passed in the teeth of united opposition from all the non-official members, and the futility thus exposed of popular representation in the present Legislative Councils, and observes that, though the modifications made by the Select Committee materially reduce the severity of the original Bills, these Bills are, in the opinion of the leaders of the people, objectionable in their root principle. An abstract is supplied of objections raised by the dissenting members and by those who refused to sign the report of the Select Committee.

The Madras Corporation and the Madras City Municipal Bill.

82. Referring to the special meeting of the Madras Corporation held on the 4th instant, the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th March, writes in its leader under this heading :— . . . That Doctor Nair's party has been very enthusiastic in criticising the Madras Municipal Bill is a fact worth noting. . . There are only two ways for the progress of local self-government. The first of them is to entrust full responsibility to the people, and the second is to make provision for sufficient funds with the help of which it will be possible for the people to properly carry out their responsibilities. Both these ways have been ignored in the Bill. . . There is no doubt that the new Bill is opposed to the proposals of Mr. Montagu. . . All the Municipal Commissioners unanimously criticized the Bill in the special meeting held yesterday . . . And there is not the least doubt that the resolution of the Corporation fully represents the popular opinion. It cannot be asserted with any shadow of reason that the resolution is the creation of the political agitator. In these circumstances, will the Government accept the resolution and withdraw the Bill? There is no room for the entertainment of such a hope. If the Government do not accept the resolution, what are the Municipal Commissioners going to do? Like their fellow commissioners, will they resign their seats in the Corporation? . . . Diwan Bahadur P. Thiagaraya Chetti's speech, based as it is on solid experience, goes to establish all the more clearly the truth which the political reformers have all along been crying out, namely, that local self-government can have no chance of progress, unless there is a change in the present system of administration. Doctor Nair, Mr. Chetti and their followers will, therefore, do well to join hands with the leaders of the people and work for the attainment of self-government.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

The 12th March.

83. Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th March, observes with reference to the Rowlatt Bills the enactment of which will be moved by Sir W. Vincent on the 12th instant :— . . . The laws passed by the Legislative Councils cannot have much value, so long as the present constitution continues. Sir N. Chandravakan advises the popular representatives not to assume any responsibility for the passing of the Bills, so that there may be no room for misunderstanding by others. When this advice is supported by the public opinion, the duty of the elected members is clear. . . They will do well to press their objections to the Bill once more on the 12th in the Council and leave all the responsibility of passing it into law to the Executive Government, without themselves participating in it in the least. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 8th Mar. 1919.

The vow of passive resistance.

84. Referring in its leader under this heading to the interview between His Excellency the Viceroy and Mr M. K. Gandhi at Delhi anent the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 8th March, observes:— . . . Maharshi Gandhi is a descendant of such heroic characters as Bhishma and Buddha Deva, and a follower of Jainism. He is born of a spiritual caste, and of a race devoted to truth. It is not at all strange that Maharshi Gandhi should have complete faith in the triumph of truth and justice. There is also nothing strange in Lord Chelmsford, a politician of the modern times, the crown of the bureaucracy, a representative of the enterprising white race, and the living embodiment of the British sway in India which has been established by might . . . defending the power of the sceptre on which is mainly based the absolute rule of the bureaucracy. Spiritual power is not within the ken of the Viceroy. The Westerners cannot realize soul-power. . . Those who are willing to follow passive resistance will be very eagerly waiting to know the programme settled by Mr. Gandhi. . . The bureaucracy will be prompted by their pride of power to guard their own prestige and defend their own followers. Messrs. Khaparde, Patel and Malaviya have ceased attending the Select Committee's meetings. This is also passive resistance. . . Though our leaders like Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Malaviya may resort to passive resistance, it is probable that the Government will pass the Bills into law, if only to carry out their will or to maintain their prestige. When the primary rights of the people are being tightly fettered, what is the good of any scheme of reforms? . . . May the people of India be prepared in this crisis to follow the lead of Maharshi Gandhi and to reach their goal by taking the vow of passive resistance! May the great lesson taught by Bhagavan Sri Krishna to Arjuna on the field of Kurukshetra, in a moment of dejection inspire them with the requisite courage to discharge their duty properly in their present, crisis!

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 1st Mar. 1919.

The duty of our leaders.

85. In its leader under this heading anent the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhravani, of the 1st March, observes:—. . . The leaders should not take upon them the least responsibility for the passing of these Bills into law. There is no difference of opinion among the people on this point. . . The world must know that neither the people nor their leaders have anything to do with the Rowlatt Bills which are exclusively the work of the bureaucracy. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 5th Mar. 1919.

Madras leaders and passive resistance.

86. Under this heading, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 5th March, exhorts the leaders in Madras such as Mr. Kasturiranga Ayyangar, Mr. A. Rangaswami Ayyangar and others to inaugurate in Madras the passive resistance movement which has been started in Bombay to oppose the Rowlatt Bills.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

The budget discussion.

87. Referring to the budget discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 10th March, remarks:—. . . The whole country has complained that the budget statement of Sir James Meston is very unsatisfactory. Even a child can understand that the expenditure of all the public money on the army and the Railways to the neglect of items of such national importance as education, health and agriculture is not at all beneficial to the country. But Mr. Bannerjee has characterised such a budget as the people's budget. . . It is ridiculous to neglect such useful and urgent needs as health and education, as if the Railways can confer the much desired salvation. . . The loan of 10 millions sterling which the Government want to contract as a war loan will be chiefly required to meet only the expenditure on the Railways, and that expenditure is not certainly necessary for the preservation of life. . . When Sir James Meston pleaded lack of funds as his excuse for not being able to provide 100 lakhs for the improvement of public health, the elected members might have asked within themselves, from what source "could he draw the amount allotted for the Railway expenditure?" . . . By an irony of fate, Sir Thomas Holland had to reply to the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma who asked for an allotment of 50 lakhs for the improvement of Industries. He rejected Mr. Sarma's resolution, saying that the Industrial problem should be dealt with only by the Provincial Governments and that there was no use of taking long jumps in the industrial matters. . . The recommendations of the Industrial Commission are thus bound to remain as pious wishes for a long time. . . A perusal of the whole discussion on the budget will clearly show that all those departments which should be immediately attended to in the best interests of the country have received but scant encouragement.

The sooner the people get the control over their exchequer, the more readily will the benefit to the country at large be undoubtedly felt.

88. With reference to the Rowlatt Bills, the Desabhimani, of the 26th February, observes in its leader under this heading :— . . . There are many instances to show that in India, political offenders are in fact treated more harshly than ordinary criminals. The new change will make their lot worse still. The wrath of the Government against political offenders does not stop there. By the other alterations to be made in section 565, such offenders can be transported without any time limit. Even when released, they cannot speak on any political or other subject which is likely to disturb the public peace. All those who have committed sedition in the opinion of the Government will lose all their rights. Every one who, while criticising the actions of Government officials out of sheer patriotism, happens to use unfortunately a strong word, will share this fate. It is proposed to embody all these new changes permanently in the Penal Code. There does not appear a more cruel way than this to put an end to genuine patriotism in the country. These are the provisions of the First Bill. It is left to readers to judge for themselves how drastic they are. If such a Bill should be passed into law, it is difficult to say that any Indian can be safe under it.

The Sedition Bills.

. . . The provisions of the first Bill having been felt to be insufficient, it is proposed to supplement them by the second Bill. This Bill can be put into force at any time the Government please. We think that the power of the Government savours of autocracy even without these Bills. That power will now become intolerable. This Bill will not only make the conditions intolerable, but will also shroud them in incomprehensible secrecy. Such restrictions are not to be met with in any civilised country in this twentieth century. For a parallel we must go back to the 'Starchamber' of the British constitution in the middle ages. These Bills will not only be an insult to India but will also be a matter of shame for the British Government before other freedom-loving Governments We wonder how Mr. Montagu has found his way to give his assent to such legislation. . .

DESABHIMANI, Guntur, 26th Feb. 1919.

89. Referring in its leader under this heading to the Rowlatt Bills, the Desamata, of the 5th February, received on the 8th March, observes :—. . . That the Government of India should try to pass coercive laws at a time when the whole world is ringing with peace, liberty, and self-determination only shows their narrow outlook in politics, their disregard for those fundamental principles of administration which are necessary for the protection of the individual, and their ignorance of the present psychological condition of the world. . . Such an attempt will have no other result than creating unrest in India which is, at present, enjoying peace. . . While the Peace Conference is endeavouring to help the progress of the world by establishing peace and justice, it is absurd that Great Britain should try to pass such drastic laws in India, discrediting the very essential principles of the conference of which she is a member. . . We are afraid that the passing of the Bills into law in the teeth of public opinion will only make the political situation still more complicated instead of helping the establishment of a calm atmosphere in the country.

The new Bills.

DESAMATA, Rajahmundry, 5th Feb. 1919.

90. Referring to the Hereditary Village Officers Act Amendment Bill, a correspondent to the Kistnapatrika, of the 8th March, writes :—. . . It has been laid down that these rights should be enjoyed by us and our succeeding generations. Even though a ruler is deposed, his successor is bound to carry out the agreements entered into by his predecessor. . . It cannot be statesmanship to cause loss to a section of the community by destroying its hereditary rights. . .

The rights of village officers.

KISTNAPATRIKA, Masulipatam, 8th Mar. 1919.

91. With reference to the Madras City Municipal Bill, the Adhraprakasika, of the 10th March, writes under this heading :— . . . Will the Government, who could not grant the just wishes of the people in the municipal affairs of the Madras City, satisfy larger aspirations? It is very regrettable that the opinions and wishes of the representatives of the people who are paying taxes in spite of all the hardships they are suffering in these famine days, should carry no weight with the Local Government. In the event of the people refusing to pay taxes, can the Corporation stand on its own legs? . . . If the authorities who doubt the fitness of Indians to receive larger concessions place the management of the municipal affairs of the city in their hands, it will then become clear from the manner in which they manage these affairs whether they are fit or unfit to receive larger concessions. This will be a good test of the fitness of the popular leaders to undertake greater responsibilities. We fully believe that such a trial will establish the fact that a high paid European official is unnecessary.

The Local Legislative Council.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 10th Mar. 1919.

Swadeshabhimani, Mangalore, 7th Mar. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

92. In an article deploring the attitude of the Hon'ble Surendra Nath Bannerjee and others who did not join Pandit Malaviyya and others who refused to sign the Select Committee Report, the Swadeshabhimani, of the 7th March, observes:—The leaders of the moderate party have sown the seeds of disunion even outside the council. They have displayed a wonderful type of statesmanship by signifying their disapproval of the harmless passive resistance movement started by Mahatma Gandhi. They say that to resort to passive resistance now is to create difficulties in connexion with the coming reforms. This policy of not attacking a serpent to-day in view of excellent reforms in future can commend itself only to the "children of the Government" and not to others. We believe there can be no one in this twentieth century who would agree to shelter a snake under his pillow in the foolish hope of finding a treasure trove the next day.

ENGLISH PAPERS.

II.—Home Administration.

(k) General.

1. United India and Indian States, for the week ending 12th March, writes:— United India and Indian States, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

Indians in South Africa.

"Now that the war is over, the world has gone back to its old ways and is much the same what it was always. South Africa, white South Africa, has learned precious little from the greatest war known to history: it has not learnt a single new lesson in humanity or in imperial responsibility. . . So far as South Africa was concerned, its inhuman treatment of the Indian population was too recent, was too shocking, to expect that the war will make any difference in the angle of vision from which the white citizens of South Africa have always viewed the resident Indians there. That angle is the angle of selfish interest, of deep-rooted racial prejudice, of determined jealousy and unconcealed ill-feeling. But we did expect that as the result of the common experiences of the war, that as a result of the new resurgence of imperialistic feeling, that too as a result of the new ideals of Empire and World Peace—the settlement of 1914 will continue to be observed even after the war in its letter and spirit. It now transpires that the white citizens of South Africa are still so mentally undeveloped that to expect so much from them is to pay them a compliment which is far from deserved. Frankly, white South Africa is determined to unearth the buried hatchet of ancient quarrels with India. . . We appeal to the Government of India to make the cause of Indian honour their own. It is time that the place of Indians in the Empire is definitely settled. It will not do to say in a nervous way that the South Africans if pressed overmuch may decide to sever their connexion with the Empire. Already there is a movement with that object in South Africa. To us, loyal citizens of the Empire, it is more essential that the Empire does not consist of unruly and unrighteous elements. It must be a right sort of Empire in which each member will sacredly respect one another's rights."

2. Writing under the heading "Pentland's parting shot," New India, of the 13th March, remarks:—"The Madras public is aware of the heroics of Lord Pentland's Government, and now, on the eve of his departure our redoubtable Governor has displayed the prowess of discharging a signal shot. Says Lord Pentland to his Council: 'The Government of India want you for a year more for the purposes of reforms: I want no reforms and I want to foil the wishes of the Government of India; therefore, I don't want you. Out you go!'

New India, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

Lord Pentland and the Madras Legislative Council.

"What will happen if Lord Pentland's unreasonableness succeeds? We will have a new Council elected for three years making early introduction of any reforms in this Presidency impossible. Our retiring Governor is ready to make use of these disgraceful tactics of local bureaucrats. The public of Madras should let His Excellency and all those whom it may concern know what they think of this nefarious move. . . What are the local non-official Indian members going to do? They have a very solemn duty to perform, and we trust they will not hesitate in concerting urgent measures and giving a lead to the Presidency in agitating against this bureaucratic attempt at foiling the reforms. They need not think that they will be acting selfishly by demanding an extension of the term of their office. . . We appeal to the Honourable Members now in the Metropolis to organise themselves and lead an agitation which will save this Presidency the ignominy with which it is threatened."

3. Justice, of the 15th March, writes:—"We have industrial unrest everywhere . . . In our opinion the time has come when the Government should intervene and establish Arbitration Boards and liberate industrial and economic disputes from the taint of political bitterness. In saying this we perfectly realize how slow Governments in India are to move and how impervious they are to ideas which may appear heterodox to them. In which case the only alternative that we can see is what some one suggested as a remedy for Russian Bolshevism, to let the fire burn itself out. It is a sad solution of the difficulty. But what is any one to do with Governments which will never come out of their grooves to do anything but continue to flood the country with grandiloquent reports, routine resolutions, and dull Government orders? We can only hope that the tendency to change, which is in evidence everywhere, will have the effect of jerking the Indian Governments outside their groove and making them realize that there are more things in heaven and earth than are recorded in their ponderous blue books."

Justice, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

Industrial unrest in India.

Nationalist, Madras, 16th Mar. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council and vernaculars.

4. The Nationalist, for the week ending 16th March, has the following:—"Under the regulations and rules framed for the carrying out of the Minto-Morley scheme we are convinced the President of the Madras Legislative Council has no right to rule that English is the language of the council or to rule out a member who desires to speak in Tamil. Such ruling entirely contravenes the very clear purpose of the regulations and rules and sets at defiance real constitutionalism in the face of a precedent in Punjab. We congratulate the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar on the usual bold stand he has made on behalf of the vernaculars of the country and the language of the people. To men brought up in false notions of dignity and in the Moha of the English language it is no wonder that Mr. Narasimha Ayyar has appeared eccentric to say the least."

Justice, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The Medical Reorganization Committee.

5. Justice, of the 17th March, says:—"We are told that the Medical Reorganization Committee appointed by the Government of India came to Madras and went away on the evening of the 14th. It is a new development in public investigation in India that committees carry on their investigations with closed doors. It used to be otherwise in the good old days when Home Rule and self-determination were unheard of. We are not in a position to say why this committee to reorganize the medical services in India has been appointed at the present time . . . We have no faith in committees which take evidence in private. We condemned the Southborough Committee on that account. We condemn the Medical Reorganization Committee equally emphatically on that account. The fact that such a committee is going about ought to make public men careful to be on their guard ready to meet any extraordinary recommendations that this secret committee might spring upon an unprepared public. We presume that no final steps will be taken in the re-organization of the medical services without the report of this committee being published and carefully considered in England. We expect to meet the Committee's report somewhere in the vicinity of Whitehall some day, and then we may have a few words to exchange with it. For the present, we simply want our readers to know that there is such a thing moving about the country."

Justice, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

6. Justice, of the 17th March, observes:—"The terms of all the Legislative Councils in India are to expire next July. But under the extraordinary powers vested in the Viceroy and the provincial heads of administrations, the general election is to be postponed for a year except in the case of Madras. The Viceroy led the way by putting off the elections to his Council for a year. . . The provinces followed the lead of the Imperial Government from force of habit. That Madras did not follow was certainly extraordinary because, under ordinary conditions, Madras is one of the most servile of Indian provinces. But perhaps there is another and a very satisfactory reason for the apparent independence of Madras. . . As there are no Montagu moderates in the Madras Council, there is no necessity to extend its term in order to save them from destruction. A great deal of ingenuity is being expended in discovering reasons for Lord Pentland's action in not extending the term of the Madras Council. To us the reason appears to be quite obvious, and if there are stray Montagu moderates about Madras, it is about time that they made up their minds as to what to do. . . We ourselves believe that the Madras Council will once again be swamped by the Brahman extremists. There is only one political remedy that will prevent that and that is the establishment of communal electorates. Until such electorates are established the political complexion of the Madras Council will remain practically unchanged whether the election is held this year or next year. We shall await the result of the elections with interest and the Brahman triumph once again will only make us all the more determined to have our claims considered and our rights secured."

7. United India and Indian States, for the week ending 19th March, says:— "The Railway and the Army together consume 80 per cent of the total revenue. The remaining 20 per cent must satisfy the needs of the 'unessential' departments, such as Agriculture, Education, Sanitation, Industries, etc. We hope that the Government of India will now cease to wonder why we want changes in the Government of India also and do not like the Montagu-Chelmsford scheme on the point. No Government with a sense of responsibility to the people will venture to frame such a budget."

United India & Indian States, Madras, 19th Mar. 1919.

The Indian budget.

8. In concluding a leader under the heading "The Task of the League of Nations" the Hindu, of the 19th March, observes:— "India has always believed in moral force, as superior to physical force, and that moral force her sons are preparing to exercise by taking the Satyagraha pledge. Sooner or later, unless our rulers quickly recognise the necessity of dealing with Indians in this country and in her Colonies and Dominions in a just and equitable manner by conceding their rightful claims to self-realization thereby establishing their loyalty and affection to, and for, the Empire, the condition of things in India will become such that they will attract world-wide attention. And then perhaps, the League of Nations will insist on our rulers reverencing the 'covenant' and maintaining 'those standards' of right and justice which millions of free men, including many thousands of Indians, have faught and bled to establish for all free peoples."

Hindu, Madras, 19th Mar. 1919.

India and self-determination.

9. Writing under the heading "The Bolshevik wave", Justice, of the 20th March, says:—"We have been repeatedly calling the attention of both the Government and public to this great danger staring us in the face. But nobody could make much out of a super-sensitive Government who get nervous at the braggings of the professional agitators in India. If the extremist agitator in Bombay sneezes, the viceregal barometer in Delhi falls to the freezing point and the whole Government of India gets into a shiver. However that may be, what little is attempted to protect India from the inroads of the Bolshevist menace finds but little co-operation from the so-called Indian politicians and leaders, probably because they do not believe that Bolshevism can make any headway in India. Otherwise the opposition to the Rowlatt Bills, which are aimed ostensibly at revolutionary and anarchical crimes, but which are equally effective in checking the spread of Bolshevism, is unaccountable. But reports of the doings of the Russian Bolshevists published in English papers belie this belief. . . The Bolshevik spirit is already abroad and it only requires a little organisation and some funds to give it an impetus. These two things, we are sure, will be amply provided by the Russian Messiah for the Bolsheviks command considerable resources—financial and otherwise. . . But the Indian super-Extremist is blissfully oblivious to such perils. He is, at present, troubled only by the mirage of oppression."

Justice, Madras, 20th Mar. 1919.

India and the Bolshevist menace.

10. New India, of the 21st March, has the following:—"The kerosene oil famine is almost international; and in such matters, the interests of India are always neglected; but since Burma is now a part of the Indian Empire, it must be possible to obtain a larger portion of its output for this country. The situation is almost identical with the case of Rangoon rice. And has not the Government prohibited its export to other countries because of the scarcity prevailing here? Why should not a similar embargo be placed on the oil supplies? The Government of Madras may well bring this aspect of the problem to the notice of the Government of India."

III.—Legislation.

Indian Patriot, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The Madras Government and the City Municipal Bill.

11. The Indian Patriot, of the 13th March, remarks:—"We have in a series of articles dealt with the provisions of the Bill at length, and we do not consider it necessary to refer to them again. . . On no legislation has public opinion been so strong and vehement, and never has such an imperfect legislation been so assiduously put forward as the right step in the direction of progressive development. The non-officials in the Councils have asked the Government to withdraw the Bill and leave it to the Reformed Councils to remodel it. With this object the Hon'ble Mr. T. Ranga Achari moved an amendment to the effect that the Bill be passed into law two years hence. The debate on the amendment has not produced the desired effect, and the Government to-day as a result of voting has come out triumphant. The determined and unrelenting attitude in refusing to accede to the wishes of the public is unfortunate and deplorable, while all shades of public opinion are vehement in their protest. It is incumbent on the authorities to show deference to the reasoned opinion and considered wish of the educated sons of the soil who desire to take an active interest in civic administration and who are sure to guide its affairs in the best manner possible. Opposition to the measure is keen, but the Government has paid no heed to it."

New India, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bills.

12. In the fourth article on this subject, New India, of the 13th March, says:—"Let us now consider the weapons at the disposal of a nation when it sees its civic liberties taken away without its own consent, when the reign of law, administered by the judiciary, is set aside by the executive, and the opinion of the Ruler takes the place of the decision of the King's Judges. . . Now against a despotism the universal opinion of civilized nations acknowledges that a nation has a right to revolt. A despotism has no moral right to exist; it holds power by might not by right. . . Now passive resistance is a form of revolt, but it is one which inflicts suffering on those only who voluntarily offer themselves as victims to despotism, with all their relatives and friends. Revolt means bloodshed and suffering incalculable in extent, with the rousing of hatred and anti-social brutality; passive resistance in its highest form is free from these evils, save from the infliction of suffering on possibly unwilling victims, who love the voluntary sufferers. Nor is it possible to avoid arousing much hatred of the oppressors among the rank and file, even if the leaders are sufficiently saint-like to love the oppressors while resisting them. More especially will it be impossible to avoid the rising of anger against the oppressors, where the latter are foreigners and the sufferers belong to the subject race."

Indian Patriot, Madras, 19th Mar. 1919.

In a leader under the heading "A Lawless Law", the Indian Patriot, of the 19th March, remarks:—"For months past the public mind has been greatly exercised over the question of a legislation which is based on the recommendations of a committee appointed to inquire into anarchical and revolutionary crime in India. Public indignation has found adequate expression. . . With an official majority the Bill as amended has been passed into law at yesterday's meeting, thirty voting for and twenty against. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma has entered strong protest against the action of the Government and has tendered resignation of his seat in the Council. Could not the Government now at least realise that they are unnecessarily throwing the country into discontent and dissatisfaction? Where reliance is not placed on public will, the result will be far from satisfactory. With one voice has the country shouted against the Bill, but the voice could hardly make itself heard in the Viceroy's Council. Public indignation, if it is not assuaged in a way now, will assert itself, and we do not venture to say what disastrous effects will arise therefrom."

New India, Madras, 19th Mar. 1919.

In a leader under the heading "the Nation's Difficulties", New India, of the 19th March, writes:—"The splendid battle fought in the Imperial Council by our elected representatives has come to an end worthy of the struggle; Messrs. Bannerji, S. Srinivasa Sastri and Pandit Malaviya are reported to have made great speeches of protest, but the mechanical majority, the Government tank, rolled remorselessly over them all. Our Madras man, Mr. Sarma—who did such brilliant work over the Budget—handed in his written resignation after the passing of the Bill. . . Their resolute struggle has made impossible any movement for passive resistance, for there is nothing left in the Bill which can be broken, except the entering into a revolutionary and anarchical conspiracy with which are connected crimes of violence, and that certainly no good citizen is going to do. . . The Act can be ignored, but it can no longer be disobeyed, and Passive Resistance means disobedience of the special law which the conscience rejects. . . Mahatma Gandhi says, and we agree with him, that Satyagraha is not identical with passive resistance. Satyagraha, as explained by him and by Shrimati Sarojini Devi, is the inviting of suffering upon oneself as a protest against wrong-doing by the civil authority, the suffering setting free spiritual force, which will shame the wrong-doer into retractation and reparation. That is certainly a very different thing from passive resistance, a political weapon, in which suffering may be incidental, but is not sought for its own sake."

13. In a leader under the heading "a Greater Ireland", the West Coast Spectator, of the 15th March, observes :—" We have more than once pointed out that the conditions in India are fast becoming on all fours with those of Ireland, and our fear is that this unfortunate continent also might sooner or later become another land of tragedies. In dealing with the political situation in Ireland, the English Government entered from one mistake into another, and instead of destroying disruptive forces they but succeeded in strengthening the anti-English movement and also the many societies working in active hostility. We have heard it said that the Crimes Act was more responsible for the Irish unrest than any measure. We are going to have a replica of this unfortunate Act, and the question is, if it will remedy these evils or have the reverse effect. . . In this country, unfortunately, weakness passes muster for strength, foolishness for wisdom and narrow vision for broad outlook. And, to make matters worse, we have an Ulster in Extremist Anglo-India which constantly eggs on the Government and incites them to acts of coercion and repression which no Englishman would be a party to willingly. . . However much we might condemn it—and we condemn it whole-heartedly and in unmistakable terms—there is no denying that the passive resistance movement is spreading like wild fire, and it is our honest belief that unless the Government give up their attitude the movement would be fraught with serious consequences."

West Coast Spectator, Calicut, 15th Mar. 1919.

The Rowlatt Bills and passive resistance.

The following appears in the Karnataka of the 19th March :—" If the initiation of the movement is going to produce new Gandhis in unexpected quarters, if new prophets of Satyagraha are going to emerge into view as a consequence of the opposition to Rowlatt Bills—that is another matter ; and we shall then be ready to weep in penitence over our present pessimism ; and we shall then rejoice at the augmentation of India's spiritual strength, feeling thankful therefore even to the Rowlatt Bills. In the meantime, may we not be permitted to express a little doubt and to plead for a little introspection on the part of all of us including the would-be Satyagrahis ? . . The whole question as to the advisability of resorting to 'passive resistance' at the present moment as a remedy against unjust laws depends for its solution upon the question of the availability of proper men to lead it. And this latter is a question which is more than any one can undertake to answer ; for it concerns not the externals of men, but their inner nature. . . It concerns the inward qualities of man—fearlessness steadfastness, preparedness to suffer physically and mentally,—spiritual strength in one word. On this point, every man must be his own judge and one cannot judge for another. Anyhow, nothing could bring us greater pleasure and pride than to be persuaded that just now we have any number of potential Gandhis in our midst,—that all who have now come forward to sign his pledge of Satyagraha are men rich in that rare commodity of soul-force. We wish them success and godspeed. Meantime, if Government take their pledges seriously and withdraw the Bills out of either fear or favour, so much the better for us all."

Karnataka, Bangalore City, 19th Mar. 1919.

Hindu, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

Mr. Gandhi and the Rowlatt Bills.

14. The Hindu, of the 18th March, says:—"The arrival of Mr. Gandhi in our midst in connexion with the Satyagraha movement ought to rouse the public to a sense of what it owes to its self-respect in the matter of the high-handed invasion of its liberties. There is, it is true, a section of opinion which considers passive resistance unwise, inexpedient and futile. . . The gospel of cowardice may often be wise with the wisdom of expediency, but it can never be popular. Never has there been a juster occasion for scorning the path of expediency and comfortable fatalism than now. Manifestoes may be useful, raw material for political window-dressing but it is not in them to make or mar a movement. Whether Satyagraha succeeds or fails it is due to our self-respect as the only form of protest left us."

VERNACULAR PAPERS.

I.—Foreign Politics.

15. Referring to the statement of President Wilson that it is the duty of the League of Nations to see that the powers appointed as mandataries attend to the interests, prosperity and progress of the helpless races placed in their charge in preference to their own, and characterising this statement as curious, the Hindu Nesan, of the 11th March, observes:—Is this progress or retrogression? Before the coloured races in various parts of the world took part in the European war to bring it to a successful close, it was openly declared that the war was waged for a righteous cause to establish the liberty due to each and to put an end to the wily policy of the weak being protected by the mighty, and that, in administration, each country was entitled to have self-determination. At that time President Wilson strongly deprecated the idea of one country guarding the interests of another and even delivered public speeches to that effect. Now the same President Wilson is advocating the very course he was protesting against. He speaks discarding the view that the coloured races are also men and are entitled to the liberty of man. Is it not for the achievement of this very liberty that a civil war was waged by Mr. Lincoln who was President many years before Mr. Wilson? Is it not to secure such human liberty for the African slaves that many Americans sacrificed their lives? It is indeed surprising to every one that President Wilson should now have come forward to deny such liberty to the coloured races, having forgotton all that he had said in praise of this liberty.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

A great advance.

Reverting to this subject, the same paper observes:—It is not all that can have the same convictions as President Wilson in the matter of tutelage and advancement of one country by another according to the views of the League of Nations. To think that one will work without the slightest leaning towards one's own interests, while managing another's property, can be said to be due to the fault of a defective understanding of human nature. Though the ruler may be of that view, is it proper to expect that all his subordinate officers will be similarly selfless? Taking the case of India, it has been the object of the English rulers, from the very beginning, to secure her progress, and all of them have endeavoured to the best of their abilities to give her education and scientific training and improve her industries, but not with much success. Some officers might say that India is now more prosperous than what she was before, and will point out that the benefits conferred on India by her trustees, the Englishmen, are many. All this is true, and the Indians feel highly grateful to the Englishmen for these benefits. Apart from this, the Indians regret their decline in other matters. It is clear from many inscriptions that, in ancient days, there were schools in every village, while the present condition of education is just the reverse of it. In those days, industries were in a highly flourishing condition in India. Now, the very traces of her once extensive trade have disappeared. Even in point of physique there has been a considerable decline and the average life of man has come to be 23·5 years as pointed out by the late Mr. Gokhale. Can this condition of India be attributed to the lack of good faith on the part of the Englishmen who have taken up the trusteeship of this country? No. It is only with the best of intentions that they send officers to India with injunctions to work for her advancement. All of these officers do not foster this liberal view, nor do they allow these defects to be brought to the notice of the authorities above them. It is the opinion of the Indians that in this way India has advanced in one respect and declined in another. If, according to the views of the League of Nations, one country acts as a trustee for another, will the primary object of the league be fulfilled completely?

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 24th Feb. 1919.

The Peace Conference.

16. The Vaisyamitran, of the 24th February, observes:—We are glad that India has to send two more representatives to this Conference; but there is no good if the Government themselves should again make the selection. The object of the Peace Conference is to ascertain the public opinion in the different countries of the world. The authorities here should realise well that the Conference is held only to know the difference of opinion between the rulers and the ruled. Representatives should be selected by the Congress and the Moslem League. There is no good in selecting the members of Legislative Councils. We trust that the Government will enable the public to realise their desire in this matter, by according permission to the All-India Congress and Moslem League to select the required representatives.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The Indians in South Africa.

17. The Lokopakari, of the 17th March, also refers to the condition of the Indians in South Africa, and says:—Will the Government of India threaten the Government of South Africa like Lord Hardinge? It will not reflect credit on the British Empire that the Indian subjects of the empire should be subjected to indignity in the countries constituting that empire.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 8th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

18. Referring to the draft rules of the League of Nations, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 8th March, writes:—. . . After a perusal of the draft rules of the League, it seems more appropriate to call it 'a league of white nations.' It leads to the fear and suspicion that all the white nations will keep the black peoples under their power and rule them autocratically and that the latter may fall very low. The only representative of the black peoples in the League is Japan. It is impossible that their one vote can protect the rights of the black people in Asia and Africa. . . . Thus, it is clear that the League is intended only for countries having a constitutional Government and that these will be in charge of countries which have no constitutional Government, to train them in the art of such a Government. Its provisions seem to have been drawn up ostensibly in the name of constitutional Government, but really to plunder dependent (lit. slave) countries and others without a constitutional Government. . . . All these provisions were calculated to establish international peace; but it was not recognized that they would be detrimental to the freedom of dependent (lit. slave) countries. . . . There was much tall talk that, after the close of the war, freedom would be established all over the world and that the principle of self-determination would be applied to every nation. It is impossible to establish peace in the world without granting self-Government to countries which are still in a state of dependence (lit. slavery).

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

With reference to the League of Nations, the Andhrapatrika, of the 17th March, writes:—Besides America, the Labour Party in England also is, it is understood, dissatisfied with the draft rules of the League. The Chinese Minister, Liang Chi Chao said in Paris that special concessions and zones of influence should be abolished and that equal opportunities should be afforded to all nations.

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 15th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

With reference to the League of Nations, a correspondent to the Andhravani, of the 15th March, writes:—. . . Some time back, President Wilson said that government of one nation by another was absurd and that such a thing would be dangerous to liberty. Has he changed his views, having been convinced that the system which he had criticised before is right? Or has he come under self-deception? We fail to understand the meaning of the following words used by him while praising the draft rules of the League of Nations: ". . . In the countries governed by her, Germany has always tried to promote the interests of western nations at the expense of those of the ruled and has not done anything for the advancement of the latter. This ought not to be allowed any longer." . . . It is regrettable that it should not have struck the delegates to the Peace Conference that the policy of encouraging the dependence of such nations cannot be conducive to the peace and safety of the world.

SAMPAD ABHYUDAYA, Mysore, 20th Mar. 1919.

The League of Nations.

The Sampad Abhyudaya, of the 20th March, writes:—Differences are cropping up more and more at the Peace Conference. There is no likelihood of the scheme of the League of Nations being put into execution. The French and the British might prove to be opposed to the views of President Wilson. In that case, President Wilson might turn indifferent in regard to peace. He might return to America content to have the Munro doctrine for his country. This might lead to a European League of Nations, and a League of Nations in opposition thereto. The Allies and the enemy might thus form two different Leagues. These two might begin to fight, and it is difficult to say what the result will be. The Allies have many far-seeing and just-minded among them. A peace based on just terms will be assented to by the whole world. No permanent peace is possible if it is based on partiality. Even students and green-grocers know this to be so. How then can peace be possible if it should be demanded that Germany should be asked to pay an indemnity of twenty-four thousand millions sterling, that the Kaiser should be sent to the gallows that the idemnity should be spread over thirty-five years and that all those who joined Germany should be placed under proper restraint. Even if peace is concluded, will it last? There can be no doubt that the Germans are wicked and beartless. But they are a clever nation capable of reviving themselves though they have been defeated. If the Allies fail to be just, if President Wilson returns discontented, if America becomes indifferent or helps the enemy, if the indifferent (neutrals) should join the enemy, the situation might prove calamitous to the whole world. It is to be hoped therefore that the Allies will consider these matters and ensure the settlement of a lasting peace.

19. Referring to the American opposition to the draft rules of the League of Nations, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th March, remarks under this heading. . . Doctor Wilson's efforts to secure the well-being of the world do not promise to be successful. . . Differences with regard to the League have arisen even in America which has been very enthusiastic about it from the beginning. The resolution moved by Mr. Lodge against the League makes this clear. . . In view of all these facts, it will be seen that the rules of the League of Nations have failed to elicit much enthusiasm. . .

Doctor Wilson.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

20. In its leader under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th March, writes:—. . . The only way for combatting Bolshevism in Germany is to improve her economic condition and supply her with foodstuffs; otherwise the contagion is likely to spread to the surrounding countries. . . It is but just that Germany should pay a suitable indemnity for the cruel deeds done by her in the various theatres of war. But the immediate collection of it may cripple her for ever, thus leading to the rapid spread of Bolshevism. As has been pointed out by the Pope, the Allies must soon conclude peace with her on such terms as will not disable her permanently. The naval blockade must be removed soon after the conclusion of peace. This is in the interests of Germany as well as of the Allies. . . The readiness of the Allies to supply Germany with food speaks volumes of their noblemindedness. . .

Under this heading, the Andhrapatrika, of the 18th March, publishes in Telugu an extract from the letter of an Irish correspondent to the Independent, in which the writer, after describing the gravity of the Irish problem and the incompetency of the present Irish Government, expresses the hope that America will help the solution of the ploblem.

(d) Education.

22. Referring to the Report on India Education for 1917-18, the Andhrapatrika, of the 14th March, remarks:—. . . Primary education shows no great improvement. Such being the case, the scant provision made in this year's budget for education is all the more discouraging.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

23. Referring to the review of the progress of education in India from 1912 to 1917 by Mr. Sharp, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th March, says:—. . . It does not seem to have struck Mr. Sharp that Indians are not responsible for the backwardness of primary education in the years under his review. . .

The Indian educational system.

DHARMASADHANI, Cocanada, 1st Mar. 1919.

24. The Dharmasadhani, of the 1st March, has the following from the pen of a correspondent:—The present-day education has been a source of many evils to the Aryans. There is a gulf of difference between the system of education in England and that in India. The reason is that the rulers there are of the same race as the ruled. Here the rulers are foreigners. The study of the vernaculars, the history of the country, arts, and architecture have all disappeared. Patriotism has waned and industries have declined. The physique of students has become deteriorated, and they are crippled at the age of thirty.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

25. The Hindu Nesan, of the 13th March, reproduces in Tamil some of the comments of the Hindu of the 11th idem under this heading about certain assertions made by the Madras Chamber of Commerce in their representation to the Government on the Madras City Municipal Bill, in regard to Municipal Commissioners and municipal contracts under the existing laws.

26. The Hindu Nesan, of the 17th March, reproduces in Tamil the comments of New India of the 12th idem on the Government Order reviewing the administration of local boards in the year 1917–18, pointing out the need for more real progress in the domain of local self-government, and condemning the tendency of the authorities to withhold the grant of every right to the local bodies until public opinion becomes almost irresistible.

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

27. The Qaumi Report, of the 13th March, writes:—Yesterday the new Municipal Bill was introduced in the Legislative Council and the right of Mussalmans to national representation was rejected

The end of municipal representation for Mussalmans.

The Hon'ble Mr. Rajagopala Achariyar, a Member of the Executive Council, was kind enough to say that a few seats are left in the gift of the Government. These will be given to Mussalmans and other numerically small communities. Thus have the poor Muhammadans been pacified.

In this case the Government have not listened to the grievances of the Mussalmans, but have retained their right in its own hands as if the Muslims of Madras are still minors, and do not understand what is good or bad for them. Hence the Government are in loco parentis and may nominate whom they like to represent the Mussalmans.

(h) Railways.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

28. Stating that it is the unanimous opinion of the people of this country that the administration of railways should be in the hands of the Government, and that Messrs. Lloyd George, Balfour and Churchill have also urged that such administration will be highly beneficial to the country, the Swadesamitran, of the 12th March, observes:—In spite of all this, we learn that the Secretary of State has decided to appoint a committee immediately after the close of the war to inquire into the question of the administration of railways in this country. We do not know whether we are to laugh at this decision or grieve over it. Where is the need for any further inquiry? The views of the people on this point have already been definitely expressed. No further evidence is needed to prove that public opinion is disregarded. It appears that the Secretary of State has agreed to the extension of the contract with the East Indian Railway Company for another five years and that this new contract will expire on the 31st December 1921. Where is the necessity for still retaining the administration of railways by companies when a major portion of the capital invested on the railways in India belongs to the Government, and when such administration has caused great dissatisfaction among the people. The managing directors of these companies are far away in London, and it is the opinion of the public that these are intent only upon their own profits. Judging from any standpoint, we would decidedly state that this arrangement is quite uncongenial to the interests of our country. If those who administer the affairs of the Government are responsible to the people, will it be possible to carry out any measure against the wishes of the latter?

29. The Desabhaktan, of the 15th March, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, a communication under this heading in which he refers to a tin of sweets despatched by railway parcel from Delhi to Madras having reached its destination with the contents replaced by a roll of paper and, accusing those in the parcel office of systematically stealing the contents of parcels, remarks that if the Railway authorities do not check this evil tendency now alone, it will grow gradually and cause much trouble and annoyance to the public. He suggests that the employees on Railways should be examined every day when they leave, as is done in printing presses.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

Railway rats.

The paper itself refers to this communication and observes:—Ever since the Railways came into existence, innumerable people have been mulcted of their articles by the Railway employees. Though established only for the good of the public, the Railways are causing more harm than good and the reason for this is only the neglect of the authorities. If these keep their employees under strict control, will such thefts occur? If the Railway officials cannot find out the thieves who purloin the contents of parcels, what else are they capable of doing? If those who are responsible for the parcels are punished, will such thefts be repeated? We hope the Railway authorities will turn their attention to this matter at least hereafter.

30. Adverting to the reply of Doctor Fisher to a question raised in Parliament about the enhancement of pensions granted to Englishmen who now reside in England after retirement from service in India, that the Government of India will soon submit their recommendations in the matter, and remarking that it appears to be their view to raise the pensions in the case of officials of all departments without any exception, the Hindu Nesan, of the 11th March, observes:—The salaries of the European officers in the Educational, Police and Engineering departments have already been raised. Now in addition to the increase of pension that would be had on account of the enhanced salaries, attempts are being made to raise the rate of pension. Is this just? Should the Indians spend so much of their money for the sake of the Englishmen?

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 11th Mar. 1919.

Indian service pensions.

31. Adverting to this movement said to have been started with reference to the Montagu-Chelmsford reform proposals, the Swadesamitran, of the 11th March, observes:—It is no wonder that this movement took such a special form in this presidency which has, of late, been a breeding centre for all retrograde measures. What action have the Government taken in regard to this movement? The public anxiously waited to see whether the persent Government would have the boldness with which Lord Morley accepted the resignation tendered by Sir B. Fuller as a threat. But the Viceroy in his speech at the Imperial Legislative Council, without venturing to reprimand the Civil Servants for their mistake, came forward to offer them consolations and assurances to safeguard their interests. The Secretary of the Civil Service Association has forwarded to the Government of Madras along with his reply to a letter of the Government addressed to this association, a copy of the circular issued by it. It is stated in the circular that the permission of Government will be applied for for submitting a joint memorial. In the order of the Government nothing has been said as to whether any such permission has been applied for or granted. This is noteworthy. Further, the Government, who should condemn the interference of Government servants in political matters and their bold attempt to form themselves into an association and send a memorial as being ill-suited and contrary to administrative policy, have simply recorded the papers without any remarks. Perhaps it may be that the order passed further on the same subject is treated as confidential. However it may be, the present situation is in no way consoling to us. Neither the Provincial Government nor the Government of India have dared to condemn the new movement and the hostile attitude of the Civil Servants. On the other hand, the Rowlatt Bills are being pushed through the Imperial Legislative Council by force to repress the constitutional agitation of the Indians. What is our duty at this crisis? We should with boldness and perseverance seek only righteousness and truth resorting to soul-force. This is what the present situation justifies. It is this that Mr. Gandhi teaches us.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

Expressing its surprise at the Government of Madras having taken notice of this movement only now, as evidenced by their recent order on the subject, and, remarking that the authorities would take notice of newspapers only when they agitate in such a way as to cause displeasure to them and subject, to the Press Act, such of the papers as act contrary to their views, and that they do not in the least pay regard to public opinion, Desabhaktan, of the 12th March, observes:—The Indian Civil Service Officers are paid for their work from public funds. Workmen always get wages. Regardless of this fact, the Indian Civil Service Officers have now come forward to agitate under the impression that their power and influnnce will be curtailed and the liberty of the Indians increased, when the Indian reform scheme comes into force. Being Government servants, it is unlawful for them to agitate in a body. There is nothing strange about the failure of the Indian Civil Service Officers to note this movement to be unlawful. It is but natural that owing to the sudden embarrassment of mind they become unable to distinguish between what is right and what is wrong. What causes great astonishment to us is that even the Viceroy failed to understand this. The Indian Civil Service Officers are already getting large salaries. Their influence is in no way affected. Perhaps they wish to live in palaces like princes and enjoy kingly pleasures. It is well-known that in no other country in the world are public servants paid so amply as in India. In spite of this, it is not at ail proper for the Indian Civil Service Officers to get discontented and agitate. If the Indians are to love the authorities, the latter should conduct themselves in such a way as to secure their love. If, without doing so, the authorities care only for their own interests, the people will get much dissatisfied with them. We believe that the condition of the Madras Presidency will undergo some change after Lord Willingdon takes over charge as the Governor of Madras. As he is one of those holding the view that there should be harmony between the Indian subjects and the authorities, we hope that during his regimé the Indian Civil Service movement will not progress.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

32. The Desabhaktan, of the 12th March, publishes, from the pen of a correspondent, some stray comments on this subject in which the following observations occur:—Wherever we go, we hear only about the forfeiture of the security furnished by the Desabhaktan. Many are of opinion that the Government acted with indiscretion in this matter. . . Instead of forfeiting the security amount, could not a warning have been given to the editor of this paper? . . . In England and other countries newspapers condemn and ridicule the ministers and the official proceedings to any extent. But we should ever remember that England and India are not the same. . . So the general inference from such gagging of the newspapers and the people in India is that the Indian should, without murmer, endure all hardships and put up with all the abuse the European may heap on him in the street, in the tram-cars and railway carriages and even with being spitted upon. But how long are the Indians to continue to hold that they are born but to suffer and that it is due to the decrees of fate? The bureaucrats might say that they would not object to the Indians representing their grievances. So we should now make out a list of subjects on which we can speak and on which we cannot. . . It will be highly serviceable if we are furnished with such a list. It is not apparent who decides whether a particular speech or writing is seditious or othewise. It is said that the Rowlatt Bills have been enacted in view to put down seditious movement. But how to decide a particular movement to be seditious?

The action of the Government against the Desabhaktan.

The Desabhaktan, of the 17th March, reproduces an extract from the Rangoon Mail condemning action of the local Government in forfeiting the security deposited by the Desabhaktan, in which the following observations find place:—The Press Act is being applied frequently in India, though the Anglo-Indian papers go unchecked, however much they may create class hatred and however strongly they may revile leading men. It is such partial conduct that provokes the Indians.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The food situation.

33. Adverting to the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar at the last meeting of the Madras Legislative Council, for the formation of a Committee to inquire into the prices of articles indispensable for living, the Desabhaktan, of the 12th March, observes:—This is an important resolution. The prices of articles necessary for life are increasing day by day, and the hardships of the people are indescribable. Sir Alexander Cardew made us understand that the Government were aware of this stressful situation. Their knowing and not knowing the condition, however, make no difference. Whenever questioned, the Government give the stereotyped answer that the food situation is engaging their attention. Should they not definitely state what they are doing and what measures they are adopting? What purpose will be served by the Government giving evasive replies and lame excuses? Will the miseries of the people come to an end by this? Why should the Government be indifferent in this matter? It is indispensable that they should make arrangements for speedily relieving the hardships of the poor.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

The food situation.

Referring to the fact that three of the representative members of the Madras Legislative Council brought forward resolutions in the last meeting of the Council on this subject, the Swadesamitran, of the 12th March, observes:—This is itself sufficient to show how speedily the Government should relieve the distress of the public at present. Though it is more than six months since lootings took place throughout the Madras Presidency as a result of the abnormal increase of prices of foodstuffs, still the severities of famine are getting more and more marked without any symptoms of abatement. The Hon'ble Sir Alexander Cardew stated that the Government were rendering all possible aid in the matter. Though he dwelt at length on the arrangements made by the Government in this connexion, such as the import of 25,000 tons of rice every month from Rangoon into this Presidency and the reduction of the shipping freight, we have to lay stress on the fact that the prices have gone on increasing day by day and have resulted in the existence of famine conditions at present. It is not known why the Government failed to see that the remedial measures adopted by them till now were not of much avail. It is surprising that they did not attempt to find out the proper cause of the rise in the price of rice in spite of the supply of $1\frac{1}{2}$ lakhs of tons of rice from Burma. Though a special department has been established to arrange for a proper supply of foodstuffs throughout the Presidency, its work is not at all satisfactory. Though the decrease in the yield is one of the reasons for the high prices of foodstuffs, still there are other important causes. The department constituted to look after the work of import and export of foodstuffs has not produced satisfactory results. Complaint is rife that importing licences are issued only to a favoured few and that this is the cause of the high prices continuing. Further, as the Government state that there is difference of opinion in regard to the question of determining the prices of foodstuffs, it is necessary that the matter should be well considered before a conclusion is arrived at. Moreover, the shipping freight should be further reduced and the question how far railway fares admit of further reduction should also be speedily settled. Arrangements should as well be made for the municipalites and district boards purchasing foodstuffs and selling them to the public without any profit. If not, arrangements should be made to send foodstuffs freely to municipalities and district boards and have them sold at cost price, without any necessity for these bodies to advance money and purchase the foodstuffs. The Government should have already considered these points deeply and rendered proper assistance. Hereafter at least, we hope that all the prominent leaders will be summoned for the ensuing conference and a conclusion arrived at to the satisfaction of all concerned.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The food situation.

The Desabhaktan, of the 17th March, remarks that the most important resolution passed at the meeting held last week here to consider the food situation of the Presidency, is that moved by Mrs. Besant requesting the authorities to remove the restrictions in force regarding the import of foodstuffs, to prohibit completely the export of foodstuffs from India, to afford sufficient shipping and railway facilities for securing the prompt transport of foodstuffs and to reduce, as far as foodstuffs are concerned, the shipping freight and railway charges to the pre-war rates, and adds that, if the Government would accept this resolution and act upon it, the existing difficulties are sure to disappear soon.

The same paper reverts to this subject in its issue of the 18th March, and says:—We do not know how far the Government will act upon the suggestion that all exports of foodstuffs from India should be prohibited. But, it is an indispensable duty on the part of our people to make them do so. The frequent occurrence of famine in our country and the rise in prices are due mainly to the foodstuffs produced here being exported to Europe and other countries. It is not only a mistake but also foolishness on the part of our people to quietly allow the wheat and other foodstuffs grown in our country and the oil-seeds here to be exported to other countries, when they are themselves starving and the oil sells at Rs. 2 in our cities. It is a mistake again on the part of the Government to quietly allow this state of affairs to continue.

Dravidan, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

Referring to a letter, appearing in the Justice, from Mr. R. Jambulingam, President, Taluk Board, Vellore, to the Director of Civil Supplies, complaining that a big company in Madras, which had promised on the recommendation of the Director to supply the President with 500 bags of rice every month, had denied such a promise subsequently the Dravidan, of the 18th March, says:—It is really shameful that a company should deny its promise of supplying rice to the President of a Taluk Board for the purpose of being sold directly to the poor. If Mr. Gray, the Director, should keep quiet in such matters, his occupying the present position should be said to be of no use to the poor people. If even big companies should adopt such tactics for the purpose of making money, the condition of other merchants may well be imagined. The bureaucrats and the big merchants should therefore try to supply the rice required by the poor without delay, which will relieve the present distress a little. We hope the Government will note this.

Lokopakari, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

Food situation.

Remarking that the opinion of the people is that the existence of the officials who have been appointed to regulate the supply of foodstuffs and control their prices, does not relieve the hardships of the people in the least and that the merchants seriously complain that trade is greatly hampered by these officials, the Lokopakari, of the 17th March, says that the opinion of the merchants is not a groundless one and adds:—Have the Government noted the serious complaint resulting from their having given the privilege of importing rice from Rangoon to Messrs. Best & Co., and will they realise the necessity of permitting several leading merchants to get rice from Rangoon, at least after seeing the disappointment caused by the big companies which were entrusted with the responsibility of supplying kerosine oil? They should immediately take steps to secure at least rice easily to the people, as a scarcity of rice will lead to unrest in the country. The inability of the merchants to secure these facilities, though it is four months since the war ended, is giving room for many impressions in their minds and the idea is spreading that all articles are being exported from India, while she is being starved. We hope the Government will, without allowing such ideas to spread, bestow serious thought upon the critical condition of the country.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

The Tramway strike.

34. The Desabhaktan, of the 12th March, publishes in Tamil the proceedings of a meeting of the Tramway workmen held on the same date in Madras, when Mr. T. V. Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar is reported to have addressed the workmen, in the course of which he made the following observations:—Some English papers say that you have gone on strike at the instigation of others. They will utter only lies. Reading these papers, Lord Pentland will think that the workmen have no grievances. He will know the truth only if he sees things personally. What can the workmen do at a time when the prices of foodstuffs have gone high? I hope that Lord Pentland will interfere and redress the grievances of the workmen. He will then be praised by the people as having done a good act on the eve of his departure from this country.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

Referring to the same strike, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th March, observes:—The present seems to be a period of strikes. So it is in no way proper to blame the workmen who go on strike. The Anglo-Indian papers cry out that the Indian workmen are irresponsible persons and strike work only at the instigation of others. But what is the cause of the strikes which occur throughout Europe? The prices of foodstuffs are increasing by leaps and bounds. It is possible for the workmen to live without difficulty, only if their salaries increase proportionately with the increase in the prices. The authorities of the Tramway Company are stubbornly refusing the demands of the workmen for increase of salaries and for other help. This Company has already made huge profits. To add to this, they have recently raised the fares. It is really reprehensible that a Company, getting immense profits, should decline to relieve the hardships of the poor workmen.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

Referring to this strike, the Dravidan, of the 13th March, observes:—

The Tramway strike.

The demands of the workmen are trifling, and the reply of the Agent of the Tramway Company is not satisfactory. Everybody knows the severity of the present famine, and it is therefore incumbent on the company to help those that get poor wages. Both the parties should promptly do their respective duties and save the public from inconvenience.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

Referring to the hardship and inconvenience caused to the people by this strike, the Hindu Nesan, of the 15th March, observes:—Should this condition continue, we will have to be ever in dread of danger breaking out. As this situation is likely to cause inconvenience to the Indians at any time, steps should be taken to set matters right. The control of the tramways is in the hands of a private company who are far beyond the reach of the people of this country, when capitalists and labourers fail out, how can we protect the latter who have become subject to the cruelties of the former? The workmen have decided to go on strike as they have no other alternative. Let the Government deeply consider the question and make arrangements to prevent the recurrence of such hardships at least hereafter.

The tramway strike.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

Remarking that, while workmen are striking work throughout the world on account of high prices of foodstuffs, a strike of Indian workmen evokes a cry from the capitalists and even the Government officials that it is instigated by others, the Lokopakari, of the 17th March, observes that, if the authorities of the Tramway Company realise that their profits are due to the labour of workmen, they will begin to attend to the grievances of the latter with sympathy and adds:—But, as these capitalists differ in race from the workmen and as they belong again to the ruling race, they enjoy several facilities, while the workmen have none. When workmen go on strike in England, the Government immediately come forward to seek a remedy. But in India, the Government are indifferent, as if they are favourable to the capitalists. Otherwise either the Corporation or the Government would have come out to undertake the management of the tramways, at least in consideration of the hardships resulting to the public from the stoppage of the tramways for the last one week. Seeing that it is on account of unbearable hardships that the tramway workmen have struck work in these hard days, it is the duty of the Government to interfere. They should not give room for the public to think that they are supporting the Tramway Company. One method by which the public can make the company sympathise with the workmen is boycotting the cars. It is only the want of union among Indians that makes the capitalists, who have come here to earn money, act as they like.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

The Tramway strike.

With reference to the strike of Tramway employees, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th March, remarks:—. . . It is regrettable that the Government should not think it fit to intervene between the employers and the workmen in view of the increasing inconvenience to the public.

Strikes.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

Medical appointments.

35. Adverting to the observation in the report of the Madras Medical College that, owing to the paucity in the number of Indian Medical Service officers, two of the Indian professors had to be taxed, with the responsibility of delivering extra lectures, the Hindu Nesan, of the 12th March, writes:—Is there any law strictly prohibiting the appointment of those who are not Indian Medical Service officers as professors in the Medical College? Cannot this law be transgressed? Does the mere title of Indian Medical Service increase the knowledge necessary for teaching? Is not this knowledge an indispensable qualification for professorship in a College? If only those who have the knowledge and capability to teach medicine are to be appointed as professors, there is no necessity for appointing Indian Medical Service officers alone to these posts. If Indians can be appointed to these posts, the necessity for burdening two Indian professors with additional work, as stated in the report, would not have arisen. As most of the Anglo-Indian Indian Medical Service officers have gone out of India, all the district hospitals in India have had to be placed in charge of Indians, and no defects or flaws have been noticed in their administration, nor has the efficiency of medical treatment declined in any way. The number of patients who obtained relief in both medicine and surgery from Indian doctors has increased. Are there not among such, capable Indians, persons competent to be professors of the Medical College?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 15th March, reverts to this subject and reproduces in Tamil some of the comments appearing in the Hindu, of the 12th idem, under the heading 'Medical services in India'.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

Kerosene scarcity.

36. Referring to the many interpellations in the Legislative Council about the causes of the scarcity of kerosene oil, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th March, says:—The reply of the Government in this matter is not at all satisfactory. Immense are the hardships suffered by the people on account of this scarcity. A few months back, this difficulty was being experienced only in the mufassal; but now it has become difficult to obtain kerosene even in Madras. The reason for this is only the restrictions placed on the traffic of ships. Why cannot the Government of India retain in their own hands the responsibility of transporting kerosene oil? Messrs. Best and Company and Shaw Wallace and Company, who have been managing this business, have not bestowed proper attention on this matter. Considering this, it will be clear that this [?] Company should not have been entrusted with the responsibility of supplying rice also to the poor people.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The scarcity of kerosene oil.

Remarking that the reply of the Government to the questions asked at the last meeting of the Legislative Council about the kerosene famine in the Presidency is not satisfactory, the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th March, observes that the Government of India will do well to take in their own hands the control of the traffic of oil steamers and adds:—The difficulty caused in the city may be said to be due to Messrs. Best & Co. and Shaw Wallace & Co., not having made proper arrangements in the matter of supplying kerosene. Though these companies hold the monopoly of the supply, we think the Government can save the people a lot of trouble by taking over from the hands of the companies the work of distributing the oil to different places and managing it themselves.

The kerosene oil famine.

With reference to the kerosene-oil scarcity in the Madras City, the Andhraprakasika, of the 18th March, writes under this heading:— . . . It is not possible to describe the row which one will see at the retail depots every evening, if one goes there. . . It seems to be better to increase the time fixed for the sale of the oil. There is no room to think that in such a case, the oil supplied to the depot will not be sufficient to meet the public demand. There is a rumour to the effect that the owners of depots are secretly selling some of the oil supplied to them to retail-dealers at a higher price, and are thus unable to sell the oil to the public properly. This rumour is not without some foundation.

ANDHRAPRAKASIKA, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

The Ali Brothers and Rowlatt Bills.

37. While appreciating the action of Mr. Ghate, the Solicitor of the Ali Brothers, in having condemned the Rowlatt Bills and pointed out how they would lead to the perpetual imprisonment of his clients, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th March, asks why the Government of India are still silent about the future of these brothers, though the report of the special committee which made an inquiry about them has already been submitted.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The Press Law in India and elsewhere.

38. In a short paragraph under the heading "Is not India a part of this world?", the Desabhaktan, of the 12th March, publishes in Tamil what appears in New India, of the 19th idem, as an extract from the Independent, showing the liberty enjoyed by the Press in all countries in the world and also India. The Desabhaktan contains a prefatory remark that the Press in other countries laugh at the Indian Press Act, and adds its own name to the list of nationalist papers in India, which have had to deposit securities under this Act.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

The India Office Committee.

39. Referring to the personnel of the Committee formed for reforming the India Office, the Hindu Nesan, of the 13th March, observes:—Neither Mr. Bupendra Nath Basu nor His Highness the Aga Khan, who are members of this Committee, has any experience in matters of finance. It is essential that an Indian with this experience should be on that Committee, inasmuch as the financial matters relating to the Council of the Secretary of State for India form the chief subject of the Committee's investigation.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The Legislative Council and the vernaculars.

40. Referring to the decision of His Excellency the Governor prohibiting the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar from speaking in his mother tongue in the Legislative Council and appreciating the courage with which he manifested his love of country and love of language, the Swadesamitran, of the 12th March, observes:—We are bound to point out that the action of His Excellency in having prevented the Hon'ble Mr. Narasimha Ayyar from speaking in Tamil is not in consonance with rules and justice. To the best of our knowledge, it is nowhere stated in the Legislative Council rules that the proceedings should be conducted only in English. But it is well-known that both in the Madras Legislative Council and in the Imperial Legislative Council the Government were nominating as members those who had not the least knowledge of English and enacting very important laws for a long time. Perhaps our Governor is not aware of this. Even now there is a provision in the rules that, when Bills are introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council or the Select Committee's reports are presented, the Secretary of the Council should furnish Hindustani translations of these for the use of those members who do not know English. Further, it is also provided in the rules that, when a member not knowing English desires to express his views, he can ask another member to explain the same in English. It is nowhere specified that speeches should be made only in English. Our disability to speak in our own language on our own affairs in a Legislative Council established in our country for our benefit, is one of the several hardships we suffer from want of Home Rule. The distinction between the language of the rulers and that of the country is kept up only in countries that have lost Home Rule and are subject to the rule of others. But at the present time when it is said that Legislative Councils are being regarded as representatives of the people and that they are soon to be made the chief instruments of responsible Home Rule, there appears to be no justification whatever for preventing vernacular speeches being made in such a Council. Though there have been rules from the beginning requiring all officials getting high salaries to become well conversant with the vernaculars and associate closely with the people, these are not observed in practice. The Government expect that more than a hundred representatives will soon be elected for the Legislative Council by thousands of voters in each district. If this is to serve any real benefit, we urge the importance of establishing the right of speaking in the vernaculars in the Legislative Council even now.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 13th March, also refers to this subject and, remarking that there are many proofs to show that the present Government do not encourage the Tamil language, observes:—So long as the responsibility of administration rests with those that do not know the vernaculars, various kinds of hardships will always be afflicting the vernacular newspapers and those that work for the spread of the vernaculars. If the proceedings of the Legislative and other Councils are conducted in the vernaculars, many benefits will result and the public also will begin to take an interest in administrative matters. It is because the proceedings of Legislative Councils are now conducted only in English and it takes very long to study a foreign language, the public fail to have anything to do with these councils. His Excellency himself admits that there is no rule prohibiting the proceedings of the Legislative Council being conducted in Tamil. Is it proper then to restrict one's right to speak in Tamil? We presume that Mr. Narasimha Ayyar spoke in Tamil only with the object of showing to the world how far the rights of man are safeguarded in the Legislative Council. We have noted that it is one of the many charitable acts of Lord Pentland to have restricted the liberty of Mr. Ayyar without pointing out the rule. Mr. Narasimha Ayyar's standing by his right constitutionally has established the greatness of the Tamils. The public should note that the constitutional procedure adopted by Mr. Ayyar in the Legislative Council is often hampered. Insulting Mr. Ayyar amounts to insulting the Tamil world. We are extremely glad to find that Mr. Ayyar, without heeding the personal insult to him, is fighting undauntedly for the cause of truth and right, on account of the insult offered to his country. The Council should be full of only such members as Mr. Narasimha Ayyar. The other non-official members in the Council should follow his example and some of them should begin to speak in Tamil at the next meeting. Why should not the officials, who come from the west to earn money, learn the language of this place? Why should the many in India learn English on account of the few coming from the west?

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

Referring to this subject, the Hindu Nesan, of the 13th March, observes that in other provinces some members have made speeches in Urdu, and that it will be evident from old records that some of the members of the Legislative Council in the past were not conversant with English, and remarking that there is no rule insisting upon speeches being made in the council only in English, adds:—The matter cannot end here. Legislative Councils are hereafter to conduct themselves as the popular representative assemblies. The time is approaching for them to bear the responsibility of administration. It is the duty of the representatives to acquaint the Council with the correct views of the people, and they have taken on themselves this responsibility. Unless the proceedings of the Legislative Council are conducted in the vernaculars, the people will have to be quite ignorant of them. It is not proper for the authorities to belittle the vernaculars. The rules require that the Anglo-Indian officers should have a knowledge of the vernaculars. To obviate the restriction imposed by the rules, they learn a few incorrect expressions and posing to have passed the examinations in the vernaculars obtain prizes and official status. In fact, they do not learn the vernaculars with any sincere interest. Hereafter, only those who are conversant with the vernaculars, will be eligible to become officers. The right of speaking in the vernaculars in the Legislative Council is very important. There has been no rule till now denying this right. We believe that, in view of the trend of the times, the eagerness of the people, the political awakening and the changes likely to be made in the future, a clear rule will be made authorizing speeches being made in the vernaculars in Legislative Councils.

The Dravidan, of the 13th March, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments of the Justice, of the 12th idem, decrying the action of the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar and compares his performance to that of a buffoon on the stage.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The Legislative Council and the vernaculars.

The Lokopakari, of the 17th March, also refers to His Excellency the Governor having prevented the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar from speaking in Tamil in the Council and, appreciating the conduct of Mr. Ayyar in standing by his right knowing that he will fail, observes that the vernaculars will be respected only in the time of Home Rule.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

The Local Legislative Council.

Referring to the reply of the Government in the negative to an interpellation in the meeting of this Council regarding the question of extending the term of the present Council, the Swadesamitran, of the 13th March, observes:—Many would have anticipated that Lord Pentland too would extend the term of the Council, as has been done by the Viceroy and other provincial heads. None can fail to note that Lord Pentland has with some special object in view declined to exercise this new power of extending the term of the Council. We have to infer that he has shown his usual lack of sympathy with the non-official members even in this important matter and does not wish to continue the Council for another year with the existing representative members. Further, his hostile attitude towards the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, openly avowed by him, appears to cling to him even when the reforms have to be carried out. It may be argued in his favour that by the extension of the term of the Legislative Council by an order of Government, the public would be deprived of their right of election. Though we do not deny this view, we have mentioned that there might be other reasons for his not realizing adequately the importance of the occasion of the introduction of political reforms. It is seen that the present representative members have felt it keenly that they are being treated by him with lack of sympathy, and propose to give proper expression to their real feeling. Unless the provincial heads evince greater sympathy than at present, we cannot say that the provincial administration to be constituted according to the new reforms, will be conducted amicably and smoothly.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

In commenting on this subject the Hindu Nesan, of the 13th March, makes the following observations among others:—The decision of His Excellency on this point is curious. What made him deviate from the course adopted by the Government of India even after knowing their views? It is not known on what authority he has so resolutely refused to comply with the public wish? It is a matter for regret that while the authorities are bound to afford the necessary conveniences to the people, he has thus acted without caring for their conveniences. We do not know if Lord Pentland would say that he has issued an order like this because of his conviction that the right of extending the term of office of the representative members legitimately belongs to the people and not to the Government.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The local Legislative Council.

In commenting upon the proceedings of the last meeting of the Council, the Lokopakari, of the 17th March, echoes the view of other papers that the replies of the Government to the interpellations of members were as usual not satisfactory, and attributing the reply to the questions regarding the Indian Civil Service movement and the book 'Crisis in India' written by Mr. K. Srinivasa Rao to the Indian Civil Service officials and the District Judge of Guntur being in favour of the authorities, remarks that, if the Hon'ble Mr. Davidson had understood the condition of the country, he would not have stated in the Council that juvenile smoking has not increased.

LOKOPAKARI, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

Vernaculars and the Legislative Council.

Referring to the attempt made by the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar to speak in Tamil in the local Legislative Council the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th March, observes in its leader under this heading:— . . . Judges were writing their judgments in vernaculars till some time back. Those judgments yield in no respect to those written in English. That system can be revived. There is no objection whatever to the conducting of the proceedings of local self-government bodies wholly in vernaculars. When the majority of the members of these bodies do not know English, it is meaningless to conduct the proceedings in English. The necessity of using vernaculars in Legislative Councils also is increasingly felt day after day. . . When we are told that some members of the Punjab Legislative Council are in the habit of addressing in Urdu and that there are such members even in the Imperial Legislative Council, we may infer that proceedings are sure to take place in vernaculars in future. It is true that in provinces with many languages the use of vernaculars will lead to some trouble. This trouble should be got over not by using a foreign tongue in preference to vernaculars, but by constituting provinces on language basis. In no other country than India do we see the administration carried on in a foreign language. There cannot be a more unnatural condition. It is not desirable that such a state of affairs should continue even after the introduction of the Reforms Scheme. As if to herald this future condition, the Hon'ble Mr. Narasimha Ayyar began his speech in Tamil during the debate on the Madras City Municipal Bill. . . He refused to speak in any other language. This strange story thus came to an end. . . But its consequences will not stop here. . . There can be no two opinions on the regard shown by Mr. Ayyar to his mother-tongue, on his striking originality and resoluteness. The manner in which he has shown his love of his mother-tongue undaunted by any thought of public praise or blame is more effective than passing a hundred resolutions about the improvement of vernaculars and will be of great help to the national progress. . .

ANDHRAVANI, Berhampur, 15th Mar. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

Referring to the attempt of Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar to speak in Tamil during the debate on the Madras Municipal Bill in the Local Legislative Council, the Andhravani, of the 15th March, remarks:—. . . It has not been specifically laid down what language should be used in Legislative Councils. From this, it may be asserted that those who drew up their constitution were not opposed to the conduct of the proceedings there in vernaculars. . . The authorities cannot afford to ignore the importance of the vernaculars of the country. . .

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

The Madras Legislative Council.

Referring to the proceedings of the last session of the local Legislative Council, the Andhrapatrika, of the 15th March, observes in its leader:—. . . The Legislative Council does not propose to grant the wishes of the people during the governorship of Lord Pentland. It has not hesitated in the least to oppose the popular aspirations. . . While the Reforms scheme is loudly proclaiming that the present system of election do not guarantee proper representation, the Government of Lord Pentland have decided to have elections under the old system. As this decision is of a piece with their other acts, there need be no wonder about it. . . . The reply of the Hon'ble Mr. Rajagopala Achari to the proposal of the Hon'ble Mr. Venkatapati Raju for the establishment of a Sanitary Board for the improvement of village sanitation is strange. . . The helplessness of the people is becoming more and more obvious. . . To think that taluk boards are not fit to elect their own presidents at a time when the scheme of self-government is about to be introduced does not show confidence in the ability of the people. Though the proceedings of the Council are not calculated to help the cause of the people, the attempt of Mr. Narasimha Ayyar to speak in Tamil is encouraging to the new ideals. There can be no progress in self-government, unless the administration is carried on in vernaculars. . .

QAUMI REPORT, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

Meeting of the Legislative Council.

The Qaumi Report, of the 12th March, writes:—The session of the Council began yesterday. It is most astounding that the term of the Council has not been extended. We do not understand why the procedure adopted by the Government of India has not been followed. Constitutional reforms are about to be introduced, hence His Excellency the Viceroy thought it advisable to extend the term following the precedent of the Minto-Morley Scheme. But the Government of Madras have refused to follow the law of the Government of India, and seem to have acted on the principle of passive resistance. It is a pity they have treated with indifference the Government of India's sensible procedure.

Would that the Government of Madras were to break from all connexion with the Supreme Government we should then be in a position to congratulate it.

As to the firing on Mapilas and the treatment of the dead it says the most barbarous thing of all was that the corpses were burnt. The injury caused by this act to Muhammadan sentiments needs no description.

41. In an article under this heading in the Dasabhaktan, of the 13th March, which is continuation of an article under the same heading that appeared in a previous issue and has been abstracted in paragraph 48 of Report No. 9 of 1919, a correspondent refers to the plea advanced by the anti-Home Rulers that the very fact of the Indians having been conquered showed that they were incapable of defending themselves and that they were therefore unfit for Home Rule and, pointing to several instances such as Canada and South Africa where conquered countries and races have been given self-government, observes that this plea cannot hold good in the case of India alone and adds:—The multiplicity of castes, creeds and languages prevailing in India is quoted against her. But is there a greater diversity in India in these points than in Austro-Hungary, Switzerland or America? Then again these differences are bound to disappear with the spread of education. The Native States like Mysore, Baroda and Hyderabad which are progressing more rapidly in administrative matters than British India, are also instances to prove that diversity of race or creed cannot be a clog to Home Rule. Though there may not be sufficient facilities now to establish the same type of Government throughout India, there does not appear to be anything to prevent the introduction of the element of Home Rule at least in the administration of the provinces. Our reply to the newspapers like the Englishman, which always cry that Home Rule will be granted to us only when we are able to protect ourselves, is that they should look at their own countries before condemning us. But for the certainty of England coming to the rescue of Australia and Canada, the former would have been devoured by Japan ten years back and the latter annexed by the United States of America. Taking England herself, can she stand alone in a war? It is no secret that, in every war within the last 50 years, assistance has been rendered to her by the colonies and India. Will any one on this account boldly declare that Australia, Canada or England is unfit for Home Rule? So it is a folly to bring forward this argument in the case of India alone. Moreover, the disappearance of the valour of the ordinary people is due to the Arms Act.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

Are we fit for Swaraj?

42. Referring to a statement said to have been made by one Mr. Fortesque in a recent speech of his in London that the British should be ever grateful to Indians for the services rendered by the latter and that nothing has been done by His Majesty in return for these services, the Desabhaktan, of the 13th March, says:—Every sensible man will admit that this is quite true. Like this gentleman, many Britishers have spoken and written in praise of the loyalty and patience of the Indians, and yet the bureaucrats, as if unmindful of this, block the acquisition of liberty by the Indians, by enacting cruel laws. Now the Government of India are trying to introduce such laws as a reward for the help and services of the Indians! And the Anglo-Indian papers say that this is British justice! Can Mr. Fortesque be unaware of what is happening in India?

Desabhaktan, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

The loyalty of the Indians.

The Desabhaktan, of the 18th March, publishes the first portion of an article on this subject from the pen of a correspondent, who begins it with the remark that India has been the abode of loyalty from time immemorial and makes the following observations among others.—There is a great difference between the loyalty of the western countries and that of the Indians. The westerns will establish a monarchy one day, convert it into democracy another day and change it again to anarchism on the third. They will not be afraid of even murdering their king. Many are the stories, abounding in the history of the west, of kings having been hunted down and killed like animals without the least sympathy. . . They say that the king and the people live amicably in a representative system of government. But anarchism has not disappeared from western countries, even after they had attained such a form of government. The reason for all this is that loyalty is not inculcated to them as a type of devotion to god. To them the killing of animals is quite natural and convenient and, if they judge our loyalty from their standard, it will not be clear to them. They should judge it from the religious basis we give to it. . . The authorities think that anarchism exists in this country, which has never seen or heard of it. They not only think so, but declare it openly and even decide to enact a law to check it.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

The loyalty of the Indians.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 24th Feb. 1919.

Vaccination.

43. The Vaisyamitran, of the 24th February, observes:—As the vaccinators have not got the required education, they are not able to adjust the quantity of lymph according to the condition and the constitution of children. Some people fearing that they will be liable to fine if they fail to present their children for vaccination on the appointed day, and some others fearing that they will incur the displeasure of the vaccinators if they say that the children are ill, do not acquaint the vaccinators with the actual condition of the children, and when these children are vaccinated much inconvenience is caused to them. Further, the lancet used in vaccinating an unhealthy child, by being used for vaccinating a healthy one, carries the germs of disease from one child to another. To prevent this kind of infection, the lancets should be properly sterilized. It is not known why these things are not carried out in practice, though there are rules enjoining these duties. It is incumbent on the District Medical and Sanitary Officer to see that these things are strictly attended to, and that the disease of one child is prevented from spreading to another.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 24th Feb. 1919.

The Government and popular leaders.

44. Referring to the proscription by Sir Harcourt Butler of the address of Doctor Ansari delivered by him as the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the All-India Moslem League last year, the Vaisyamitran, of the 24th February, writes:—The power of interpreting the expressions, loyalty and disloyalty, rests only with the authorities. The law is not quite clear on this point. It is only in consideration of this that the authorities want further repressive measures. The bureaucrats have been acting against the good of the public, taking advantage of certain differences of opinion among the people and preventing them from protesting against the actions of the bureaucrats affecting the liberty of the public. When factions spring up amongst us agreeably to their policy of 'Divide and rule', the bureaucrats, finding it difficult to accomplish their objects easily, begin to blame us and draw our attention to the split among us. The authorities repress as they like even the leaders chosen by the public. Want of union is the only cause for all this.

VAISYAMITRAN, Karaikudi, 24th Feb. 1919.

The moderates.

45. Condemning the policy and the action of the moderates, the Vaisyamitran, of the 24th February, asks why, at the present time, when President Wilson is both preaching and carrying into effect the policy of self-determination for every country in the world, certain people styling themselves as moderates should like to be in the position of slaves, and observes:—What to say of these moderates who take an interest in speaking disparagingly of the resolutions of the Congress which represent the Indian public opinion? At the present time when the people are expressing their opinions realising well their responsibilities, it will be profitless if these moderates do not change their old views. Public opinion should receive foremost attention at a time when the Rowlatt Bills are pressing us. The bureaucrats cannot flout public opinion as they like. The authorities who were giving out formerly that all unnecessary agitation was due to a portion of the educated classes, can very well find out, from the large number of telegrams received every day condemning the Rowlatt Bills, how at present the people are realising their hardships. . . These moderates, acting on the words of the authorities, threaten us that if the Rowlatt Bills are opposed, the Reforms Bill will not be passed in the Parliament. We urge that the Government will pay proper attention to the public opinion without accepting only the opinion of a party.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Mar. 1919.

Juvenile smoking.

46. Anent the resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. B. V. Narasimha Ayyar at the last meeting of the local Legislative Council that the Government should prohibit juvenile smoking by law, the Desabhaktan, of the 14th March, remarks that, while such a law has been passed in every country in the west on the request of the parents, the Government in India would not pay any heed to the prayer of the parents in this matter and adds:—As the evil habit of smoking can be prevented only by a law passed by the Government, it is necessary that they should take an interest in this matter. How long are they going to waste time without realising this? We are surprised at the statement of Mr. Davidson that there is nothing to show that this habit is increasing, and that the Government should know first that the public are anxious to have a law on this subject. Is not the opinion expressed by Indian doctors and popular leaders, that this is a horrible habit, the opinion of the public? Does not the suggestion of fifteen municipalities in this Presidency that such a law should be passed, represent public opinion? Need we point out that it will be cruel on the part of the Government to put off, on false excuses, any action to get rid of this horrible habit which is spreading among youths, and thereby to help its further growth?

Boys and smoking.

Referring to the Hon'ble Mr. Narasimha Ayyar's resolution calling for State legislation to prohibit smoking among boys, the Andhrapatrika, of the 14th March, asks why a law which was found necessary in the Travancore State is not required in the Madras Presidency especially in view of the fact that the bad habit is increasing here.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 14th Mar. 1919.

47. The Desabhaktan, of the 14th March, writes as follows about His Excellency Lord Pentland:—We regret very much to learn that Lord Pentland, who spoke disparagingly of the Home Rulers two years back from the Nilgiris, the Secretary for Scotland that interned Mrs. Besant who has devoted herself for the service of the country, the magnanimous soul that secured the conviction of Dr. P. Varadarajulu Nayudu, the Tilak of the South, who was touring round the villages, the great archer that aimed an arrow at the 'poor Desabhaktan' whose guiding principle is always devotion to country, King and God, and the Britisher, who, by the exercise of authority, prevented one from speaking in the vernacular, is getting away from Madras on the 28th instant. Though we are sorry at his leaving our midst so soon, it seems to be necessary that, having stayed in this hot Presidency for nearly six and a half years, he should now proceed to England to cool his brains. Unlike other Provincial Governors, he stayed here for more than six and a half years, and he did rare things within this period. He has made it impossible for his name to be forgotton for ever.

Lord Pentland.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Mar. 1919.

48. Adverting to the question raised at the last meeting of the Legislative Council about the propriety of Mr. K. Srinivasa Rao, the District Judge of Guntūr, having published a book entitled 'Crisis in India' the Desabhaktan, of the 14th March, says:—This question did not elicit any proper reply. Why? Are the Government supporting his book, because it is in their favour? Can even the Government rules operate differently with different people?

Government servants' conduct rules.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Mar. 1919.

49. The Desabhaktan, of the 14th March, writes:—It appears the Irishmen do not care for the laws of the Government and that the Irish labourers strike work all of a sudden and cause many troubles to the people by transgressing all legal bounds and yet there is no one to check them. In India, if labourers, having grievances, strike work with the object of getting these redressed, the Anglo-Indians find fault with them. How long are the labourers to be without seeking any means of getting their grievances redressed? Cannot the Anglo-Indian merchants spend even a small amount of the immense profits they are making for the welfare of the labourers? It is the belief of the Christians that the profits earned by the labour of men, who are not protected properly, will not last for long. Let the managers of the Madras Tramway Company note this principle.

The condition of labourers in India.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 14th Mar. 1919.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan has a leader on this subject, in its issue of the 15th March, in which it says:—The condition of labourers in India is very pitiable. Strikes are of frequent occurrence everywhere. It is only ignorant persons, who have no feeling of humanity, that can say that the labourers go on strike wantonly. The cause of these strikes is only poverty of the labourers and the pertinacity and the lack of sympathy of the capitalists. There have been a number of strikes in Madras. The Buckingham and Karnatic Mills were closed twice and caused very great distress to innumerable poor labourers. The workmen of the Madras Tramway Company struck work once already and they are on strike again. It is now five days since this strike began. Both sides are stubborn, which results in great hardships to the public. We would remind Lord Pentland that the Governor of Bombay did not sleep when there was recently a serious strike there. Why cannot our Governor follow the example of his colleague at Bombay? We do not know if he is deceived by the words of the Anglo-Indian papers and other papers that prove treacherous to their country that strikes are due to the instigation of political agitators. The labourers have not derived any benefit under the regimé of Lord Pentland. The bureaucrats have learnt the lesson very well of attributing any small disturbance at any place on any account to the work of political agitators. What can we do for this? Let the Tramway workmen stand unitedly and resolutely by truth and they are sure to win a victory.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

'The blackman.'

50. The Desabhuktan, of the 15th March, publishes in Tamil an extract from the Independent, which refers to the Saturday Review, of England, having ridiculed Sir S. P. Sinha as a 'blackman' and invites the attention of the British officials in India to a letter said to have been written by the late Queen Victoria to the Duke of Cambridge appreciating the qualities of the Indians and strongly condemning their being described as blackmen.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

The Swadesamitran, of the 15th March, also refers to the attack on Sir S. P. Sinha by the Saturday Review and quotes the letter of Queen Victoria.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

India and the Bolsheviks.

51. Dwelling at length on the barbarous deeds of the Bolsheviks and referring to their threat to spread their views throughout Asia and chiefly in India, the Dravidan, of the 13th March, remarks:—It is said that Mr. Lenin proposes to invade India with an army twenty lakhs strong during the summer. Even if this becomes a fact, most of the Bolsheviks will, it is certain, succumb to the climatic conditions of this country. Though they are huge in numbers, they have no military training. They are more a gang of armed robbers than an efficient expeditionary force. Traitors to the country who are indulging in anarchical acts will be very anxious to welcome the Bolsheviks. At this time a few so-called patriots are making a strong agitation to secure liberty for India. No doubt it is a natural desire that we should love the country in which we are born and brought up, and this love engenders in us a communal feeling and induces us to seek the progress of the country and the advancement of our brethren. But if patriotism is carried to excess and gets mixed up with undesirable ideas, it will breed sedition. Some of our patriots are associating with anarchists who entertain seditious ideas. The anarchists are awaiting the arrival of Bolsheviks, who are threatening to invade India. Further, to facilitate the spreading of their views in India, the Bolsheviks have organized an Indian association in Russia and are issuing through it pamphlets which are likely to start a seditious movement here. We urge that, at this juncture, it will be well if our Government who have already allowed a barbarous movement to transgress its limits, take a little precaution in this matter.

JARIDAH-I-ROZGAR, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

India and the Bolsheviks' menace.

The Jaridah-i-Rozgar, of the 15th March, has a leader on the subject which is briefly to this effect:—The Bolshevik plunderers, who exceedingly abhor all law and order whether human or Divine in its origin, are proud of their two leaders, Lenin and Trotsky. Lenin boasts that next spring he will attack India with two million men. We think Lenin's dream is not a whit inferior to the German Kaiser's vision.

52. The Hindu Nesan, of the 15th March, observes:—The introduction of this system is the best way to prevent the middle men from making an unjust profit. By this, the purchaser is saved unnecessary loss, and the Government will get increased postal revenue. The Government of India have, for some time, been considering over the introduction of this system between England and India. It is stated that the European Trades Associations in India are objecting to it. It is but natural that the huge profits they are now making will go down by this system. We trust that the Government will, without caring for their objection, introduce the system between England and India.

Foreign value payable postal system.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

53. Remarking that this Commission is the most fortunate of all the Commissions and Committees formed by the Government till now, the Swadesamitran, of the 15th March, writes:—Though many years have elapsed since the Decentralization Commission, the Famine Commission, the Public Services Commission and the Irrigation Commission have submitted their reports, still many of their recommendations have not been given effect to. Had the recommendations of the Famine and Irrigation Commissions been given effect to, the country would have been more prosperous. While such recommendations remain unattended to, the Government have resolved to carry out the recommendations of the Rowlatt Commission immediately. During the discussion in the Legislative Council on certain amendments to the Rowlatt Bills, the member who spoke on behalf of the Government quoted the recommendation of the Commission as being against them. At a time when even such divine works as the Vedas, the Bible and the Koran are attributed to the human authorship, the Rowlatt report is credited with a divine character.

The Rowlatt Commission.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

54. The Dravidan, of the 17th March, reproduces in Tamil the sentiments of an article appearing in the Justice of the 15th idem under this heading, pointing out the necessity for the Government to effect certain reforms to prevent labour troubles in India.

Industrial unrest in India.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

55. The Desabhaktan of the 17th and the Dravidan, of the 18th March, republish from the Times what appears to be a proclamation issued by an anarchist organization in a Russian town in which all women there between the age of 17 and 32 are declared to be the common property of the town, and rules are laid down about the restrictions subject to which they will be available for men, and the former paper comments as follows upon this proclamation:—What other evidence is needed to show that western civilization is characterised by a bestial feeling? When we see how women are respected in India and how they are treated in the western countries, the glory of our land will become patent. When we consider the extent to which western civilisation has spread among women, their lack of knowledge is well brought out. What do we learn from this but that it will take many centuries for the west to acquire a spiritual feeling.

The Bolshevik marriage.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

DRAVIDAN, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

56. Adverting to a statement said to have been made by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice T. Sadasiva Ayyar that he had to resign his office as the Vice-Chancellor of the National University to suit the wishes of the Government, the Desabhaktan, of the 18th March, observes:—It is reprehensible that the Executive Government should treat like this one occupying a high judicial office. They have no power to interfere with the National University and as such, how can they exercise their authority over those holding office in that University? Our local Government are perhaps unaware of true Britishers like Sir John Woodroffe condemning the existing system of education in India. The National University has been started only for the purpose of spreading such an education as will conduce to the progress of this country. It is a fact admitted by all that it is only national education that is suitable to the Indian youths. It is not, therefore, desirable that the local Government should, without understanding these things, take such high-handed steps on the advice of experts like Doctor Nayar.

The Government and the Hon'ble Mr. Justice T. Sadasiva Ayyar.

DESABHAKTAN, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

Hindu Nesan, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

The Hindu Nesan, of the 18th March, also refers to this subject and, remarking that the Government have a wrong impression of the National Education Movement, adds:—Many Indians deem this movement to be necessary and think that there is nothing hostile to the Government therein. If the Government opine otherwise they will do well to apprise the people of it openly. Such side-hits at it, as the present action, will excite the people, which the Government should avoid. Further, we have been under the impression that the Indian Judicial Service is not subject to the Executive Government in India. We do not know on what authority the Government of India have interfered in this matter.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

57. The Desabhaktan, of the 17th March, writes:—The main reason for the moderates detesting this movement and for some who profess to be nationalists not evincing much interest in it, is the low opinion they have of the devine principle of patriotism. Patriotism is not developed by mere talk but by one's own efforts. How many of our popular leaders have endured suffering for the sake of their motherland? How many have entered prison to establish a principle? Only two names strike us in this connexion and they are Tilak and Gandhi. Mr. Tilak's entering the prison thrice and undergoing several hardships was only for our sake. Even now, he has gone to England only for our sake. Who does not know the sacrifices made by Mr. Gandhi for us and the suffering undergone by him in South Africa? The present day Indian patriots do not oppose the officials unnecessarily. They condemn the action of the officials only when they resort to measures which are hostile to the progress of the country. Even this opposition will indeed be mild. This is the idea of several people now about patriotism and that is the cause of the passive resistance movement being detested by the moderates and bewildering some nationalists. The first thing to be done by one taking the vow laid down by Mr. Gandhi is to be convinced beyond doubt, before refusing to obey a measure of Government, that that measure is an unjust one. There is not the least doubt that the Rowlatt Bills and certain other cruel laws are unjust ones. So every one loving liberty and independence should necessarily disobey these laws. Numerous will be the difficulties which one taking this vow will have to face, and it may even lead to death. But those who take it should not flinch at any cost. The path of liberty will not be a bed of roses. It will be full of thorns. If we are not prepared to suffer cruel afflictions, the country can never be benefited. It will be a vain dream to expect to acquire liberty in course of time by adopting the old procedure. Self-sacrifice is the only means of obtaining liberty. O brethren! If you are really anxious about the progress of your country, recognise Messrs. Gandhi and Tilak as your preceptors and be prepared to enter prison and suffer hardships. Passive resistance is the only suitable weapon for a weak race, which has been undergoing suffering for a long time. Mr. Gandhi who inculcated the use of this weapon in South Africa and Kaira will be in our midst to-morrow. True patriots and the sincere disciples of Mr. Gandhi should take the Satyagraha vow without delay. It is only this vow that will help to acquire liberty by righteous means.

The passive resistance movements.

Desabhaktan, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

The Desabhaktan, of the 18th March, in welcoming Mr. Gandhi to Madras describes him as the spiritual lustre which dispels the darkness of the present day civilization afflicting mother Bharata, which roots out all fiendish qualities, which protects the right of man and which is going to reduce to ashes the Rowlatt Law that aims at injuring the life of mother Bharata and adds:—It is only the soul force of passive resistance that can help India to regain the liberty that she has lost. India has passed the age of fighting with weapons. It is the opinion of the Indians that the countries, where the practice of afflicting other lives by means of weapons prevails, are those in which the human spirit of righteousness has not spread. India is now going to preach to the world the spiritual doctrine that it should be hereafter ruled by a high righteous method. Cruel laws like the Arms Act and the Press Act are unnecessary for her and it is a folly to pass the Rowlatt Law along with these. We do not know what kind of creatures the Indians were taken to be by the Rowlatt Committee, for them to have made such barbarous recommendations. If these are passed into law, every right by birth will cease to be in India, and the only thing that can prevent this is soul force. Those who take to this force cannot be curbed or ruined by any one. Mr. Gandhi thinks that the Tamil land is famous for passive resistance, for it is the Tamils that struggled valiantly when this moment was set on foot in South Africa. O Madrasis! Therefore enlist in the army of passive resisters under the leadership of Mr. Gandhi. We will not call them Indians, who are ashamed or who refuse to follow Mr. Gandhi. When are we to show our patriotism, union, capacity and zeal if not now, when the liberty of Mother Bharata is being robbed. If you want to live in the world as men, sign the Satyagraha vow of Mr. Gandhi. This is the time for saving the honour of mother Bharata. For her sake you can lose your honour and enter prison. Be prepared to follow the example of Mr. Gandhi.

The passive resistance movement.

The Swadesamitran, of the 15th March, publishes a communication from the pen of a correspondent who describes the Tamil equivalent of 'Passive resistance' to mean literally the 'force of truth' and makes the following observations among others quoting instances from ancient history of passive resisters:—Neither the power of wealth nor any other power on earth can stand before this soul-force. This force is superior to brutal force and ordinary rudeness. Physical force, the force of arms on any other force, as for the matter of that, will not affect soul-force. . . This will drive away all kinds of despotism and injustice. As long as the people are willingly or unwillingly subject to a system of government, a resort to this force will lead to complete victory. We have two ways, viz. (1) the adoption of passive resistance when we are asked to obey an unjust law and (2) securing the repeal of the law by demonstrating our soul-force by undergoing a punishment provided in the law until the rulers or the legislators feel for us. . . If this force spreads throughout the world, the tyranny of autocracy and the power of militarism will disappear. The foolish views of power which have disturbed the west and are also spreading in the east will be crushed.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 15th Mar. 1919.

Referring to the opposition raised in Madras to the adoption of the passive resistance movement, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th March, observes:—Though Sir William Vincent openly avowed in the Council meeting the other day that he was not afraid of the passive resistance movement, the growth of the movement surely be causing anxiety to him and other officials. Just as the manifesto issued by some members of the Legislative Council has obtained approbation and curtailed the anxiety of the Government, there is no doubt that the cable of the Madras moderates will also do a similar service to the bureaucrats and Anglo-Indians. We hope the names of the Madras moderates will be noted in red ink in the list of the sincere friends of the Government. It appears some of them have stated that, if this movement spreads in the country, passive resistance is likely to lead to active resistance, which is dangerous to the country. We admit that active resistance will cause danger. But the basis of the passive resistance movement is that one should subject himself to the authority of the officials and willingly endure the punishment imposed by them. The great saint who successfully preached and practised this principle without harming others in thought, word or deed, has now come forward to lead the movement. Was there any solitary instance of any one resorting to active resistance, as a result of his working this movement in South Africa? Was there any the slightest deviation when he let it in Kaira? We should be grateful to the moderates for their having stated that they hate the Rowlatt Bills. What will they do, if these become law? The Bengalee says that the agitation which secured the annulment of the partition of Bengal, is not lost to the people and may be set up now. How can Mr. Gandhi's movement block such an agitation? Those that come forward to join this movement should be prepared to sacrifice everything. Let those that are so prepared follow Mr. Gandhi and let those who are not so bold join the agitation. The history of Mr. Gandhi will show that passive resisters will be ready to help the Government if an occasion requires it. The method of passive resistance will never lead to unrest or disturbance.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

Referring to the arrival of Mr. Gandhi in Madras the Swadesamitran, of the 18th March, observes:—The sight and association of Mr. Gandhi should increase the mental strength of our people and make them follow him and secure a victory for the eternal truth. It is stated that Jesus Christ asked his followers to come with the cross on their shoulders, implying thereby that they should be prepared to meet with death if necessary. Similarly Mahatma Gandhi is leading, with the cross on his shoulders, and asks his followers to carry the same cross. Just as Jesus prayed to God to forgive his tormentors, even while he was gasping for his life on the cross, the followers of Mr. Gandhi should have the strength of mind to suffer everything and at the same time love every one, and they are sure to achieve their object. Even those who oppose Mr. Gandhi admit the purity of his heart. What strikes a pure heart is the truth. The words of others will be tinged with their own individual opinions. So we should follow the word of Mr. Gandhi in preference to the advice of others. He asks people to follow him with the cross. Will the sons of Bharata do this boldly ?

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 18th Mar. 1919.

The same paper also refers to the manifesto issued by some of the Madras Moderates against this movement and to the cable sent by them protesting against the enactment of the Rowlatt law and says :—Though the majority of the Indians are gradually losing their faith in the process of petitions, prayers and appeals, no one can find fault with a few sticking to the old ways. We expect the Government to be grateful to the moderation and unparalleled loyalty of these moderates. But the passive resistance movement will not wane by this. Truth will win in the end. This is the experience of the world.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 12th Mar. 1919.

Passive resistance.

Referring to the passive resistance of Mr. Gandhi anent the Rowlatt Bills, the Andhrapatrika, of the 12th March, writes in its leader under this heading :—. . . Passive resistance is free from brute force of any form. The Rowlatt Bills are a menace to the common rights of men, and have called forth a strong agitation in the country against them both the Moderates and the Nationalists are unanimously condemning them. There is no more effective weapon than passive resistance for Indians to combat the Rowlatt Bills which are no better than a canker to individual freedom. . . By the grace of God, may Mahatma Gandhi succeed in his attempts to establish the sacred rights of man and to show the greatness of soul-power to his own countrymen as well as to the outside world by leading the movement of passive resistance.

ANDHRAPATRIKA, Madras, 13th Mar. 1919.

Passive resistance.

Commending to the Andhras the passive resistance movement started by Mr. Gandhi anent the Rowlatt Bills, a correspondent to the Andhrapatrika, of the 13th March, writes under this heading :—. . . The protest made by the people to the Government against the Rowlatt Bills as being detrimental to their just rights, has not been respected. This is an insult to every self-respecting Indian and it is, therefore, the duty of every Indian to spread the passive resistance movement started by Mahatma Gandhi. . .

DESABHAKTAN and SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 6th and 7th Mar. 1919.

The third anniversary of the Arcot Peoples' Association.

58. The Desabhaktan and the Swadesamitran, of the 6th and 7th March, respectively publish in Tamil a summary of the proceedings of this anniversary in which one of the speakers is reported to have attributed the ruin of the Indian industries to the development of the western trade in this country, and said that liberty was essential for restoring the original greatness of India, and the President to have observed as follows in the course of his speech :—Our ancients devoted their attention to religious matters and sought after soul force. Our ancient kings were working for the good of the people, while on account of the present rulers being of a different nation from the ruled, our grievances remain without any redress because of the bureaucrats, in spite of the fact that the British rule is a highly righteous one.

59. Observing that the attitude of the local Government does not seem to have undergone any change regarding the Indian systems of medicine since August last, when a resolution was moved on this subject in the Legislative Council, the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th March, says:—It is now stated that Doctor Koman, who has been placed on special duty to investigate about the Indian drugs, will be engaged in his work throughout the year 1919. We trust that his report will make the Government encourage the Indian systems of medicine. The Government should soon recognise the nature and advantages of these systems which have been doing good to lakhs of people from time immemorial.

60. Quoting the opinion said to have been recently expressed by the Maharaja Scindia that, if the 'curious' principle, that official prestige should always be maintained, is applied in practice, it will increase heart-burning and discontent in the country, the Hindu Nesan, of the 17th March, observes:—It might have happened that, in some cases, the Indian kings acted as they liked without caring for public opinion. But the reason for this is the belief of the people that their kings deem it to be their first duty to care for the welfare of their subjects. And again if an Indian king had at any time done anything according to his own sweet will, he, being a native of India, had the inclination and capacity to ascertain the real views and aspirations of the people and satisfy them. As much stress is laid on prestige now, it looks as if the authorities want to compel the people to believe that they are all-knowing and infallible, and that they have an admirable experience and skill. Without realising the truth of the observation of the Maharaja Scindia about the consequences of making much of the prestige of the authorities, the Indians are blamed as being ungrateful in unnecessarily accusing the authorities. Let the authorities understand the real cause of the people's discontent and distrust, at least after hearing the words of the Maharaja.

The prestige of authority.

HINDU NESAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

61. Referring to a statement said to have been made by General Townshend of Mesopotamia fame at London recently, that it was the British troops that saved Kut and that, but for them, everything would have gone wrong, the Swadesamitran, of the 17th March, observes:—Does not the above statement show that none except the British were the saviours of that city? The trouble taken by 8,000 Indian troops for that city is known throughout the world. Has he forgotten this fact? If the slur cast on the Indian soldiers is to be removed, the officers of the Indian army should furnish an explanation at once.

An insult to the Indian troops.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

62. The Swadesamitran, of the 17th March, reproduces in Tamil an extract from the Independent to the following effect:—The duty of the Indian members on the Legislative Council is to stand by the people whom they represent. If they are present in the Council after Black Bills are pssed, it will be a disgrace to them and they will besides be betraying their country. They should secede from the Council, considering their own dignity and the country's welfare, and fulfil their duty by supporting the people.

The popular leaders and the Legislative Council.

SWADESAMITRAN, Madras, 17th Mar. 1919.

63. The Lokopakari, of the 17th March, comments as follows on this subject:—The main industry of India is agriculture and it is not advancing on account of the insufficiency of facilities of irrigation. While this item requires an enormous amount of expenditure, the major portion of the revenue is allowed for the military and the railways. When all the armies in India were taken to the front during the war, there was no disturbance whatever in India, which would itself make one conclude that it is unnecessary to maintain an army in this country. If one has to be maintained here for the protection of the British Empire, its expenditure should be met by that Empire and not thrust upon India. If India is deemed to be a training ground for the British army, the proper course will be for all the countries constituting the Empire to share its expenditure. For the protection of India, an army may be raised in India alone, which will also reduce the expenditure. Considering that it is military pride that has been the cause of the great war, it is being decided by the Peace Conference that every Government should reduce its military strength. The formation of the League of Nations again makes it unnecessary for any Government to have a large army. If the opinions of the popular representatives in the Council are acted upon, education, industries, agriculture and sanitation will not be so bad in India as they are now. At this juncture when there is a great famine in India, when the Indians are steeped in ignorance, when lakhs of people are dying of diseases and when the economic condition is low on account of the paucity of industrial and commercial advancement, a very liberal provision should have been made for the expenditure on these items. But what can we do? Our voice does not prevail.
